Copies of all papers, documents, telegrams and correspondence in connection with the land grant to the Souris and Rocky Mountain Railway Company, or relating to the construction of said railway; copies of all papers, documents, telegrams and correspondence in connection with the land grant to the North-West Central Railway Company, or relating to the construction of the said railway; copies of all papers, documents, telegrams and correspondence as to the construction of a railway from a point on the Manitoba and North-Western Railway, or the Canadian Pacific Railway via Rapid City westward, by any parties other than the Corporators in the charter of the Great North-West Central Railway Company; copies of all papers, documents, telegrams and correspondence as to the incorporation of the Great North-West Central Railway Company, or relating to any land grant thereto, or to the construction of the line of the said railway or any part thereof.

He said: The papers asked for in these motions relate to the very important line of railway from Brandon to Battleford. This route was in contemplation of adoption by the Souris and Rocky Mountain Railway Co. That company was changed to the North-West Central Railway Company, which disappeared, and now the line is in possession of the Great North-West Central Railway Co. It is one of the most important lines of railway in the whole North-West, being 450 miles in length, and having a land grant of 2,200,000 acres, second only in importance to the land grant made to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Two years ago, in the opinion of this House, the construction of this railway was a matter of extreme urgency. We know the interest that was taken by the House and the country in matters connected with the former charter. An opportunity was given by the House to the owners of that charter to place a deposit in the hands of the Government as evidence of their good faith, and to prevent their charter from lapsing; and the very unusual and special course was taken by this House to give to the Government the power, while the House was not sitting, to charter as a company, any body of persons whom they chose, with full powers to build this railway in case of the default of the then existing company, and they were also given power to award the land grant to the company so to be incorporated. The Minister of Public Works, as chairman of the Committee on Railways, during the Session of 1886, telegraphed, I think, to the Legislature of Manitoba, telling them the Governor in Council would incorporate a good company to build the road. Well, what has happened? The old company made default. The Government without much delay incorporated a company by letters patent, on the 22nd of July, 1886, and gave it the land grant, and as something appears to have been considered wrong or incomplete in the original charter, the applicants asked the Government to amend that charter, which was promptly done by the Government in August of the same year. I do not complain of delay on the part of the Government up to that time; but what has been done since then? We hear that the company have organized and have paid in $50,000 to the Government as evidence of good faith; but when there was such great urgency as everybody admitted there was in 1886 for the construction of this railway, why has there been delay? It was only recently, when we saw a Bill presented to this House by the Great North-West Company to confirm their letters patent, that we discovered what may perhaps account for the delay. It appears that there was a mistake in the letters patent granted to this company by the Government in July, 1886, the charter not being in conformity with the Act of Parliament which authorised it. That admission was made the other day by the Minister of Justice, when he stated to the Railway Committee that he had suggested to the incorporators that they would require to get legislation. What I complain of is that the Government granted a charter inconsistent with the Act authorising it. If the Act was not what they wished it to be, why did they not come to the House last Session and get the necessary legislation to put it right? There can be no excuse for this delay. It cannot be altogether blamed on the incorporators either, for when the Minister of Justice advised them to get legislation to confirm their charter, I cannot be surprised that they did not or would not go on under the charter as it stood. It does seem to me that a great deal of explanation will be required from the Government as to why they allowed such an important measure of railway construction to lie absolutely dormant for two years. The enterprise is no further ahead now than it was in July, 1886. In fact it was a great deal farther ahead then than it is to-day, because the time of the charter was up, and it was not in accordance with the Act. There is no need of discussing in what way it was not; but I may briefly say that the Act required that the charter should provide for the payment of all the legal obligations of the former company, and the charter undertook to interpret what that meant by defining certain obligations which the new company was to be bound by. I do not know what Parliament would have stated had it been asked to define the obligations more distinctly in the Act; but the Government defined them by letters patent, and they have to admit that that part of the charter requires confirmation by an Act of Parliament. I move for these papers, and I think they will show that the Government are responsible for the delay in the construction of this railway through that rich portion of the North-West. Everything, apparently, was ready for the work two years ago. The Minister of Public Works announced that everything was ready; and yet the Government allowed the whole of last Session to pass without asking this House to rectify matters. Although they have come now for legislation, we do not know that the people of that part of the country may not have to wait two years more before the work of construction is commenced.

Motion agreed to.

MILITARY CHAPLAIN, ST. JOHN, P.Q.

Mr. AMYOT moved for:

Copies of all correspondence between the Government and certain residents of St. John's, P.Q., respecting remuneration for the services of Rev. M. Aubry, in attendance on, or as Chaplain to the Military School at St. John's, P.Q.

He said: If the information I have received is correct, the Rev. Mr. Aubry, who has acted as the Chaplain of the school of St. John since the Government has had charge of that school, has never received a cent for his services, and has besides to pay for driving there and back. The Imperial Government used to grant $300 a year for the same service.

As I understand, the Rev. Mr. Aubry claims $2 a week, and that amount has been refused to him. I do not know personally the facts of the case, but I state them as they have been given to me; and if they are correct, I think it is unfair to ask for the services of a Chaplain and then to refuse to pay for them. The Chaplain is as well entitled to remuneration as any other individual, and I think the Government should not begrudge the small amount he claims. I hope it will be sufficient to draw the attention of the Minister of Militia to this injustice to have it remedied.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I think it would be very much more convenient to discuss this matter when the papers are brought down. The hon. gentleman has referred to information which was conveyed to him. In the face of that declaration, I should not like to contradict any of the statements he has made, without having the papers, which must speak for themselves, before me. I must, however, draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that under the regulations, which are the law under which the department must act, no provision is made and no authority is given to the department to pay a chaplain. The report made to me is that the School of Infantry at St. John attend the religious exercises in the parish church, like everybody else, and that no extra religious services are rendered, such as were rendered when the Imperial forces were stationed in Quebec. Then there was a special service for the force, and naturally such service was remunerated. This is a matter, however, in which I would have been very happy indeed to have seen my way clear to authorise the payment of remuneration, if, under the law, which is above me as it is above everybody else, I could have given it. When the papers are brought down, the correspondence will disclose the action which the department has taken in the matter.

Mr. AMYOT. I would have had no objection to wait until the papers are brought down, but we never know when they will be brought down. They may take one year or two years to come down. I asked for papers last year; they are not before the House yet. I will only say that if no services have been rendered by the Reverend Mr. Aubry, he is not entitled to remuneration, but if he has rendered services he certainly is entitled to be paid for them; and if the law does not allow it, the hon. the Minister of Militia, who has power to change the by-laws and regulations of the Militia, should have them changed. It is absurd to pass by-laws which work injustice, and then say that the by-laws will not allow justice to be done. Let us make the by-laws in such a way that justice will be done to every one.

EAU POUR SALLE D'EXERCICES MILITAIRES A QUÉBEC.

M. AMYOT: Je demande—

Copie de la correspondance échangée entre le gouvernement et la corporation de Québec, au sujet de l'eau nécessaire à la salle d'exercices militaires (drill shed) de la cité de Québec.

M. l'Orateur, il y a quelque temps, j'avais mis sur les ordres du jour une interpellation, et l'honorable ministre de la Milice n'a pas paru comprendre ce que je demandais. Il s'agissait de l'eau nécessaire pour la salle d'exercices de Québec. Il a cru qu'il s'agissait d'une école de navigation. Je voulais parler de l'eau nécessaire aux soldats lorsqu'ils font la parade; ils ont besoin d'eau pour boire de temps en temps,—cela est permis par les règlements en force,—ils ont besoin d'eau aussi pour mouiller le plancher afin d'empêcher que la poussière gâte les habillements des soldats. C'était là l'usage de l'eau dont je parlais. Depuis ce temps-là, les soldats n'ont plus la peine de payer l'eau dont ils ont besoin, le gouvernement a été assez bon de la leur fournir. Ma motion devient donc inutile et je demanderai la permission de la retirer.

Motion retirée.

DESTITUTION DE GEORGE OLIVIER.

M. RINFRET: Je demande—

Copie de toutes correspondances, requêtes et papiers de toute sorte, concernant la destitution de M. George Olivier comme maître de poste de la paroisse de Saint-Agapit, dans le comté de Lotbinière.

M. l'Orateur, à la dernière session j'ai présenté devant cette Chambre exactement la motion que je présente maintenant, cette motion a été adoptée par la Chambre, mais cependant le retour n'a pas été fait, du moins, s'il a été fait je n'en ai pas eu connaissance.

Si je me permets de ramener cette question devant la Chambre cette année, c'est que la destitution de M. Olivier s'est faite dans des circonstances tout-à-fait particulières. Elle a eu lieu à la suite de l'élection pour la Chambre locale pour le comté de Lotbinière dans laquelle M. Beaudet se présentait contre M. Laliberté. Cette élection a eu lieu presque immédiatement après l'exécution de Riel; et d'après ce qu'on a pu voir, le gouvernement a voulu en faire un test case. En effet, malgré que ce fût une élection locale, une foule d'agents et d'amis du gouvernement fédéral ont travaillé dans cette élection, et ils ont employé tous les moyens pour faire triompher le candidat du parti conservateur, M. Beaudet. Ils ont employé non-seulement les questions politiques, mais ont eu recours à l'intimidation la plus effrontée. C'est ainsi que toutes les personnes qui dépendaient d'une manière ou d'une autre du gouvernement fédéral, tels que les gardiens de phares et les personnes employées par la commission du havre de Montréal pour le creusement du Lac Saint Pierre, ont été menacées de destitution s'ils votaient pour M. Laliberté.

Le maître de poste de Saint-Agapit n'appartenait pas au parti conservateur; il était bien connu que ses sympathies étaient en faveur du parti libéral, mais tout de même, c'est un homme qui s'est toujours occupé de politique avec beaucoup de modération tout en travaillant dans une certaine mesure pour son parti. Or, presque immédiatement après l'élection cet homme a été destitué. On a prétendu dans le temps que la raison de cette destitution était que l'on voulait changer de place le bureau de poste de la paroisse de Saint-Agapit. Mais cette raison est futile, surtout si l'on tient compte du fait que le changement ne rencontre pas les vues des habitants de la paroisse. Il est vrai qu'il a été rapproché de l'église de Saint-Agapit, mais il est plus éloigné du centre des affaires, et les citoyens de la paroisse se plaignent de ce changement et de cette destitution.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN: M. l'Orateur, je croyais que mon collègue, le Maître-général des postes était ici, mais je m'aperçois qu'il n'y est pas. Je ne suis pas en état de répondre à ce que vient de dire l'honorable député; néanmoins, les papiers seront déposés devant la Chambre et je suis convaincu que lorsque l'honorable député les aura examinés, il verra que ce qu'on lui a dit au sujet de cette destitution est exagérée, et que si ce monsieur a été démis de ses fonctions, il a dû l'être pour bonnes causes.

Motion accordée.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON : Je comprends que l'honorable député produit une liste des papiers qu'il désire avoir.

M. AMYOT : J'ai simplement lu les titres des documents afin qu'ils apparaissent dans les Débats mais je pourrai en envoyer une copie au département.

M. AMYOT : J'envverai une liste des documents que je requiers au département.

Motion accordée.

RÉCLAMATION DU DR J. A. MORIN.

M. AMYOT : Je demande—

Copie de la réclamation du Dr J. A. Morin, de Saint-Charles, Bellechasse, pour soins médicaux donnés à Odilon Fournier, serre-frein sur le chemin de fer Intercolonial, blessé à Saint-Charles susdit pendant qu'il remplissait les fonctions de serre-frein, le 28 mars 1885, lesquels soins ont duré jusqu'au 8 juin 1885, et la correspondance échangée à ce sujet.

M. l'Orateur, je fais cette motion pour attirer l'attention du gouvernement sur une injustice assez grave qui se commet actuellement. L'Intercolonial, la propriété du gouvernement fédéral, est souvent la cause de certains accidents. Dans le cas actuel, un des employés de l'Intercolonial a été blessé grièvement à une main ; on a chargé un médecin de l'endroit de le soigner ; les soins ont duré, ainsi que je le dis, M. AMYOT.

dans ma motion, à peu près deux mois et demi. Le médecin a dû faire l'amputation de trois doigts et un pouce dans des circonstances très difficiles ; il a donné des soins prolongés, et pour tout cela on ne lui offre que $25. Je ne crains pas de dire si les officiers du département—car je n'attribue pas cela au département—étaient sérieux, ils n'agiraient pas ainsi. Ce n'est certainement pas $100 qui seraient une rémunération suffisante pour les soins donnés par ce médecin.

Voici les faits tels que ce médecin me les rapporte :

L'accident eut lieu le 28 mars 1885. Le nommé Odilon Fournier eut la main broyée dans les roues d'un convoi ; il fallut faire l'amputation du pouce et de trois doigts et traiter le petit doigt pour une fracture composée. Afin de sauver quelques parties utiles de la main, j'ai dû faire l'amputation des doigts dans une partie demi-broyée, et conséquemment, s'exposer à des complications et à un long traitement, chose de peu d'importance si on la compare avec l'utilité que peut avoir un tronçon de doigt pour un homme aussi infirme. De fait, il y a eu de l'inflammation et de la gangrène des lambeaux ; néanmoins, à force de soins, j'ai réussi à lui sauver toutes les parties conservées lors de l'amputation. Le traitement dura jusqu'au 8 juin 1885.

Alors j'envoyai mon compte au montant de $91.75.

On le renvoya avec leur tarif. Je refis le compte autant que possible suivant l'esprit de ce tarif ; il s'éleva à $110.50. Mais ce tarif n'accordait que $5.01 pour chaque amputation de doigt jusqu'à guérison. Alors je ne pouvais accepter ce montant, et on me refusa de me donner plus de $25.00. Le montant aurait pu suffire pour une amputation dans les chairs saines, mais non dans des chairs meurtries où il a dû se produire des complications sérieuses et longues à guérir. Vous verrez d'après les lettres écrites et les comptes quel montant d'ouvrage j'ai fait. Je prétends que la compagnie n'a pas le droit de m'imposer de tarif. J'ai été demandé pour faire l'ouvrage par les agents du chemin sans condition aucune ; c'est pourquoi on ne peut refuser ce me semble de payer mon compte tel que fait s'il n'est pas extravagant. Je n'aurais certainement pas entrepris de faire de l'ouvrage pour le montant offert aujourd'hui. Mon compte n'est pas exorbitant.

Et il ajoute la raison pour laquelle il croit qu'il n'est pas payé. Je n'ai pas besoin de la dire devant cette Chambre, elle sera probablement devinée. Mais j'attire spécialement l'attention du gouvernement sur ces faits. Je crois que les médecins qui sont employés par le gouvernement devraient recevoir justice, quel que soit l'endroit où ils se trouvent et quelle que soient leurs opinions ; on devrait se demander quels services ils ont rendus et les payer en conséquence. Si le gouvernement refuse de leur rendre justice, il arrivera que les médecins ne voudront plus s'occuper de ces cas-là, et le service public en souffrira.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN : En réponse à l'honorable député je dois dire que les renseignements reçus au sujet de la réclamation mentionnée dans sa motion sont ceux qu'il a donnés lui-même, que le docteur Morin a été appelé à secourir un serre-frein nommé Odilon Fournier qui avait été blessé sur l'Intercolonial le 28 mars 1885 ; que pour ces services, il lui été offert la somme de $25.00, et on ajoute que cela est conforme au tarif de l'Intercolonial. Je ne sais pas quel est ce tarif ; dans tous les cas, M. Morin demande $110.50. Il va sans dire que si M. Morin ne peut pas obtenir le montant de son compte, qu'il croit raisonnable, du département, il faudra qu'il fasse comme fait tout le monde en pareil cas, il devra porter sa demande devant les tribunaux. Quant au tarif, je ne puis pas dire s'il est conforme à celui des médecins, ou si c'est un tarif adopté spécialement sur l'Intercolonial. Dans tous les cas, les papiers seront déposés devant la Chambre.

Motion accordée.

BAY FORTUNE BREAKWATER, P.E.I.

Mr. McINTYRE moved for :

Copie of report of Engineer who recently examined the breakwater at Bay Fortune, King's County, Prince Edward Island, with a view to its extension ; together with copies of all petitions, letters, &c, in relation thereto.

He said : The construction of the breakwater at Bay Fortune is the result of the voluntary exertions and contributions of the people there, and it has not yet received a cent from the public chest. In the summer of 1886, an engineer went down to the locality and examined the work, but there has been no report of that examination published, as in all similar cases. Why, I do not know. In 1887, last winter, the people of that section of the country sent a large petition to the Department of Public Works asking for aid to finish the breakwater. Their means had all been exhausted, and they thought that, as they had given so much of a voluntary kind, the least the Government could do was to give them a slight amount of assistance. As I understand, at present, for want of the work being constructed out to the bar, the water is digging a false channel, but if they had sufficient means to push the work out to the bar, it would save the harbor and make a complete work of it. In connection with the manner in which the water is acting just now I will read an extract from a letter I received a few days ago, which will more fully explain it. The writer says:

"Were it not for the promises held out to us by the Government party we would never have expended so large an amount of labor upon it, knowing well that it was too heavy an undertaking to accomplish without some assistance from the Government. The great misfortune about it is that, not being able to carry the work out to the bar, as we intended, the current is now cutting a false channel around the outer end of the breastwork, and, if not stopped, will most certainly ruin the harbor, if not already destroyed."

The section of the country is a large agricultural and fishing section. It is a wealthy country, and the people are very far distant from their market. In winter, the roads leading to that market, which is the town of Souris, are extremely bad. With a little assistance from the Government, they could complete the work, which would make the harbor a good one for the exportation of their produce and for fishing purposes. I think the public spirit which has been displayed by these people deserves some consideration from the Government, and I trust the Minister of Public Works in his Supplementary Estimates will not forget the action these people have taken in their own behalf. The work must be of great importance to them or they would never have undertaken it. I trust the Minister will see the necessity of giving these people some slight assistance. It would not take a large amount now to finish the work, seeing that, in the winters of 1886 and 1887, the people by their own voluntary labor constructed no less than 460 feet of it, and a very short addition would make the harbor complete.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have no objection to the motion of the hon. gentleman, with this exception, that, instead of saying "the report of the engineer who recently examined" this work, it should be the report of the Chief Engineer in connection with it, because the engineers on the works make their reports to the Chief Engineer, who reports to the Government. If the hon. gentleman will consent to that change, without a formal motion, I have no objection to its passing. I may say that the examination was made, and the Chief Engineer reported upon it, but, though there was an expression of opinion or wish in the petition that was sent in, the hope that at no distant date assistance might be obtained from the Government, there was no special application for a grant of money. So the matter has stood there, but now that the hon. gentleman has called my attention to it, I will see what the report says.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

SQUATTER'S CLAIM IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. McMULLEN moved for:

A return containing copies of all letters, correspondence, affidavits, &c., connected with the location and sale or settlement of N. $\frac{1}{2}$, section 16, Township 24, Range 29 West, 4th Meridian, Northwest Territory.

He said: I desire to bring before the notice of the House a matter connected with a piece of property in the North-West, the north half of section 16, township 24, range 29 west of the 4th meridian. It appears that a person named Topping was a squatter on this land, and a person of the name of McLeod bought out the squatter's rights, went into possession of the land, and made some improvements. The land at this time was not in the market for sale. When it came into the market, Mr. McLeod went to make his entry, but to his surprise he found that a man named Walker had made the entry and made some payment on it. He complained to the land agent that Walker had been permitted to make his entry while he was virtually in possession of the property; and I believe, according to the Land Regulations, it became necessary for Walker to file a declaration stating that there was no one in possession and that no improvements had been made before he could be permitted to enter. If Walker made that declaration, it was a very improper declaration for him to make, because it is clear that McLeod was in possession of the lot and had bought the right of the man I have named. Mr. McLeod applied to have Walker's entry cancelled and to have his own name inserted as the owner of the property. The Board refused to do that, and McLeod was virtually cheated out of his property. He had to give up possession and leave the lot. He lived close by for twelve months, and during all that time Walker neither went into possession nor made any improvements. At the end of the twelve months, McLeod made an application to the land agent to be permitted to become the possessor of the property, paid his money and filed the declaration that there was no improvements whatever made by Walker on the property. He waited the full time of twelve months to give Walker all the opportunity he could reasonably expect to make improvements, but Walker made none. McLeod's application was sent forward, but, to his surprise, it was refused, the Land Board would not consent to give him the lot after the twelve months during which he had waited, though Walker had had that time to make the necessary improvements under the statute. These are the statements he made to me; I am not in a position to say whether they are all true or not, but, if they are true, it evidently shows that advantage has been taken of the man for some reason. I cannot say what the reason is, but it is quite clear, if the statements are true—and he puts them in such a shape that I am disposed to think they are true—that, although he was an actual settler on that lot, by some influence, which may have been improper influence, he was removed from that property and it was given to Walker, was was put into possession, but never made any improvements for a year. The reason the Land Board refused to give the right to McLeod was said to be that Walker had stated he had let a contract to a man named Campbell to do some breaking. Mr. Campbell did nothing, however. He had the whole year, but there was not a sod turned. Of course Mr. McLeod expected fully at the end of the year, under those circumstances, that the privileges would be granted to him that were ordinarily granted to any party seeking to become a regular settler. Still, within twenty-four hours, he says, after he had made application to become possessor, there were some four or five teams put on the property for ploughing. Walker pretended to comply with the Land Board regulations. He claimed that he had let this man, Campbell, the contract for breaking, and Campbell had not carried out the contract, and owing to that fact improvements were not made. Well, if a man simply requires to present a statement of this kind in every case, and that excuse is accepted, and the actual settler, the man who has been in possession, according to the statement he has made to me, is virtually turned out although he still offers to preempt and do the work afterwards—I think that is rather a singular state of affairs. Now, we find that all the papers have been sent to the Minister of Interior, and I say if there is any truth in these statements it is a very unfortunate thing that men who are disposed to become actual settlers should be hustled around in that kind of a way. I think if there is any class in the world who should receive the earnest considerate attention of the Land Board there, or of the Minister here, it is the men who are prepared to go in as actual settlers and perform the improvements. Now, in moving for the papers which I believe are in the possession of the Minister of interior, I may be met with the statement that it would be better to wait until the papers are brought down in this case. Well, I have noticed that in many cases, where orders of this House have been passed, it is very late in the Session, and sometimes not until the following Session, that we get the papers. I felt it my duty to draw the attention of the Minister to this matter now, lest we might not get the papers during the present Session. I therefore beg to move for:

Copies of all letters, correspondence, affidavits, &c., connected with the location and sale or settlement of N. $\frac{1}{2}$ section 16, township 24, range 29 west, 4th meridian, North-West Territory.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). There is no objection to the papers coming down, and I have no objection whatever to the statement the hon. gentleman has made. I think when the papers come down he will find that he has been misinformed on one or two rather important points. As he has put his statement before the House, I may as well state the actual facts as they exist with regard to this lot. Major James Walker obtained entry for this half section as a homestead and pre-emption in the spring of 1886. He was then residing upon the north-west quarter of section 12, in township 24, range 1, west of the 5th meridian, and, being within two miles of his homestead, he obtained the entry under the provisions of sub-clause 6 of clause 38 of the Dominion Lands Act, commonly known as the two miles radius clause. Subsequently, application was made by one J. R. McLeod, on whose behalf, I think, the hon. gentleman makes his motion really worse, as to those three or four acres, than if the prairie had never been broken at all. To obtain homestead and pre-emption entries for the same land, on the ground that in 1884 he had purchased the squatter's claim of one Richard Jaffing, who was alleged to have built a house and done some ploughing on the north-east quarter, McLeod stated that he had himself also done some ploughing. The records of the surveys branch give no indication of these improvements at the time of survey, and an examination of the land by the homestead inspector showed that prior to Walker's entry three and a half acres would appear to have been broken, but by that time, not having been cultivated, the area broken was overgrown with weeds, and the so-called improvements were valueless. The land was open for entry in May, 1885, and between that time and the spring of 1886, when Walker got his entry, a period of nearly 2 years, McLeod neither resided upon the land, nor applied for entry. There was, therefore, neither residence nor cultivation of the land at the time Major Walker got his entry. The land was opened for entry in 1885, and if McLeod desired, as a squatter, to obtain any right, it was his duty under the Act to make his application within three months of the opening of the land for entry; but between that time and the spring of 1886, when Walker got his entry, a period of nearly a year, McLeod neither resided upon the land nor applied for entry. The law requires squatters in advance of survey to apply for entry within six months of the date when the township is open. In the spring of 1887 McLeod applied to cancel Walker's entry on the ground that the latter had failed to break and prepare for crop the prescribed area of the homestead quarter section within the first year. The inquiry instituted by the Land Board showed that Walker had made a contract, just as the hon. gentleman has stated, with one Campbell, to break the land for him in the autumn of 1886, but early frost prevented him from performing it; and although the pre-Mr. McMullen.

scribed area was not actually broken within the year, a greater area than the law required was prepared for crop before the date of inspection, and the Board sustained Walker's entry. The decision was appealed against, but was finally confirmed by the Minister, after consideration of all the evidence. These are the facts which will be shown when the papers come down.

Motion agreed to.

QUARANTAINES DU CANADA.

M. Fiset, en demandant la nomination d'un comité spécial pour s'enquérir de la manière dont le service se fait aux quarantaines du Canada, ainsi que les meilleurs moyens à prendre pour empêcher les maladies contagieuses d'entrer dans le pays, avec pouvoir d'entendre devant le comité des personnes expertes en la matière, le dit comité devant faire rapport, dit:—

M. l'Orateur, la motion que j'ai l'honneur de présenter, est une des plus importantes parmi celles qui se trouvent sur les ordres du jour. En effet, il ne s'agit pas ici d'intérêts pécuniaires; il s'agit des intérêts du peuple: salus populi suprema lex, comme on dit en latin.

Je dirai de suite qu'en faisant cette motion, je n'ai pas l'intention de blâmer l'administration des quarantaines, ni le département de l'agriculture; je dirai, au contraire, que notre système de quarantaine est, je crois, le second en Amérique par son efficacité. Mais je dois ajouter toutefois, qu'il est encore loin d'être parfait.

Si j'ai pris sur moi de faire cette motion, c'est parce que des hommes éminents de la profession médicale, des corporations sanitaires, telles que les bureaux de santé des provinces de Québec et d'Ontario, m'ont fortement approuvé dans cette démarche. J'ai ici plusieurs lettres de médecins éminents qui approuvent ce projet, et je demanderai à la Chambre la permission de les lire. Je commencerai par celle du Dr Lachapelle, de Montréal, le président du Conseil provincial d'hygiène:

CONSEIL PROVINCIAL D'HYGIÈNE,
PROVINCE DE QUÉBEC.
MONTRÉAL, 14 mars 1888.

DR R. FISET, M. P., Ottawa.

CHER MONSIEUR,—J'approuve entièrement l'idée de nommer un comité composé des médecins de la Chambre pour étudier l'importante question de notre quarantaine.

Je suis convaincu que les renseignements qui pourront être ainsi recueillis seront très importants, et je crois que c'est le devoir de la législature de ne rien négliger pour mettre notre système de quarantaine sur un pied d'efficacité aussi parfaite que possible. L'expérience fournie par la quarantaine de New-York l'automne dernier, doit suffire pour nous faire apprécier l'importance de cette question.

Votre bien dévoué serviteur,

E. P. LACHAPELLE,
Président.

En effet, M. l'Orateur, qu'on se rappelle que l'automne dernier, alors que l'on était sous l'impression que les maladies contagieuses pouvaient nous venir par voie de New-York, Boston ou Portland, le choléra a éclaté à New-York; —il avait été apporté par des steamers,—et nous avons été grandement trompés, puisque nous étions sous l'impression que leur service de quarantaine était efficace, pendant qu'il a révélé un désordre complet; la quarantaine de New-York était loin d'être aussi effective que la nôtre.

Je lirai maintenant la lettre d'un médecin distingué de Québec, le Dr. Catellier, et qui en fait de quarantaine possède beaucoup d'expérience:

QUÉBEC, 24 mars 1888.

MON CHER DOCTEUR,

Je ne puis qu'applaudir à votre idée d'améliorer dans la mesure du possible notre système de quarantaine. En effet, en présence des dangers qui nous menacent, surtout du choléra, il est fort à propos de s'occuper de la santé publique, et de s'enquérir si les maladies contagieuses ne nous viendront pas par la voie du Saint-Laurent, par les steamers qui transportent les passagers et les émigrants. Si votre comité est sérieux, il rendra certainement des services au public, et au gouvernement, toujours désireux de prévenir les maladies contagieuses dans ce pays.

Bien à vous,

L. CATELLIER, M. D.

Je suis heureux de dire ici que le Dr. Catellier est un de ceux qui m'ont donné l'idée de demander la formation de ce comité.

Passons maintenant à la lettre du Dr. Robillard, d'Ottawa, président du bureau de santé de cette ville :

OTTAWA, 20 mars 1888.

Dr A. R. Fiset, M. P.

MON CHER MONSIEUR.—Toute démarche dans le sens de la motion que vous vous proposez de faire, demandant un comité spécial qui devra s'enquérir de notre système de quarantaine et de son administration dans nos ports, doit vous mériter, il me semble, l'approbation de toute personne bien pensante. Une question si importante au point de vue du bien-être de nos populations, et si pleine d'actualité, vu les empiétements graduels du choléra vers nos rivages, requiert une attention spéciale du parlement fédéral, qui devra mettre ces mesures sur un pied tel que personne ne puisse douter de leur efficacité.

Votre dévoué serviteur,

C. A. ROBILLARD, M.D.

J'ai encore la lettre de M. le Dr. Montizambert, médecin de la quarantaine de la Grosse-Ile, homme distingué, qui comprend l'importance de ce comité comme on va le voir. Voici ce qu'il dit :

71, ST. URSULE ST.,
QUEBEC, 23rd March, 1888.

DEAR DR FISET,

Pray accept my grateful acknowledgments for your letter dated the 21st inst. enclosing copy of your notice of motion, and preparing me for a possible summons to appear before the committee.

I need hardly answer you that if so required, it will be a pleasure as well as a duty for me to give such aid as I can to secure the best precautions to prevent cases of contagious diseases from entering into the country.

It is a matter, the importance of which can, in my opinion, hardly be over-estimated.

"Salus populi suprema lex."

With kind regards,

Yours ever sincerely,

FREDK MONTIZAMBERT, M.D.
F.R.C.S.

Ce n'est pas tout. Je soumettrai maintenant une résolution passée par le Conseil provincial d'hygiène de la province de Québec, à une réunion tenue le mois dernier :

CONSEIL PROVINCIAL D'HYGIÈNE,
PROVINCE DE QUÉBEC,
76, rue Saint-Gabriel,
MONTREAL, 24 mars 1888.

Extrait du procès-verbal de l'assemblée du 24 mars 1888.

Résolu : Que le Conseil Provincial d'Hygiène de Québec, après avoir pris communication d'un avis de motion de M. le Dr Fiset, M.P. pour Rimouski, devant les Communes, pour lundi prochain, relativement à l'importante question des quarantaines du Canada, saisis cette occasion de lui exprimer sa reconnaissance pour cet acte philanthropique, et pour réitérer au gouvernement ce qu'il lui a déjà communiqué, en le priant de vouloir prendre toute action qu'il croira juste pour protéger le plus efficacement possible notre population, après avoir reçu le rapport du comité, qui sera, elle l'espère, nommé à cet effet.

(Certifié,) ELZÉAR PELLETIER, Secrétaire.

Comme on le voit, M. l'Orateur, cette résolution du Conseil Provincial d'Hygiène de Québec est une approbation complète de la motion qui est maintenant devant la Chambre. Mais il y a plus, le Conseil Provincial d'Hygiène d'Ontario approuve aussi la démarche. Le 27 mars 1888, son secrétaire adressait au président du Conseil Provincial d'Hygiène de Québec, le Dr Lachapelle, la lettre suivante :

PROVINCIAL BOARD OF HEALTH,
TORONTO, ONT., 27th March, 1888.

MY DEAR SIR,—You will not have failed to have noticed that at the last meeting of this Board a report from the committee on epidemics was adopted, urging this Board to unite with your Board in pressing upon the Dominion authorities the urgent necessity there is for having Grosse Isle equipped, so that the good regulations of 1887 may be made practicable. I understand that there is danger of there being no grant made this year for a deep water wharf for making the work of disinfection possible; and as this is a sine qua non to rapid and effective work, without unnecessary delay, it is desirable that any influence that our united efforts can bring to bear, will be brought now, before the supplementary estimates are published. Will you have the matter brought before the Chairman and your Board, and let me know by telegraph what you will do, and if a deputation would meet us at Ottawa, and if so, at what date. Trusting that your Board is meeting with encouraging success in its work.

I have, &c.,

PETER H. BRYCE.

L'actif Dr Lachapelle a communiqué la substance de la présente motion à M. Bryce, dès le 29 mars dernier :

CONSEIL PROVINCIAL D'HYGIÈNE,
PROVINCE DE QUÉBEC,
76 rue St. Gabriel,
MONTREAL, 29th March, 1888.

PETER H. BRYCE, Esq.,
Provincial Board of Health, Toronto.

Are you aware of Dr. Fiset's motion, in the House of Commons, for special committee to enquire into quarantine service and best precautions to be taken, with power to examine persons of experience? Will it not be better to wait for action of that committee. Willing to join your efforts.

E. P. LACHAPELLE,
Chairman.

M. Bryce répondit comme suit par télégramme :

TORONTO, 29th March, 1888.

E. P. LACHAPELLE,
Chairman,
Provincial Board of Health,
Montreal.

Delighted at cooperation. Learned to-day of Fiset's motion for committee. Agree that it may be well to wait for a few days for developments.

PETER H. BRYCE.

J'ai encore l'approbation de l'honorable Dr Paquet, sénateur, lequel est aussi membre du Conseil d'Hygiène de la province de Québec. Mais il y a encore plus, cette motion reçoit l'appui des journaux du Dominion. Le Canadien, de Québec, renferme un article très fort dans ce sens. J'ai ici le Toronto Mail, du 2 avril, et avec la permission de la Chambre, je vais lire cet article qui est un peu long, mais qui est plein d'actualité :

"ST. LAWRENCE QUARANTINE"

"That the protection of the country against the introduction of contagious diseases through emigrants from Europe is a matter of the utmost importance needs no demonstration; and that the people of our ocean ports are fully alive to the great necessity which exists for taking every possible precaution against contagion is shown by the motion of which notice has been given in the House of Commons by Mr. Fiset, M. P. for Rimouski. His motion is as follows: "That a special committee be appointed to enquire into the manner in which the quarantine service of Canada is carried on; and also into the best precautions to be taken to prevent cases of contagious diseases from entering the country; with power to examine persons of experience in these matters. The said special committee to report to the House." We are glad that this matter has been brought up in Parliament, and have no doubt that the committee will be granted. It will afford an opportunity for bringing prominently before the House various matters which have been from time to time referred to in the press, and for directing the attention of our legislators to views which in Ontario have been frequently expressed in resolutions of the Provincial Board of Health, and in the neighbouring province in memorials adopted by the Boards of Trade of both Montreal and Quebec.

"The reasons why the people of the West should be as anxious about this matter as those of the St. Lawrence ports are apparent. In these days of "ocean grey-hounds" and short passages, it may very easily happen that a person exposed in some Liverpool lodging house or on shipboard to smallpox, will have reached Manitoba or the Western States before the disease, with its incubative period of two weeks, will have appeared. Our readers will not have forgotten the case referred to in the report of the Provincial Board for 1886, in which one batch of Russian immigrants caused outbreaks of smallpox on the Canadian Pacific steamers, at Sault Sainte-Marie, in Michigan, in Manitoba, and in Dakota, apparently by means of their clothing, which had been exposed on shipboard to the infection from companions left sick at Grosse Isle quarantine. The strong representations made that year to the Department of Agriculture resulted in new quarantine regulations, which were put into force in large measure in 1887. These demand inspection of every vessel entering the St. Lawrence; and the Grosse Isle station, thirty miles below Quebec, is admirably situated for the performance of this work. According to the resolutions passed by the Provincial Board of Ontario at its last meeting, and which appeared in the Mail at the time, it would appear, however, that for performing the work of inspection thoroughly, without a long delay of the steamers, it is necessary that the present wharf be extended into water deep enough at low tide to allow vessels of the largest tonnage to run alongside, instead of as at present, either having to be inspected by means of a steam-launch which runs out to them, or by their anchoring in mid-stream until high tide. This latter delay they cannot be expected to endure, while it appears that grave dangers, as well as difficulties, attend any attempt to fumigate large steamers by the sulphur-blast apparatus as at present operated from the deck of the steam-launch. If the wharf were extended the disinfectant batteries would be stationary upon it, while a rag-disinfectant and Troy laundry for disinfecting baggage and personal effects might be conveniently situated for prompt and effective use. Remembering the lamentable exhibition of want of preparation at the New York quarantine last year when a cholera ship made its appearance—which, had it occurred early in the season instead of in autumn, would almost certainly have resulted in an epidemic in that port and perhaps beyond it—we cannot afford to wait until either small-pox or cholera makes its appearance in the St. Lawrence to test the appliances at Grosse Isle for handling the hundreds of ships which annually come up the river. By all means let the enquiry be held, and, if defects still exist, we trust that, in the interests of national safety, they will be remedied, and every possible precaution taken to protect the cities and towns inland, along the lines of immigrant travel, as well as the Atlantic and St. Lawrence ports, from the introduction of epidemic disease, destructive of life and business alike."

Voici maintenant ce que dit le Chronicle de Québec qui, lui, a toujours été pour examen un sévère à la quarantaine :—

"We are glad to see by the telegraphic reports from Ottawa that there is a notice of motion now before the House of Commons for the appointment of a "Special Committee to enquire into the manner in which the Quarantine Service of Canada is carried on; and, also, into the best precautions to be taken to prevent cases of contagious diseases from entering into the country; with power to examine persons of experience in these matters. The said Special Committee to report to the House."

"We trust this committee will be accorded. And that they will, amongst other things, report to the House, in favour of the strong recommendations recently made by the Provincial Board of Health of Ontario, which appeared in our columns on the first of last month."

J'aurai l'occasion de lire le rapport du Bureau Provincial d'Hygiène d'Ontario. Il continue :

The Board urges that the Quarantine Station of the St. Lawrence be equipped with the modern appliances now recognized to be essential for the protection of the country. These are, to quote from their report: "Requisite buildings placed at the extreme end of the extended wharf for (a) Fumigating furnace, reservoir and exhaust fan; (b) For locating superheating chamber to 230° Fahr; (c) Boiler and steam connection therewith; (d) Troy laundry for disinfecting bedding, ship linen, mattresses, flags, curtains, carpets, rugs, all personal baggage and wearing apparel, which shall be removed from ships to this building for purposes of thorough disinfection."

Before the Quarantine Station can be equipped with these essential appliances, the wharf must be extended into deep water so as to receive them, and to enable vessels to come to it to discharge their passengers, &c., when necessary, and to be disinfected. The imperative necessity for this extension of the Quarantine wharf to meet the altered requirements of the present we have already urged upon the Government.

"This matter has also been the subject of strong memorials from the Boards of Trade of both Quebec and Montreal, based upon the representations of the shipping interest of those ports, which dreads the extra delay and demurrage from landing everything in ships' boats.

"Cholera is still threatening us from Europe and South America. Its sudden advent to New York last autumn is fresh in the memory of all, and has led to the thorough overhauling of the quarantine station there.

"With all these warnings pressing upon their attention on the Dominion Government will indeed be utterly without excuse if caught unprepared. And we therefore call upon them to place an amount in the supplementary estimates for the extension of the quarantine wharf into deep water, so that as quickly as possible it may be able to receive steamships when necessary and so that those disinfecting appliances may be placed upon it which are so essential for the protection of the country from epidemic disease."

Voilà donc trois journaux importants, le Canadien, le Mail de Toronto et le Chronicle qui tous concourent dans la motion que j'ai l'honneur de présenter.

After Recess.

M. Fiset: M. L'Orateur, lorsque j'ai terminé mes remarques à six heures, j'ai dit que mon intention n'était nullement de blâmer le département de l'agriculture. Je le répète, ce n'est pas une motion de censure que je propose; au contraire. Mais nous croyons, nous les médecins dans cette Chambre, que l'on peut toujours améliorer les choses. Je n'ai pas dit non plus que notre système de quarantaine était mauvais. Bien au contraire, j'ai dit qu'il était le second de l'Amérique; mais il est loin d'être parfait. J'ai cité plusieurs autorités pour démontrer l'importance du comité que je demande. Je vais faire encore une citation qui, je crois, achèvera de déterminer le gouvernement à accorder le comité que je sollicite. Voici ce que dit le Chronicle du 1er février 1888; il exprime d'abord la nécessité d'être prudent cette année, et il cite des résolutions passées au Bureau d'hygiène d'Ontario. Avant de citer ces résolutions, il dit :

"At the last meeting of the board, Dr. Gowernton, who like our own Dr. Montizambert, at this port, is an authority on sanitation and quarantine, read the report of committee on epidemic, which at this time, has an especial significance for us. The report deals in an ample manner, with the question of additional apparatus required for the more effectual exclusion of epidemic diseases at the gate of our Dominion, viz: Grosse Ile Quarantine Station. As the question is one in which every man, woman and child in our city and province are immediately interested, we republish it here. It reads thus :

Il serait peut-être trop long de lire tout ce rapport et j'en donnerai simplement la conclusion. La voici :

The report was adopted as read, and the following series of resolutions were proposed by Dr. Gowernton and seconded by Dr. Cassidy.

"Whereas the Provincial Board of Health of Ontario have reason for belief that the quarantine station at Grosse Isle would have great additional power in the work of protecting the inhabitants of our Dominion from the entrance of infectious diseases by certain additions to the very admirable provisions already in operation, be it resolved that the following additional enforcements be urged upon the Dominion Government, viz :

"1st. A steam launch or tug boat of sufficient size, strength and horse power for boarding in all weather, day and night, vessels in the offing waiting for clearance.

"2nd. Repair and extension of the western wharf sufficient for permitting vessels, on board of which during the voyage cholera or small-pox had occurred, to ride at anchor at low tide during the process of disinfection of such ships.

"3rd. Requisite buildings be placed at the extreme end of the extended wharf for (a) Fumigating furnace, reservoir and exhaust fan; (b) For locating superheating chamber to 230° Fahrenheit; (c) Boiler and steam connection therewith; (d) Troy laundry for disinfecting bedding, ship linen, mattresses, flags, curtains, carpets, rugs, all personal baggage and wearing apparel, which shall be removed from ships to this building for purposes of thorough disinfection.

4th. That as the present service is a day and night one for eight months in the year, and thus the medical superintendent and his assistant are debarred from practice, the salary of the superintendent should be an adequate one, as also that of his assistant.

5th. That at the meeting of the Association of Executive Health Officers of Ontario, convened for the 5th February next, the Members of this Provincial Board, or a committee thereof, shall bring this subject before said meeting and suggest the propriety of concerted action on this matter of guarding against epidemic disease.

6th. That the Chairman be authorized to appoint a committee from this board to interview the Department of Agriculture at Ottawa during the coming session of the House of Commons regarding the questions involved in the above resolutions, and that the Quebec Provincial Board of Health be invited to join with the committee of this board in the proposed interview.

Ainsi, vous le voyez, M. l'Orateur, ce n'est pas seulement un simple député de cette Chambre qui demande un gouvernement la formation d'un comité pour s'enquérir de la manière dont opèrent nos quarantaines, mais c'est le public en général, ce sont les médecins les plus distingués des provinces de Québec et d'Ontario, qui sollicitent comme moi la formation de ce comité. Il est bien vrai que le gouvernement a sans doute fait son devoir; mais il ne faut pas oublier qu'aujourd'hui nous avons un système bien perfectionné de désinfection. Nous avons des procédés tout nouveaux, et j'aime à croire que le gouvernement est au courant de ces nouvelles méthodes.

Il n'y a pas très longtemps même, au commencement du siècle, en 1825, on n'avait jusqu'à un certain point l'efficacité des quarantaines; je ne suis pas prêt à dire qu'on n'avait pas raison pour alors; on n'avait pas les moyens perfectionnés que nous avons aujourd'hui, et l'en n'en retirait pas les services auxquels on devait s'attendre. Elles ne produisaient pas les résultats désirés. Aujourd'hui, c'est tout-à-fait différent. Le système inauguré par le célèbre Joseph Holt, à la Louisiane, est sans contredit le système le plus parfait qui existe dans le monde entier. Nous savons tous que la Louisiane, et surtout la Nouvelle-Orléans, était regardée comme un endroit que les étrangers ne pouvaient visiter sans y prendre les fièvres jaunes; et depuis que ce système de Joseph Holt a été inauguré, la Nouvelle-Orléans n'est plus un foyer d'épidémie ; et, en effet, depuis cinq ans, il n'y a pas eu de fièvres jaunes dans la ville, ni dans les environs. Cet état sanitaire est dû aux grandes mesures de précautions qu'elle a prises.

Si on me le permet, je m'en vais expliquer le système suivi à la Nouvelle-Orléans.

Le Dr. Holt a établi trois stations de quarantaine : l'une à 110 milles de la Nouvelle-Orléans, l'autre à 103 milles, et la dernière à 70 milles. Lorsqu'un bâtiment arrive dans un port, le médecin qui est en charge de la quarantaine à la première station, se rend à bord, et il examine soigneusement le bâtiment ; s'il n'y trouve pas de maladies contagieuses, ou si le bâtiment ne vient pas d'un port infecté, il lui donne immédiatement son certificat, et le bâtiment remonte jusqu'à la Nouvelle-Orléans.

Si le bâtiment vient d'un port infecté, mais qu'il n'y ait pas de maladie à bord et que son record est bon, alors il est envoyé à la première station, c'est-à-dire à celle qui est à 70 milles de la Nouvelle-Orléans ; bien qu'il n'y ait pas de maladie à bord. On retient le bâtiment en quarantaine pendant quelques jours, mais jamais plus de cinq jours, et pendant ce temps on lui fait subir toutes les opérations de la désinfection.

Si, au contraire, le bâtiment est infecté, alors on télégraphie immédiatement à la station supérieure, et de là on envoie un vaisseau prendre ce bâtiment et le conduire à la station qui est à 103 milles ; et là, on lui fait subir une désinfection complète. Ce n'est pas tout, on sépare les malades des gens qui sont en santé, et on les envoie à la station voisine, c'est-à-dire à celle qui se trouve à 70 milles de la Nouvelle-Orléans. Là, encore, on leur fait subir une nouvelle désinfection, sans toutefois les retenir longtemps, et enfin on leur donne un certificat qui leur permet de remonter le Mississippi. Grâce à ces précautions, la Nouvelle-Orléans est aujourd'hui une ville très salubre, il y a moins de maladie que dans nos villes du Canada.

On remarquera, M. l'Orateur, que toutes ces dépenses de quarantaine, — qui doivent être considérables, — sont supportées par un Etat seul, par la Louisiane. Ici, c'est bien différent, nos quarantaines sont entretenues aux frais du Dominion, et c'est ce qui leur donne leur supériorité sur celles des Etats-Unis. Le gouvernement du Canada est chargé des quarantaines de toutes les provinces, les dépenses étant supportées par toutes les provinces, la charge est bien moins lourde pour chacune d'elles et moins considérable en son entier.

Je dois dire de suite, à la louange du personnel de la quarantaine de la Grosse-Isle, et surtout de celui qui en est à la tête, — lequel est un ami personnel, un homme que j'estime beaucoup, — qu'ils sont tous des officiers supérieurs.

Je crois que le directeur de la quarantaine à la Grosse-Isle serait heureux de partager la responsabilité qui lui incombe avec un bureau de santé.

Déjà, les provinces de Québec et d'Ontario ont leur bureau de santé respectifs. Pourquoi le Dominion n'aurait-il pas son bureau de santé qui partagerait la responsabilité avec le médecin de la Grosse-Isle ? Est-il juste de laisser peser sur ses épaules toute la responsabilité de l'entrée des épidémies dans le Dominion ? Je suis convaincu que le Dr Montizambert verrait avec plaisir la formation d'un tel bureau.

M. l'Orateur, je sais parfaitement que les steamers portant les malles sont obligés d'arrêter à Rimouski pour y subir une première inspection. S'il y a quelque maladie contagieuse à bord, on les envoie à la quarantaine ; mais je vous prie de remarquer qu'il n'y a que les steamers qui portent la malle. Eh bien ! à Rimouski, avons-nous les garanties suffisantes ? je ne le crois pas. Nous avons bien un inspecteur, mais il est seul. Il va, à bord de son petit tug boat, à la rencontre des steamers qui viennent d'Angleterre chargés d'émigrants, — comme de raison, il n'en arrive pas dans ce moment-ci, mais il en arrive à New-York en plus grand nombre que jamais, — il fait son inspection. Mais cet homme-là est bien obligé de revenir à terre, et avec le faible salaire qu'il reçoit, peut-il faire son travail comme il faut ? De plus, quand même il le voudrait, il n'a pas, à Rimouski, les moyens de désinfection. Voilà donc encore un point sur lequel j'attire l'attention du gouvernement car, qu'on le remarque bien, il n'y a pas seulement les steamers qui portent la malle, il y a plusieurs lignes de steamers sur le Saint-Laurent.

Maintenant si comme à la Louisiane, nous avions, non pas trois stations, mais deux, nous aurions un système beaucoup plus parfait. Il est vrai que cela entraînerait des dépenses, mais quand il s'agit de la santé publique, cela vaut bien la peine que l'on fasse des dépenses pour organiser un système de quarantaine aussi complet que possible.

J'ai été informé que cette année le gouvernement se proposait de faire quelques dépenses pour améliorer le système de quarantaine. Quant à faire des dépenses, pourquoi ne pas organiser parfaitement de suite notre service. J'ignore encore si le gouvernement partage mes vues. J'ignore s'il va accorder ma motion. Dans tous les cas j'aurai fait mon devoir, et je dis que si le gouvernement se substitue au comité que nous demandons, je crois qu'il a tort. Après tout, puisque les Etats Américains et les gouvernements provinciaux prennent la peine de se décharger d'une telle responsabilité, en l'imposant à un bureau de santé dans chaque province, pourquoi le gouvernement fédéral refuserait-il les lumières de gens expérimentés qui pourraient être entendus devant le comité. Ce n'est pas une question de dépenses qui doit effrayer le gouvernement. Il n'y aura pas un grand nombre de personnes entendues devant le comité, mais le public et cette Chambre n'ont-ils pas le droit d'être renseignés sur les garanties que nous offre notre quarantaine pour empêcher l'introduction des maladies contagieuses dans le pays ? Le public n'a-t-il pas le droit d'être renseigné sur les moyens dont on se sert pour le protéger ? Quand le public sera parfaitement rassuré, quand il saura que le gouvernement fait tout en son pouvoir, qu'il prend toutes les mesures nécessaires pour prévenir l'introduction des maladies épidémiques dans le Dominion, ce sera la moitié de gagné. Un patient qui a confiance en son médecin est à moitié sauvé.

Eh bien ! M. l'Orateur, pour ces raisons j'espère que le gouvernement considérant mes bonnes intentions, considérant le bien que le public en retirera, accordera la motion que je propose.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has introduced the subject in a very proper way before this House, and I have no doubt he has presented a good deal of information to hon. members as well as to the Minister of Agriculture. I think the hon. gentleman should rest satisfied with the statement he has made and withdraw the motion, because the proposition is really casting a censure upon the quarantine system which now prevails. I think the hon. gentleman does not pretend to find special fault in regard to the quarantine system as it now obtains in Canada. I believe it is very well managed, very skilfully managed and carefully looked after, and the immunity from disease has resulted from the watchful manner in which it has been carried out and shows that the system has worked well. Like every human organisation it may be improved, and the Government, especially the Minister at the head of this branch, will consider well the statements made by the hon. gentleman, and perhaps it may be that some of the suggestions made by the hon. gentleman will, on full examination, meet the approbation and thanks of the government and the head of that special department. If this should be the case the Government will, of course, adopt them. In the meantime I ask the hon. gentleman to be satisfied with the statement he has made, and with having submitted information to the House and to the Government and the country, and not press his motion further.

Mr. LAURIER. I am sure my hon friend has no intention of censuring the Government by making this motion or in any statements he has made; but if he has done nothing more than draw the attention of the Government to this very important subject, the House will be indebted to him for the statements he has made. I must, with justice to the Minister of Agriculture, say that he is doing his very best, I am sure, to discharge the important duties of this branch of his department, but at the same time the system is perhaps capable of improvement, as my hon. friend has already stated. I agree with the First Minister that perhaps my hon friend will allow the matter to rest here and leave the matter with the Government, and if there is any responsibility the Government must assume it.

Motion withdrawn.

NORTHUMBERLAND STRAITS SUBWAY.

Mr. PERRY moved for :

Copy of report of engineers and surveyors appointed to survey the Straits of Northumberland from Carleton Point, Prince Edward Island, to Cape Jourimain, New Brunswick, during the summer of 1887, with the view of ascertaining the practicability of building a subway across the Straits.

He said: I desire to direct the attention of the House to the fact that this question has been brought before Parliament on previous occasions, I am sorry to say with the same results each time, and that is the adoption of a doing-nothing policy. Nothing tangible has yet been done, and no attempt has yet been made to carry out the arrangement made between Canada and Prince Edward Island, at the time of Confederation. It is well known that years ago this question engaged the attention of the Local Legislature of Prince Edward Island, and as far back as two years ago a deputation composed of the leading members of the Island Government were sent to England with these complaints, and with an address to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty would interfere and compel the terms entered into at Confederation to be carried out by Canada. Nothing so far has been done. Yet the summer following, I believe, surveys were made for a subway from Cape Traverse on the island side to Cape Tormentine, and the report of the surveyors and engineers is rather favorable to the practicability of building a subway across the straits. From my place last Session I had the privilege of asking the Government if it was their intention to cause further surveys to be made, and the First Minister who leads this House answered simply no, that it was not the intention to cause any further survey. This question was asked in view of the letter which the right hon. gentleman had written about a week and a half before the general election to Senator Howlan, of Prince Edward Island, no doubt with a view to influence the elections at that time. The hon. gentleman in his place stated that he really wrote that letter in answer to a letter from Senator Howlan, but the face of the letter itself conveys a contradictory view, because it is in answer to our conversation. I believed the hon. gentleman at the time when he wrote that letter was in earnest, but I now find he is not in earnest, that he has no fixed policy with regard to carrying out the terms of Confederation with the island any more than the Government of the day have in regard to reciprocity between Canada and the United States. At one time the right hon. gentleman said we shall not have further surveys made, and yet last summer we were told there were surveys made from Carleton Point on the island, about two miles west of Cape Traverse, to Cape Jourimain, in New Brunswick, about one and three-quarters or two miles west of Cape Tormentine. I am told that this report is a very favorable one. I have not seen it, but I have seen a sketch of it in the Conservative press, in the Summerside Journal and the Daily Examiner of Charlottetown, papers which are no doubt in the confidence of the Government and papers which support the Government. But nothing has yet been done; the Government have not decided in the matter. On going a little further into this question I find that the delegation sent from Prince Edward Island to Her Majesty had to face the opposition of the hon. Finance Minister, at that time Canada's High Commissioner in England. He gave the delegate of the island all the opposition that his eloquence could give on that occasion. But, Sir, I think he is bound down by his own statement of the policy with regard to this subway and that he is bound to carry it out. Now, Sir, here are the words of the hon. gentleman on that occasion :

"Messrs. Sullivan and Ferguson admit in a subsequent paragraph that the island has prospered as they put it 'notwithstanding the inaction of the Dominion Government.' This statement, in view of what has already been stated, may be left to take care of itself; but the object of their representation appears to be to secure the laying of a metallic subway across the straits of Northumberland, through which the railway communication could be effected, 'the cost of which undertaking,' Messrs. Sullivan and Ferguson say, 'would not exceed a sum which it would not be unreasonable to ask the Government of Canada to expend.' If it can be shown that such a work is practicable, that it can be constructed for a reasonable outlay and maintained without a large expense, the matter seems to be one that may fairly be placed before the Canadian Government for consideration."

I do say that the island has prospered notwithstanding all the obstacles thrown in the way of its prosperity by the Dominion Government not carrying out the agreement. I am not here prepared to say that the island did not prosper. We do not come here to beg from the Government, but we simply want what is due the people of our Province and what the Government by solemn contract has promised. I suppose they are waiting for the island people to threaten rebellion and I suppose it is the only practical way we can get our rights. Are we to have instances of this kind from day to day and from week to week? Here in this extract which I have read we have the High Commissioner binding himself and binding the Government of the day to carry out their promise and I want the Government to pronounce upon this question. Now I would like to ask the Government how far they have gone in the consideration of this matter? I suppose they will tell us that they had a survey in 1886, that they have had another survey in 1887 and that they had an Act before Parliament two years ago incorporating a company to build this subway. I am told, and I have reason to know that a Company has offered the Government to build that subway provided the Government gives them a certain amount of subsidy. That subsidy is asked for Prince Edward Island in order to enable the Government to carry out the terms of Confederation, but yet we are told that Prince Edward Island has no subsidy to get. When a subsidy is required in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec or Ontario, there is any amount of money to be got for subsidies in these Provinces, but there is nothing for Prince Edward Island, even though it is to enable the Government to carry out a sacred compact made with the people of Prince Edward Island at the time of Confederation. They tell us, when we ask our just rights, that there is no money for a work of great magnitude that is necessary to enable the Government to carry out the terms of Confederation with that Province. We heard a great deal about loyalty the other day, and let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, and let me tell this House, and let me tell the Government more particularly, that the people of Prince Edward Island are loyal subjects to Her Majesty Queen Victoria. They are loyal subjects, but I am sorry to say I would not vouch much for their loyalty to the present Government until they carry out the promises made at Confederation. Sit in another little corner of this document, when the High Commissioner on that occasion is introducing the delegates from Prince Edward Island to Earl Granville, he says:

"Messrs. Sullivan and Ferguson conclude their rejoinder by saying: 'With regard to the claim for compensation by reason of the non-fulfilment of the terms of Confederation the undersigned submit that a review of the facts adduced will conclusively show that the island has suffered great loss, and is therefore entitled to indemnity.' In the first place it is incorrect to say that the terms of Confederation have not been complied with."

I would like to ask this House if the terms of Confederation have been complied with in this case? Sir Charles Tupper, the High Commissioner, says that the terms of Confederation have been applied in every other case. That is doubtful. It is an assertion which may admit of argument, but the fact remains that the terms of Confederation have not been complied with so far as Prince Edward Island is concerned, and that the Government has not made even a decent effort to carry out the terms of Confederation with that Province is an established fact. It is a fact that since 1873 the terms of Confederation have not been fulfilled on the part of the Government of Canada to the people of Prince Edward Island. Sir, I contend that the people of Prince Edward Island are not in a position to keep up with the progress of the rest of the Dominion; that they are not in direct communication with the Dominion, that we are now for three months without having steam communication from the island to the mainland, and we have to drag our bodies the best way we can in those open boats. The Government have not half the requirements necessary to carry passengers across the straits and we have to use half a dozen boats exclusive of the Government boats in order to carry those passengers from one side to the other. Is that what the people of that Province ought to expect? Is that what the people of New Brunswick ought to expect from the Government which renders it impossible for them to visit their neighbors across the straits of Northumberland? Is that what the travelling agents of the manufacturers of Ontario ought to expect from the Government that they are not able to cross the straits and offer their samples to their good customers of Prince Edward Island? Is this the way the Government intend to redeem and carry out their solemn pledge to the people of Prince Edward Island? If there was one thing more than another that induced the people of the island to enter Confederation it was upon the solemn promise that the Government had their right hand held out to assist them. They entered Confederation because they relied upon the promise made by the Government that they were to have continuous communication between the island and the mainland. This was the promise that induced them particularly to join Confederation. What has the result been? Up to this day the people of the island have been neglected and the promises made them have not been carried out. Up to this day when they ask the Government to carry out the terms of Confederation they are told "we have no money." I am here to state to hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, to the Government, and particularly to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries—and no one knows better than he does, if he knows anything at all—that the terms of Confederation have not been carried out, and that not even an attempt has been made in this direction. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries appears to know very little about the navigation between the island and the mainland. He appears to not even know how many trips the steamers make there in the year. When I found fault with the Government for having paid a large amount of money to the steamer Neptune, and when I asked them about the matter in Parliament last year that gentleman defended the action of the Government and stated that the steamer Neptune had plied across the straits two and a-half months. What does the return of his own Department show? It shows that that steamer commenced to cross on the 28th December and made her first trip, and that she made her last trip on the 4th of February. Yet the hon. gentleman said that the steamer crossed for two months and a-half. Does he call that two months and a-half? His words are in black and white in the Hansard. It is a good thing we have a Hansard in this Parliament in order to hold the hon. gentleman to his words. This shows all the hon. gentleman knows about his department, but I suppose he will not deny his own return, which shows that his statement was not correct, but that he was astray a month and a-half. Well, Sir, the Earl of Granville was aware that the people of the island desired to induce the Dominion Government to carry out the terms with Prince Edward Island. On that subject Earl Granville said:

"I explained to them that the Queen had no power, either by statute or otherwise under the Constitution of Canada, to give any direction in this matter, and that, therefore, I should not be able to advise Her Majesty (who has been pleased to receive the Address very graciously) to take any action upon it, but that it would give me much satisfaction if, by the exercise of any friendly offices which I could tender, I should be able to contribute to the settlement of a question in which the Provincial Government were so much interested. I added that I had confidence in the friendly spirit in which the matter at issue would be dealt with on both sides, and this led me to hope that some acceptable arrangement might be come to."

I would like to ask the Government if they have made one decent attempt to carry out these suggestions? Earl Granville winds up by saying:

"It would reflect great credit on the Dominion Government if, after connecting British Columbia with the Eastern Provinces by the Canadian Pacific Railway, it should now be able to complete its system of railway communication by an extension to Prince Edward Island."

But, Sir, all these good offices on the part of Earl Granville have been disregarded by the present Government. I suppose we may be told that they will do something to-morrow; but to-morrow never comes with these gentlemen so far as Prince Edward Island is concerned, and I am afraid it is not going to come for some years yet. Now, if the Dominion Government intend to carry out the terms of Confederation, I hope they will take steps to do so without any further delay. They have had two surveys across the straits, and we know that an effort has been made by a company to build that subway provided a subsidy is given. During the last Parliament one of the Senators, I think Senator Howlan, stated in the Senate Chamber that not a member from the island had said anything in his place in favor of that subway. I am here to contradict that statement. The Hansard will prove that every member from Prince Edward Island who spoke on the question spoke forcibly in favor of the terms being carried out by the building of the subway if it was practicable. It say that was a wrong statement to make; it was done, I suppose, with the view of making it appear that the members from Prince Edward Island, because they belonged to the Grit party, were not favorable to the welfare of the island. We find that on nomination day the hon. Minister of Finance telegraphed to Hon. Donald Ferguson, who was a candidate in the interest of the Government, to say that the Government were desirous of carrying out the work of the subway. What does that mean? Does it mean anything or nothing? There was one thing it meant, that was, to defeat the Liberal candidate. It had not the effect of doing that, but it had the effect of showing that the Government failed to carry out the solemn promises they had made. The hon. Minister of Finance further telegraphed to Mr. Ferguson as follows:—

"On the platform on nomination day I came out very strongly in support of connecting Prince Edward Island with the rest of the Dominion."

I suppose he meant by steam. He left out the word steam, but I do not see any other way of making the connection. The climax was his last telegram, as follows:—

"It is necessary, in the interest of the Government, that the island should send a united phalanx to support the Government."

No doubt, in the interest of the Government, but not in the interest of Prince Edward Island. Taking all these things into consideration, I think the people of Prince Edward Island had a right to expect that the Government were sincere and were determined to carry out the terms of Confederation with respect to the island. No doubt they are very comfortable on the Treasury benches, because they are not so unfortunate as the poor farmers and the poor fishermen, because they get their $8,000 a year without having to pay a single cent of taxation. I can tell them that if they expect the people of the island to be contented and happy, and to consider themselves as part and parcel of the Dominion of Canada, they must carry out the terms of Confederation. The people of Prince Edward Island, although they are only few in numbers, are not to be despised. They are British subjects; they are descendants of people who have fought for their rights and liberty; they are descendants of people who have exterminated the landlords who had no right to the soil; and the Government are almost tempting the people of the island to go back to their previous position. I am here to state what the people of the island have a right to get and what they have not got, and I state it above board. I hope the Government will lose no time in laying upon the Table this report of the surveyors, commissioners and engineers, and I believe it will warrant the Government to commence operations, and subsidise that company to build the subway with as little delay as possible. I am told that a company is now exploring the straits between West Point, P. E. I., and Richibucto Head, with a view of establishing continuous steam navigation there. Is the Government not cognisant of this fact? Are they so ignorant of the condition and welfare of the people of Prince Edward Island as not to know that this is going on? I suppose I will be answered one of those days that they know nothing about it and care just as little. But, as I said before, I hope the Government will take warning; I hope that they will go to work and that there will be no to-morrow policy in this matter, but a policy of immediate advance. I hope they will show by their action that they are in earnest, for they have had sufficient surveys made there to know whether it is possible to build a subway or not; and if the reports are such that the Government will be warranted in building the subway, if the scheme is practicable, and the cost is not beyond a reasonable figure—and according to Messrs. Ferguson and Sullivan the island was entitled years ago to $5,000,000 for the neglect of the Government in carrying out the terms of Confederation—the Government should not lose any more time. There is nothing now to cross the straits with. The Northern Light has been fast in the ice for over three months, and is not fit to make a trip when the ice is in any way strong. The Government know this, and yet they have the audacity to tell us she is the best boat they can get. Years ago, when she was new they ran her down, but now, when she is wrecked like their own policy, she is the best they can get for the work. I suppose we will be told that the people of Prince Edward Island are not entitled to any consideration because they have sent here six men in Opposition. Well, the six men are British subjects and white men, men who have a right to be here, men who were sent here by well-to-do constituents, and constituents who are not of the character which the hon. member for Annapolis gave to his constituents. I was amused to hear him say the other day that to his constituents books and papers were a luxury; and I dare say if they read more than they do, they would send somebody else here to represent them besides that hon. gentleman. The people of the island are a reading people, and what is better they have common sense and a good spirit as to their rights. Their rights they must get, if not from this Government, I hope from the next, and I trust the time will not be long before we have another Government.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I thought the hon. Minister of Public Works might have taken advantage of the occasion to state to the House and the country whether any other arrangements have been made for carrying on the construction of a public wharf at Cape Tormentine, a contract for which the hon. gentleman entered into some years ago. The hon. gentleman knows that three or four years ago a sum of money was voted for the construction of a railway from Cape Traverse to connect with the main trunk line on the island, with the object of building a very long pier or wharf there, and another on the New Brunswick side, in order finally to have a steam ferry there in the summer months, and, when possible, in the winter months, the wharf was built on the island side. I dare say the hon. gentleman has some report on the work and is aware it requires completion. On the New Brunswick side a contract was entered into some years ago, and the work was commenced, but after a hundred yards was partially constructed the contractors abandoned the work altogether, and it is now lying in a dilapidated condition which is really pitiable and humiliating. Is it the intention of the Government to prosecute vigorously that work the coming summer, or have they made up their minds to abandon it altogether? I thought it was possible, in view of the important promises which the hon. the Minister of Finance made just previous to the last elections, that he would consider most favorably the construction of a subway, and in view of the letter which the leader of the Government wrote to the people, saying that a survey would be made of the straits to ascertain whether the construction of a subway was practicable, that the hon. gentleman might have abandoned the construction of this pier for the larger scheme. Of course, if he has, from information that the work is impracticable, come to that conclusion, I will only be too glad to support him, but if not, I will be glad to learn that the old scheme is to be carried out and prosecuted vigorously. I can only express my regret that the hon. the Minister of Marine is not in his place, because I would like very much, after the speech of my hon. friend with reference to the communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, to have heard from him what action the department has taken with the view of constructing another boat to supplement the Northern Light. I heard it casually stated that they were going to spend a large sum of money on the steamer Alert, and was very glad to hear that contradicted by somebody who professes to know, because I wish to express as strongly as I can my disapprobation of such a course. I have heard it rumored since that the department are about to call for tenders for the construction of a larger and better boat to supplement the Northern Light. I hope that rumor is true. I was in hopes we would have had an official statement made to night by the hon. the Minister of Marine, because after the plain, practical and convincing statements made by my hon. friend, based as they are upon historical facts and upon the declaration made by the High Commissioner to Earl Granville as to the intention of the Government, and upon the suggestion which Earl Granville made to this Government, I hoped we would have heard to-night what the policy of the Government is. I think my hon. friend has made out a complete case, and has put the House in full possession of the facts, and I do think our long-suffering people are entitled to have their grievances in this very serious matter removed. We have been year after year pressing this matter, and I am sure the House does not want me to go over the old story, and I am not going to do it again to-night, because my hon. friend has anticipated me and has put the points better than I could, but I do hope to have some assurance from the Minister in reference to that wharf, and, if he can give it in the absence of the Minister of Marine, some information as to the action of the Department of Marine in reference to the construction of another steamboat.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I was about to rise just now, when I saw the hon. gentleman wished to say a few words, and I thought it better he should speak first so that I might answer both gentlemen—the mover of the resolution (Mr. Perry) and the member for Queen's (Mr. Davies)—at the same time. In answer to the last question of the hon. gentleman, I may say that the contract for the wharf or pier at Cape Tormentine was broken by the Government because the contractor did not proceed with the work quickly and evidently could not go on. Under those circumstances we called for new tenders, and have given a new contract. The contract has been signed, and I understand that the contractors are men who are quite able to perform the work, which will be proceeded with with all due vigor.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) Will the hon. gentleman state who they are?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I do not remember now. When the Estimates comes on, I shall be able to give the names. As to the boat, I cannot positively say, but, as far as I recollect, the intention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is to provide a new boat. In reference to the remarks of the mover of the motion, I may say, first, that there will be no objection to bring down the papers, and second, that the survey made in 1886 was communicated to the House and hon. gentlemen know what was the result of that survey. The hon. gentleman complains that no work has been done in the direction of constructing a subway. I do not suppose he expected that we would proceed in that way. He knew, and I think the hon. gentleman who spoke last stated, that the Minister of Finance had made a statement that we would give our attention to that work, and that we would have new explorations made to see whether the work was a feasible one or not. Well, I am glad to say that the last survey, which was made in July and August, 1887, has given a much better result than the first survey of 1886, and, if we go on in that way, improving all the time, we shall find the distance very small.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) By the next election.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I did not say that. The hon. gentleman says so, and I am glad to hear him fix a date, because the Government of course will thus know the wishes of hon. gentlemen on the other side. The engineer in the month of August took a series of borings in a line from Carleton Point to a point in New Brunswick, I think Munsey Point. The greatest depth of water found is ninety-one feet, the bottom is more favorable than on the line of soundings taken in 1886, and the distance is six and a half miles, which is one and a half miles less than on the line of borings taken in 1886. That shows that, as I said, if we go on in that way, we shall find the distance very small, and I think that in any case this result is much more favorable and must please hon. gentlemen so far, at all events, as far as the survey goes, as it shows that, if the matter has been left over for a year to obtain new soundings and new measurements, the time has not been lost in vain, that we have obtained a much better line by this survey than we had in 1886. I have no objection to the granting of the motion.

Mr. DAVIES. I would like to be permitted to ask the hon. gentleman whether the result of the survey has been so satisfactory as to induce him to believe it to be right and proper that he should propose a subsidy or a vote to the House to carry the work out, either by means of a company or by Government contract.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am afraid that is a question which I cannot answer immediately. I think it is one of those questions that must be left to the consideration of the Government, and the hon. gentleman may be sure, after the surveys which we have made, that the Government will give to the matter their best consideration.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) I fear we cannot hope for anything in the supplementaries?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That is a pleasure left for the hon. gentleman to discover.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Have the Government any offers from any company to build a subway for any particular sum?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am not aware. There may have been some offer of that kind in the Railway Department, but I am not in a position to answer that definitely.

Motion agreed to.

NEWFOUNDLAND AND CONFEDERATION.

Mr. LAURIER moved for:

Copies of all correspondence exchanged between the Government of Canada and the Government of Newfoundland concerning the admission of Newfoundland into the Confederation.

He said: I have no intention to comment on the subject at this moment. My only object is to have as soon as possible before the House the papers on that important question.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I hope the hon. gentleman will not insist upon his motion after what I shall say. This matter is now engaging the attention of the Government, and, as the hon. gentleman will see from the newspapers that a delegation is coming to Canada about this matter, we think the public interest would not allow us to lay this correspondence now before Parliament.

Mr. LAURIER. If I understand from the hon. gentleman that the correspondence is still going on, that it is not yet in a fit condition to be published, I will not press my motion.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is not.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The Minister, I suppose, has no objections to inform us when he expects the delegation to arrive, and perhaps he might give us the names of the gentlemen, if he has been made acquainted with them in advance.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am not able to give the names of the gentlemen who will form the delegation, nor the precise date of their coming to Canada, but I suppose it will be about the end of this month.

Mr. MITCHELL. Perhaps the hon. gentleman could tell us whether the Parliament of Newfoundland has authorised the delegation, or whether their Parliament has given any authority to a delegation to come here.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am not able to give that information.

Motion withdrawn.

MEMBER INTRODUCED.

The following member, having previously taken the oath according to law, and subscribed the Roll containing the same, took his seat in the House:

DAVID BISHOP MEIGS, member for the Electoral District of Missisquoi, introduced by Hon. Mr. Laurier and Mr. Fisher.

ASSISTANCE TO WRECKING VESSELS.

Mr. EDGAR moved for:

Copies of all papers, &c., with reference to— 1. The refusal of the United States authorities to allow Canadian wrecking vessels and machinery to assist Canadian vessels while in distress in United States waters. 2. The refusal of the Canadian authorities to allow United States wrecking vessels and machinery to assist United States vessels while in distress in Canadian waters.

He said: There is a Bill before the House standing, I think, for its second reading, introduced by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick), which relates closely to this subject, and I sincerely hope the hon. member will press his Bill, and that it will receive the support of both sides of this House. His Bill is to permit maritime vessels to aid vessels which are wrecked or disabled in Canadian waters. I suppose that that Bill would not have been introduced by that hon. gentleman unless the Canadian authorities had hitherto prevented American vessels from aiding wrecked or disabled vessels in Canadian waters. I have no doubt, however, that the reason why the Canadian authorities took this exceeding harsh line was because the American Government prevented Canadian vessels from assisting vessels which were wrecked in American waters. I think it will be of considerable advantage to this House, in the consideration of the Bill to which I have referred, if these papers are brought down, so much, at least, as the Government feel at liberty to bring down, and I hope they will bring them all down. The motion refers not only to correspondence and Departmental Orders in Council with reference to the refusal of the United States authorities to allow Canadian wrecking vessels and machinery to assist vessels in American waters, but also for the refusal of the Canadian authorities to do so, so that we will have both features of the case before us when we have these papers. I have no doubt, as I said before, that the Canadian authorities could not have adopted the harsh measures which they have in this matter, and which are to be cured by this Bill, unless the Americans had done the same, but I find in the United States Congress they do not take exactly that view of the case. They seem to think that the Canadian Government has acted much more harshly towards them than they have acted towards the Canadian Government. However, the papers will show how that is. But in order to show the House the view that is taken of the matter on the other side, I will refer to a resolution which was introduced into the House of Representatives by Mr. Nutting, early in the month of February. In that resolution it is recited:

"Whereas, it is alleged that the Canadian authorities for years have refused, and now refuse to allow American wrecking vessels and machinery to assist American vessels while in distress in Canadian canals and waters."

So far, I take it, he must be correct, or else the Bill of the hon. member for Frontenac would not be necessary. He then goes on to make his allegation, which I confess, I very much doubt, but he says:

"And it is alleged further that Canadian wrecking vessels and machinery have been, and now are allowed to come into American waters and assist any vessel there in distress."

Now, whether that is so or not, we will perhaps find out when this correspondence is brought down. But he quotes a couple of letters from American vessel owners and captains which show certainly the great hardship to them of the practice of the two Governments. One is a letter from Oswego, dated 1st February, 1888, by Mr. John K. Pope. He says:

"On or about the 30th day of September, 1881, I, being controlling owner of steam-barge Thompson Kingsford, was notified that she was ashore at Wellington, Ont., and immediate assistance was needed. I informed our wrecker, Mr. Allan, who expressed himself ready to start, providing the Canadian authorities would give him permission to work in their waters. I therefore applied by wire to the hon. Minister of Marine at Ottawa, and after a long delay was informed that the assistance needed could be procured at Kingston, and the application was denied. I thought the treatment was severe, especially as my tugs were all ready to go, and we could have got the barge out of danger in 24 hours. As it was, during the delay, or rather by the delay, in waiting for an answer, she was subjected to a severe gale, causing great damage and eventually costing us about $1,200 more than it would if we could have done the work ourselves. Again, about the 19th day of August, 1882, the same barge was sunk in the Bay of Quinté by collision, and I again made application to go to her relief with my own appliances, and was again refused."

Then another letter was quoted by Mr. Nutting, which was sent to him by Albert Quonce, also of Oswego, dated 1st February, 1888, in which Mr. Quonce stated:

"At the suggestion of Mr. Allan I make the following statement: On or about the 3rd day of November, 1882, the schooner Camanche, of which I was controlling owner, was sunk in the Welland Canal, near Port Colborne. Although Buffalo was but twenty miles from her and assistance could have been secured in six hours, we were told that American assistance would not be permitted, although at that moment the steam pumps were loaded and ready to come. The result was we had to wait for assistance from Amherstburg, nearly three hundred miles distant, and causing a delay of three days. Owing to the delay the vessel's cargo swelled and sprung her entire deck up, and almost ruined the vessel."

These statements will show the view taken on the other side, of our harsh law, and I am sure if we can do anything to secure an improvement for the sake of common humanity as well as for the sake of commercial friendship with the United States, the Government will hasten to bring down these returns so that, if possible, we may have them before us when considering the Bill of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick).

Mr. BOWELL. I would suggest that in the first paragraph the words "not already brought down," be inserted after the words "departmental orders." Some years ago a large amount of correspondence was laid before the House, and I do not suppose it is necessary to duplicate the return.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Was the return printed?

Mr. BOWELL. I think it was; I know it was, because I have a copy of the printed return on the table in my office.

Mr. EDGAR. When was the return made.

Mr. BOWELL. I am not sure, I cannot say the year, but I can furnish the information. However, all the correspondence and orders made in regard to this subject will be brought down, other than those which have already been laid before the House. I might state in connection with this subject that much of the complaint made by hon. gentlemen in Congress and also made in the American newspapers by those engaged in the wrecking and tugging business in the United States, is not based altogether upon facts. I may add in addition that the first order that was issued refusing to allow American tugs and wreckers to operate in our waters was issued by my predecessor when Mr. Mackenzie was leading the Government of the country; and further that instead of the present Government having adopted, in the language of the hon. gentlemen opposite, harsh and almost inhuman measures and enforced them, the orders have been materially modified since I have had the honor of being at the head of the Customs Department, and in no case in my recollection where a vessel has been what is termed in actual distress have American vessels or American appliances, whether pumps, tugs or wrecking appliances, been refused, and it has been done only in cases where there have been absolute wrecks, such as those referred to by the hon. gentleman and by Mr. Pope, of Oswego, where a vessel has actually sunk and very little damage would accrue to the hull or any portion of it until Canadian assistance could be procured. Take for instance the case to which the hon. gentleman has referred and to which Mr. Pope, of Oswego, referred. That case was one in which the appliances, which were ready to go to the aid of that crew from Kingston, could have reached the vessel just as soon as appliances which were in Oswego, and in fact much sooner, because the vessel was on our shore; but the fact was that the vessel that had been wrecked belonged to parties in Oswego who have their own appliances and who wished to save the expense attending the employment of a Canadian wrecker. Whether reciprocity in wrecking shall be adopted is a subject which will come more pertinently before the House when the Bill presented by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) is under discussion. If the hon. gentleman who has taken the trouble to read the charges made against the Canadian Government had read the correspondence which was lately laid before Congress, which occurred between the authorities there and the owners of the Algoma, which was wrecked on Isle Royale, at the head of Lake Superior, he would then have ascertained clearly what the policy and what the conduct of the American Government were when application was made by Canadians to use their own wrecking appliances in order to save life and property. It would place quite a different view upon the statements made by the hon. gentleman who spoke in Congress on the subject lately. I do not desire at present to go into this matter any further. The papers will be brought down, and it will be found that wherever applications have been made on behalf of American owners of vessels in distress where there perhaps was a probability by the immediate use of American appliances of saving either life or property or of preventing the wreck of a vessel on shore going to pieces, they have inevitably been granted, and in no instance where application has been made has any other answer been given than that if Canadians appliances cannot be procured, then American appliances may be used. I am sorry to say the same course has not been pursued in all cases by the American Government towards this country. I might mention further that the Americans after the issue of the Order in Council preventing Americans from wrecking and tugging in connection with wrecked vessels in Canada by the late Government, a few years after when it was enforced by the present Government the United States passed an Act offering reciprocity in wrecking and tugging so far as wrecking is concerned in Canadian waters. That, I frankly state, has not been accepted up to the present day; whether it should be accepted now is a question for the House to decide when the subject is brought before it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think there is one feature of this matter that has been to some extent lost sight of. I am speaking subject to correction, because I have not looked the point up for some time, but my recollection is that under the Treaty of 1842, fixing the boundary between Canada and the United States, at the lakes, each country has the right to navigate the waters of the other, that is from shore to shore. I think that is the provision contained in the treaty, and that being the case, the same rule which applies to the coast waters of the sea should apply to the waters in the lakes. I have no doubt, looking at the decision in the Franconia case, the right of navigation is a right possessed under the laws of nations, that each State can exercise that right, even though the waters should be under the sovereignty of another and different community. If I am right in that view, then it is quite clear that legislation either on the part of the Congress of the United States or of the Parliament of Canada is an interference with the right of navigation, and is a violation of the right secured by treaty. Now, the right of navigation also implies the right to relieve a vessel in distress. If an American vessel coming upon the coast of Canada should be stranded upon our coast and has not gone to pieces, she is still in a condition capable of being navigated. It is undoubtedly the right of the people of the United States under the treaty that is subsisting between the two countries to come to the relief of that vessel because that is the right of navigation, and to assist her from the perilous condition in which she is placed. A like right may pertain to a shipowner in case a vessel belonging to a Canadian was stranded upon the American coast. Of course our country would have the right to regulate the matter of wrecks, but a vessel that is simply stranded is not a wreck, and it seems to me clear from my recollection of the provisions of that treaty that neither the Government of Canada nor the Congress of the United States have any right to interfere or legislate with the freedom of navigation. It is no derogation of the rights secured to each by the treaty, and it is not in the power of the Parliament of Canada to legislate away the right of the people of the United States secured by that treaty, nor is it the power of Congress to legislate away the rights secured to us. If they choose to denounce the treaty and it comes to an end then the question as to how far each shall navigate the portion of the waters within the sovereignty of the other, is in a wholly different position. As long as that treaty exists it seems to me that neither the Congress of the United States nor the Parliament of Canada have any right whatever to legislate in the way they have done by interfering with the rights of shipping.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman has raised rather a nice point, and I really cannot supply any information from my own recollection about the terms of the treaty of 1842. I take it in that treaty for the navigation of inland waters and the laying down of the boundary, that in fact inland waters are treated in the same way as if they were on the open sea and that the general principle would apply to those lakes as to the open seas.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Quite so.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. With regard to the right of assisting in saving wrecks at all events in respect to such wreck as would involve the raising of vessels which are wrecked on shore, either nation has authority to legislate. They prevented formally our vessels going to the rescue of Canadian vessels stranded on their shores and we have done the same thing.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The courts took a different view.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. At all events they thought their right to do so was clear and they passed an Act of Congress altering their law in that regard so as to induce us to make the same alteration in our law. If they considered that our right existed to the extent that the hon. gentleman mentioned there would have been no necessity for that Act of Congress, and no necessity for any Act on our part. The hon. gentleman has referred to the matter in a manner which exhibited a great deal of legal acumen. It is a very important question and I shall look into it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The First Minister will remember the decision of the courts in the Franconia case. Their argument was that the right of navigation was not interfered with by the sovereignty of a country on the sea coast. It is provided in the treaty that we should have the right of the navigation of the lakes from shore to shore. The rule that applies to a wreck does not apply to a stranded vessel that has not yet become a wreck.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not know how far that may be extended. If articles and other manner of appliances are required for raising the vessel, I should say that it must be done in reference to the law of the land in respect to the customs regulation. I fancy that if a vessel stranded, and that when the tide in the lake rises again she could get off, that that is not a wreck. When a vessel is stranded and artificial means or any such other means are obliged to be used, that is in the strictest sense of the term a wreck.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I fancy, Mr. Speaker, there are very few precedents for this in the case of our inland waters.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. None at all.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Unless it might be in the case of the Black Sea and similar European waters, a part of which were held by one power and a part by the other, but I hardly think that this even would fit exactly. I do not think that even in the Black Sea there are many precedents to be found.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There are plenty of wrecks there.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If the treaty makes the water navigable from shore to shore, we stand exactly in the position of a vessel on the high seas.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. When a vessel gets on shore she is not in navigable waters and she is not in the high seas. She is on the shore of the country where she is stranded. It is that fact which requires legislation to enable wrecking vessels and appliances to come to her assistance without reporting at the customs house or without paying duty. Under the treaty of 1842 they have a right to navigate waters on Lake Superior, Lake Ontario and the other lakes. Those are the navigable waters, so if a vessel gets stranded on the beach she is not in the navigable waters. It is a question as to how the treaty would affect her. I think the matter will come more fully before the House when the Bill on this subject is brought before the attention of Parliament.

Mr. MITCHELL. I differ with my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) in that view. One vessel may get stranded in a certain place, yet the waters may be navigable for another vessel of less capacity and lighter draft of water, and therefore she is in navigable waters. I differ from the statements made by the right hon. gentleman who leads this Government in relation to his description of a wreck. A vessel may be stranded from a variety of causes. She may be stranded from the fact of the tide falling, or the fact that she is driven ashore by a fierce wind, but she may be quite susceptible of being taken off. It may be possible to lighten that vessel so as to float her off again. Therefore that is not a wreck. There are hundreds of vessels along our coasts and the coasts of other countries that get stranded, but they are taken off again and they are not wrecked. It appears to me, therefore, that this measure has arisen out of a retaliatory Act passed by the Canadian Government. I speak from memory and I think I am correct in saying that some years ago, when the late member for Kent, Mr. Rufus Stevenson, was in this House, I think he instigated the presentation of a Bill which subsequently passed into law to prevent the Americans from sending their wrecking vessels over to operate in our waters. The reason being, as alleged at the time, if my memory serves me right, that the Americans refused to allow Canadian wrecking vessels to operate in American waters. Hence the present law which has led to those remarks in the Congress of the United States. I thought at the time that this law passed that it was not a prudent measure, still it was passed as a work of necessity, and I believe as a work of retaliation. I think the Government should take the matter in hand with a view to getting some common understanding on the wrecking of vessels between the countries, so that each country should be permitted to operate in the waters of the other, on the St. Lawrence and the lakes. It seems to me there ought to be no great difficulty in accomplishing that purpose.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Mr. CHARLTON. It would be a nice point to determine the difference between a stranded vessel and a wrecked vessel. Whatever may have been the treaty rights of the Americans with regard to the navigation of the great lakes, it does not seem that they chose to take advantage of those rights or to interpret them as my hon. friend from Bothwell does. The restrictive measures were initiated by the American Government. They passed a regulation or an order from the Treasury Department, prohibiting Canadian vessels from assisting vessels wrecked on the American shores of the great lakes. That order was rigidly enforced, and to my personal knowledge the course taken by the customs authorities in Canada with regard to wrecked vessels has been much more liberal and humane than the course taken by the American authorities. The American authorities have found when their order was put into operation, that while the greater part of the tonnage of the great lakes was under the American flag, the majority of the wrecks were on the Canadian coasts, and the order they passed worked to their own disadvantage. It is on that account that they are so anxious now to have a humane system adopted. If they were deriving the greatest advantage from the present system, I do not suppose we should hear of any agitation in Congress for a change. It would be to the advantage of American vessel owners to employ their own appliances for recovering wrecked vessels, and were the demand of the American Government acceded to by Canada, the result would be that the entire wrecking business would pass into American hands; and unless the arrangement can be made to extend further, unless our tugs can get the privilege of the American coasting trade by our extending to their tugs the same privilege on our side, I think the American demand is one that the Parliament of Canada should not listen to. We are simply following the policy the Americans themselves inaugurated. That policy is working to their disadvantage, and I do not know but it would be wise to let it remain as it is. I can testify to the truth of what the hon. Minister of Customs has said, that in all cases where property or life is endangered, the customs authorities of Canada do grant permits; but where circumstances of that kind do not govern the case, they naturally look after the interests of our own wrecking companies, and in the operation of the regulations of the Department, great care, I believe, has been taken to give proper attention to the exigencies of the case, where the exigencies have arisen. I repeat that the Americans have inaugurated this system, and as it would be to their advantage and not ours, I think we should refuse them reciprocity in the wrecking business.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Would it not be a breach of faith?

Mr. CHARLTON. I do not think so. At all events, this question will come up under the Bill of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick), then I think it will be seen that the demand of the American Government does not rest on as good ground as it seems to.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would suggest that the hon. leader of the Government get the Minister of Justice to make a report on the subject, and, if the question is a question of right under the treaty, that our right should be raised by correspondence with the authorities at Washington.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that if there is a right to navigate the waters, there is a right to an easement over the whole water to the shore, and it must follow that the vessel of either nation can help the other in distress, no matter what coast it may be upon. When a vessel is stranded, in the mere sense of being beached, from the lowness of the water or other cause, so that it can be taken off, either by the exertion of its own crew, or by relief, that is one thing; but where the vessel is sunk, so that it cannot be raised again and brought to the top of the water and made a living thing without artificial aid, that is a downright wreck, and must be governed by other principles than those applicable to stranded vessels.

Mr. EDGAR. Whatever may be the refinements of the definitions relating to treaty rights on this subject, the Parliament of Canada has taken a pretty clear ground on the subject of dealing with wrecks, outside of the three-mile limit and anywhere in the waters of Canada. By the Wrecks and Salvage Act it is provided that receivers of wrecks may be appointed by the Governor in Council, and that when any British or foreign vessel is wrecked or stranded or in distress at any place within the limits of Canada, the receiver shall take possession of it, and hold possession of it for a time, and if anyone ventures to dispute his authority he is subject to severe penalties. I take it that the Bill of the hon. member for Frontenac, if it passes, will be read along with this old Act, and will apply to all cases covered by the Wrecks and Salvage Act, that is, to all cases of wrecks or of stranded or distressed vessels in any part of Canada within the central lines of the lakes. I suppose that is the view the hon. member will take of it.

Motion agreed to.

SUPERVISION OF BANKS.

Mr. CASGRAIN moved :

That it is expedient to provide for a better supervision by the Government of all the banks of the Dominion.

He said : I desire to invite the attention of the House, and particularly the Government, to a question that appears to me to be rather an important one, that is, the desirability of a better supervision of all the banks of the Dominion. It is a matter of notoriety that during the past few years a number of the banks in the Dominion have fallen into litigation or bankruptcy. There must be some cause for that state of things. Perhaps it is their mismanagement, perhaps it is due to the trade policy of the Dominion or it may be due to other causes, but one preventive, I think, would be a better supervision of these banks by the Government. It is true, at present the banks furnish monthly returns to the Government, but I am sorry to say that in some instances these returns are not altogether reliable. If they were made in such a way as to be perfectly accurate, the public confidence in the banks would be better maintained. I hold in my hand a return, partly taken from the Government blue book, and partly obtained from the Department of Finance, from which it appears that no less than ten banks have become bankrupt within the last few years. They are the Mechanics' Bank, the Consolidated Bank, the Metropolitan Bank, the Bank of Upper Canada, the Merchants Bank of Prince Edward Island, the Liverpool Bank of Nova Scotia, the Commercial Bank of New Brunswick, the Bank of Prince Edward Island, the Exchange Bank, the Acadian Bank of Nova Scotia. Out of all our banks, there are ten which, of late years, have become insolvent. It may be said that these banks are private institutions, and I will grant that they are, in so far as their shareholders and directors are concerned. But they partake more of the character of public institutions towards the state. They get their charters from the State, they do business and attract the confidence of the people under the provisions of their charters, they invite depositors to make deposits, they invite public confidence in their stock, and they must be considered more as public than as private institutions. It is in their character of public institutions that the Government have made certain regulations forcing the banks to make returns to the Government. If these returns were made so as to prevent the public from forming false impressions, I would consider them sufficient, but they are not sufficient. If one would compare the returns of these banks which suspended payments with the last returns they made to the Government, you would certainly not have much confidence in the statements made by the directors. I consider it, therefore, my duty to bring before the House this question, in which a great number of the people of this Dominion take an interest. So many people have dealings constantly with the banks that this is a question which interests the public at large. One reason why the Government should proceed in this matter, is that they have already proceeded in regulating, to a certain extent, the management of banks. Take what is done with regard to insurance companies. The Government have appointed a superintendent of insurance, whose duty it is to ascertain the value of the assets of insurance companies and decide whether they are sufficient to meet the liabilities or not. There is a perfect analogy between the two. If, in the case of the insurance companies, the Government has thought fit to appoint a superintendent, it ought certainly to appoint one in the case of the bank. I can see very well the objection that can be raised to the appointment of a bank superintendent. The objection will be that, considering the banks to be private institutions, we have no business to enquire into the management of their affairs which should be left exclusively in the hands of the shareholders and directors. But this is not a sufficient reason for depriving the Government of some direct control over the management of the banks, so that the public confidence in them will not be misplaced. I, therefore, am of opinion that this is a wise suggestion, though I do not believe that, coming as it does, from this side of the House, the Government will adopt it. I hope the Government will take it into their serious consideration. I make it in view of the sad list of insolvent banks which we have had within the past ten or fifteen years. Not only have I upon this list the number of banks that have fallen into bankruptcy but also the number of banks which have been obliged to reduce their capital, whether from mismanagement, or misfortune, or bad supervision. But it is clear that the shareholders have very little to do in supervising the action of their directors. The supervision is done about once a year, and the shareholders cannot go to the vaults of the bank and count the specie or look at the different assets. Now, the banks that have reduced their capital are twelve in number, and it will be seen that the dates of their misfortunes are not very far back. They are the Standard Bank, the Ontario Bank, the Jacques Cartier, the Banque du Peuple, the Banque de Ville Marie, the Union Bank of Lower Canada, the Maritime Bank of New Brunswick, the Bank of New Brunswick, the Bank of Nova Scotia, the Bank of Yarmouth and the Union Bank of Halifax, and the Banque Nationale is now coming before this House and asking for a reduction of capital. I hope the Banque Nationale will be the last of the number. Besides these banks that have reduced their capital, there are many other banks which have not for some years paid dividends. They are the Banque de St. Jean, the St. Hyacinthe, the Union Bank of Lower Canada, La Banque Nationale, La Banque du Peuple, the Union Bank of Halifax and the Maritime Bank of New Brunswick. These eight banks for a long time paid no dividends. It appears to me that at particular periods the bank superintendents should be empowered to ascertain the results of the operations of each bank, and that is all the public care for. By appointing a proper and trustworthy person who would be intended not to dive into the private affairs of the bank for the mere pleasure of looking into them and trying to find out the private business of B. C. or D., but a trustworthy, discreet, reliable and honest person, we should have an officer of the utmost utility to the public, and many of the shareholders of the banks would be grateful to the Government for creating such an office, which would certainly prevent a good deal of bad management; and the mere fact of having a superintendent over these banks who go at a moment's notice to examine their affairs would put these men on their guard, and they would be always ready to give a true and faithful account to the public of what was going on behind their counter. I would suggest that, in addition to the returns made by the bank to the Government, there ought to be a special return made showing how far the directors become liable to the banks on their private accounts and how far some of the directors in some of the banks go to accommodate their friends, not as mere trustees of the bank but as themselves doing the banking business on their own account, that is to say, endorsing as directors for their friends and getting a little douceur for doing it. That is one of the causes of the troubles in many instances into which the banks fall. It would be well also to discover whether the directors borrow much more from the banks than the value of their stocks. I think, if a director has any status in trade, he ought not to be allowed to borrow from the bank of which he is director to any large extent. If he has any credit, he should go to another bank and borrow, but should not borrow of the bank of which he is a mere trustee. There is one point also in regard to which the superintendent would be very useful, and that is to ascertain the real assets of the bank. These assets are very often made at a much greater valuation than they ought to be, and we see every-day that, when a bank goes into liquidation, the assets of the bank, which have been said to be of a good amount, have dwindled to about one-third of their supposed value. Therefore, if this valuation was made and was well known, the Government and the public would not be deceived as to the real assets of the bank. The responsibility of the directors of the bank ought to be better determined by the law. In the Province of Quebec it is true they are considered merely as mandataires and they have that responsibility alone, but they ought to be considered as having a much greater responsibility. They have the responsibility, for instance, of the stock of poor widows and orphans. In that light, they should be considered as much responsible as tutors and curators are. They are to take care that the property of those widows and orphans is protected against false speculation and they should be responsible for its management so far. It is very certain that, if the Government or the public had been informed two, three or four months before these banks whose names I have given fell into bankruptcy, if the Government had had a correct statement of the affairs of these banks, certainly some of these banks would have suspended before they did. These banks would not, up to the last moment, have had the confidence of the people because of the returns of the Government, and therefore I say that, under these circumstances, the appointment of a superintendent and good complete returns made to the Government would give security to the public and also more satisfaction to the shareholders. With this in view, and being moved only in the interests of the people of this Dominion, I move the resolution of which I have given notice.

Mr. INNES. I willingly second the motion just proposed by the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Casgrain), because I consider the subject one of very great importance indeed and worthy the attention of the House and of the Government. I do not intend to go into the matter at any length, but simply to refer to one or two cases which I think will afford very strong reasons indeed for some action being taken by the Government on this question. I think the Committee on Banking and Commerce to-day recommended the passing of an Act for the winding up of the Federal Bank. We know that that institution, by injudicious management, was very greatly weakened some time ago, so much so indeed that it has been forced to wind up.

Mr. CASGRAIN.

But its position so far is very good, because I believe that not only the depositors but the shareholders will receive nearly everything they have put in. How very different it will be in the case of the Central Bank. I would recall to the attention of the House some facts in connection with the history of that short-lived institution—short-lived indeed, but, during the time it was in existence, characterised, I suppose, by worse management and more rascality than we ever knew in the history of any banking institution in Canada. I think it was during the Session of 1884 that the charter was granted to this bank. It commenced business in the spring of 1835, and in two and a half short years it had collapsed, on the 15th of November last. Scarcely any one interested in the institution, except those who were guilty of wrecking it, knew anything of its actual position. In fact, one or two or more of the directors did not really know its actual position till within a day or so of the time it closed its doors. How then could the general public, the shareholders throughout the country and the large number of depositors know anything of its actual condition? It was impossible that they could do so if the directors, who should have been interested, who ought to have known the actual position of the bank, were ignorant of that position. Why, the return made by the bank on the 31st October shows it to be in a healthy position. It is of interest just to give the figures to show how they were afterwards falsified. In that return that was made to the Government, I may premise that the capital of the bank was one million dollars and that there was half a million paid up. The following statement shows the affairs of the bank to 31st October, 1887:

Remember that this return was made to the Government and sworn to, I suppose, by the president and cashier on the 31st October, 15 days before the bank closed its doors. Not only that, but early in the month the board of directors met and declared the usual dividend of 6 per cent. Now, what was the actual position of the bank at that time? We find from the report of the liquidator, four months afterwards, that the actual position, at the very time the false returns were made, sworn to and sent to Ottawa, was this: claims proved against the bank, $1,362,420; claims not proved, $351,420; filed since 28th February, $84,824; amounts unclaimed, $57,155; making the liabilities of the bank, $1,856,319. As one of the liquidators remarked, the bank had been wrecked to the amount of about $1,000,000, the actual capital for which it was chartered. And not only that, Mr. Speaker, in the same return, the amount that the directors had borrowed, either by themselves or for their firms or partnership, is placed at $73,690. This return was also sworn to, of course, in accordance with the Act. But we find that the actual state of affairs was very different indeed, for the Master in Chancery, after he got fairly into the investigation of the affairs of the bank, found they had actually exceeded that sum, and had deliberately broken the law in borrowing more than the law allowed; and in addition, they had issued $70,000 of notes in direct contravention of the statute. It was found in evidence before the Master that the president, by himself, had borrowed $16,000, that he, in company with one of the directors, had borrowed $21,000, making $37,000; and that this director, J. Mitchell Macdonald, for himself owed the bank $138,000; that another director owed $3,000, another $24,000, and still another $6,000, in all $202,000, in addition to the $73,000 which were returned and sworn to by the bank on October the 31st. When the statement was laid before the Master in Chancery, about the time that he commended his investigation, on the 22nd January, he said :

"He had duly certified the return made by the said Central Bank, of 9th November, six days before the suspension, in which it was reported to the Government that on the 31st October, there was not only a surplus of $600,000, actually over and above all liabilities, but sufficient securities on current loans to cover all liabilities. He took this statement as true, and the directors and officials of the bank would be required to give an account of what disposition of this large surplus they made between the 31st October and 16th November, when the bank suspended. The law called on them, as custodians of the trust placed in their hands, to give a rigid account to the last cent. The criminal law held them accountable if the returns were fictitious. Under the provisions of the Winding-up Act, not only the shareholders but the creditors had the right to examine minutely all directors and officials, and to scrutinise their dealings. If false returns were made, the officials making such returns were criminally liable; they might be imprisoned, and compelled to pay all deficient amounts with interest. Presidents, and directors, and officials of banks should know, and the sooner they realised their responsibility, the more it will be to their advantage, that they could not shelter themselves under a mere pretence. The returns they make must be true in figure and in fact, the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. He would call upon the liquidators to make most minute searching investigation. The tribunal possessed large inquisitorial powers; they would have to exercise these to the utmost, and it was a duty that they owed to public justice and to those whose property and means of livelihood were imperilled."

Such was the opinion given by the Master in Chancery at that time. It was supposed when this announcement was made that the parties who were thought to be guilty, would be brought up for examination, but we find that they very soon made themselves scarce. The first one that left, whose extraordinary transactions with the bank, I suppose, have been unparalleled in the history of any bank—I refer to Cox, the broker—he was the first one who left, considering, I suppose, that it was unsafe for him to remain. The next one who left was the cashier. He also owed the bank from $30,000 to $50,000. Then followed the director whom I mentioned. He owed $138,000 to the bank. Then the president, partly on account of ill health, and no doubt afraid that he would be subjected to a rigid examination or, perhaps, something worse, found it convenient to go across to the other side. The result has been that not one single individual connected with this institution, not one of the parties who had anything to do in wrecking the bank, has yet been arrested. The shareholders and the depositors have placed their money in the institution; the shareholders will be called upon for the double liability, and the depositors will have to lose a share of their hard earned money. This is the actual state of affairs. I do not think it necessary for me to go into details in connection with some of the transactions. How it was that this man Cox obtained his connection with the bank, how he was able to get so much out of the bank, the amount due by him being $170,000; how it was that D. Mitchell Macdonald obtained such a large sum out of the bank,—it is not necessary for me now to explain, as the whole matter has been ventilated through the newspapers during the course of the investigation. It is not necessary to call attention as to how Mr. Barnett obtained about $130,000 on the mere security of some trumpery diamonds or what were said to be diamonds; it is not necessary to refer to Baxter's connection with the bank or the case of Allen, the cashier and manager, who was doubly responsible, being entrusted with the management of the bank, but who left it a debtor to the extent of from $30,000 to $50,000. These men, or at least the directors and the cashier, were directly responsible to the shareholders, and they were untrue to their trust; and not only so but they rendered themselves liable under the law, if they had been arrested, to imprisonment and punishment. It is calculated that these directors and the parties I have mentioned are directly responsible to the bank for about $500,000 of the actual amount that was paid up as capital. Any one knowing these facts can readily realise the amount of suffering and privation that will be caused throughout the country wherever there was a branch of the institution. I suppose that Toronto, where the head office was situated, suffered to the largest extent; I think the city in the riding which I have the honor to represent perhaps suffered next. The inhabitants of Guelph, business men and depositors in the city and throughout the riding, had deposits in the bank to the extent of $382,000, and I believe there was from $60,000 to $70,000 in stock. Such a large sum being locked up one would think would be apt to cripple business. I am very happy to say that it was scarcely felt to any appreciable extent and business men and others were able to tide over the temporary difficulty, and there was scarcely any difference noticeable financially from so much money being locked up. But, no doubt, there were cases of privation and of suffering not only there but also in other places, and even if the amount expected shall be realised the depositors will lose about 25 per cent. of their hard earned savings, and some people had their all deposited in the institution. There is no doubt that the shareholders will be called on for their double liability. No wonder Chancellor Boyd, in removing one of liquidators, stated in giving his opinion concerning the bank as follows:—

"The revelations of the bank's transactions showed an alarming state of affairs. When we consider the history of this bank, the position of the men in connection with it, and the total terrific wreck which has occurred, one is obliged to say that there has not only been gross incompetency, but I might almost say idiotic mismanagement and dishonesty in the conduct of its affairs."

Now, Mr. Speaker, when we have such a revelation, surely it is high time for the Government to take hold of this matter and so amend the Banking Act as will secure us better satisfaction than seems to be given at present by the existing Act. The directors should be compelled to make a clear and full statement of the bank's affairs. That is one clause of the Banking Act as it stands at present; but we know and I have shown to you that the directors and cashier are capable of making false returns and are capable of swearing to them. The Banking Act provides that no dividend shall be declared which will impair the capital of the bank. We have seen that this clause of the Act was also infringed on. The Act provides a penalty for the over-issue of bills. In the case of the Central Bank there was an over-issue of bills; but the bills have been destroyed, and strange to say and unaccountable as it seems to me, the authorities that should take hold of these matters have not brought the directors to task for a direct infringement of the Act. But the law is in some respects deficient, and in one principal respect it is defective. The provisions of the law are inadequate to secure the evidence of bank officers. The law provides for the examination by the court into the conduct of the officers who are supposed to have been guilty of a breach of trust, but a liquidator can do this only under the authority of the court. It is provided that notice must be given to the directors or the officers, and that simply serves as a notice and warning to them. In that respect I think the Banking Act requires amendment, for there should be more stringent provisions and a better and quicker process of bringing defaulting directors and officers to justice than we have at present. Then there is a lack of proper inspection. There should be a provision for better security for the depositors. We want a more stringent enforcement of the provision for the punishment of directors borrowing money from the bank, we want heavier penalties for making false returns, and there are many other amendments which might be suggested and incorporated in a Bill when the subject is before the Committee on Banking and Commerce when they take the whole question into consideration, and I trust we shall ere long have a measure which will define more clearly the duties of the directors, which will make them more responsible in every respect in regard to the management of the banks, and which will secure more effectually the depositors and those who entrust their money to the bank, and also the shareholders who give their money to start the institution. A measure of that kind which would accomplish that object would, I am sure, secure the cordial support and confidence of both sides of the House.

Mr. LISTER. I shall only trouble the House for a few moments on this very important question which my hon. friend has brought before the attention of the Government and the House. There can be no doubt that the recent disastrous and disgraceful bank failures which have taken place within the last few years in this country will force the Government to take some action for the purpose of protecting those interested in the banks as well as the billholders. I have given this question some little investigation, and I think I can safely say that there is no country in the world to-day that has a worse banking system than we have in Canada. By the Act under which these banks are acting they have a right to issue bills to the amount of the paid up capital. I hold that no Government should give a bank power to issue anything to circulate as money; our bills should be issued by the Government of the country through banks upon proper security furnished by the bank. So far as the banks of this country are concerned, there is absolutely no security whatever for the billholders or any person interested in the bank, except the honesty of the officials of those banks, and it is to be regretted that during the last few years the public have learned that so far as honesty is concerned there is little, if any, security. There are many reasons why the bills should not be issued by the banks but should be issued by the Government itself. You take the whole Dominion of Canada, and we all know that bills issued in one Province are not current in another, except on discount. This is not as it ought to be. The bills issued by a bank in this country should be current all over the Dominion. If you go to Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island or British Columbia, the bills issued in the Province of Ontario or the Province of Quebec are not taken as current money, and the people holding those bills are obliged to submit to a discount, although the bills themselves may be beyond question. There is a want of confidence in the banks of the country, and we know that runs upon banks are caused by people holding bills in small sums. They become timid, and their timidity extends to other persons who hold the bills, and the consequence is a run upon the banks, although the bank may be perfectly solvent and able to meet its liabilities in full. Now, Sir, I think there is no system of banking so completely successful or so completely sure to every person interested as the American system. The national banking system of the United States to my mind is the most perfect system of banking in the world. It is a system that has been taken up and largely adopted now by the several nations of the world and this country possesses unusual facilities for introducing that system of banking. Why Sir, we have to-day a debt of something like

Mr. INNES.

$300,000,000 and we are paying interest to the English people upon our money. That debt can be paid off if the system adopted by the United States is adopted here. The interest could be paid to our own people by compelling the banks to accept from the Government, bank bills secured by the bonds of the Government. In that way the money received for that issue may be applied in payment of the debt which we owe to foreign countries and the interest which we pay to those people might be paid to our own people. As my hon. friend who has just spoken, properly stated, there is no proper system of bank inspection in this country. As I said a few moments ago it depends upon the honesty of the officials who have the management of the banks, and the experience of the past few years has been such as to prove to us conclusively that this is not much security for people interested in those banks. In the United States they have a complete system of inspection. There is a Government inspector of the United States whose duty it is upon the slightest complaint made of irregularities in the management of a bank to at once take complete possession and control of the bank. He takes the keys of the institution and he makes a thorough and complete investigation, and if it is found that the directors are borrowing beyond what the law allows, or that there are any irregularities in the management of the bank, that has to be accounted for and made right before the work can proceed. The result of that has been, Sir, in the United States, to make their system a completely successful system. In looking over the returns from the Financial Department at Washington it is remarkable to see the very small percentage of the National Banks in the United States that have failed and what large dividends have been paid to the creditors of those banks in cases where they have failed. There is another thing I think that the Government should take into consideration—because the time will shortly come when they will have to consider this question and when it will be necessary to introduce a new Banking Act as the one which now exists will expire in a couple of years—and that is as to the question of allowing banking institutions to commence business with a smaller capital than they now do. Our banks now start with a large capital, they have a head office in some of the cities of the country and then branch out into the smaller towns. They are merely receptacles for the purpose of receiving the surplus earnings of the people, and that money is sent to the money centres and is used for the purpose of speculating in stocks and so on. There is no community in this country that has not over half a million or two million dollars in surplus cash, and that money finds investment in the agencies established in those different points. It can find investments in the building associations started in the different towns throughout the country, but whatever money is invested or deposited with the chartered banks of the country is, as I said before, not used for the purpose of helping on the business men of the particular community, but it is sent to those large money centres, and there it is used for speculating purposes. I think I am safe in saying that not more than half the deposits throughout this country are used for the purpose of accommodating the business men of the particular section in which it is deposited. Now, Sir, the building associations of the country have proved to be a marvellous success. Wherever they have been started they have been successful. They have been the means of giving the people, who had surplus money in particular communities, an opportunity of investing that money, and I say that this is the best evidence that if the Government would permit, banks to be established with smaller capital throughout the country, it would destroy, to some extent, the system of banks and agencies which now exist, and local banks would take the place of those large institutions. By doing this the surplus money of the community would be invested by people who understood the business wants of the several communities. The investment would be perfectly safe and the public would run no risk whatever, if the Government undertook the duty of issuing the money themselves. It is said that this system would not be sufficiently elastic and in times when money was required to be plentiful it might not supply the demand. The experience of the United States has negated any such statement as that, money has been sufficiently plentiful there for all the commercial wants of that great country, and I do not think there would be the slightest difficulty in this country upon that score. The Government, as I stated a moment ago, should be in a better position as regards the debt of the country. All that it would require was to change the creditors from bondholders in England to the Canadian people themselves. A scheme of that kind would give complete security to billholders, it would save this constant run upon banks, because as I said those who start a run upon the banks of the country are those who are holding the bills and when a failure takes place it is generally found that the people who suffered most are the poorer classes of the community who are the holders of those bills. In the case of a failure they have to wait months and sometimes years before those bills are redeemed, or the holders of them have to pass them away at a very heavy discount, and at a very great loss to themselves. As my hon. friend says, they sometimes lose them altogether. Mr. Speaker, this is a question on which some action should be taken by this Parliament. It is a question which the people and the press of the country have been agitating for some time. It has been urged upon the Government by the press, and we all know that it is incumbent upon the Government to do something to give better security to the people than has been the case in the past. At present there is no difficulty whatever for a dishonest bank manager to completely wreck a bank before the public are aware of it. That is not as it should be. If it is not thought that the system which is in force in the United States would not suit the wants of this country, at all events we have a right to ask the Government to have a complete system of investigation and inspection, so that as far as it is possible the billholders and people interested in the banks of the country should have proper security. As the matter stands now our system is the very loosest one that can be found in any of the commercial countries of the world. It is old fashioned, it has passed its day. The function of issuing money belongs exclusively to the Government and if that is secured by Government bonds bought by the bank, then, Sir, it is of little consequence whether the bank under such circumstances has failed or not. Everyone knows that the bills will be redeemed when they are presented at the Receiver General's office or at such other place as may be appointed, just as is the case in the United States. There one never thinks of examining a bill to see whether the bank has failed or not. It is sufficient to know that it is a National Bank bill, and that on presentation at Washington it will be redeemed. This is an important question, and I hope it will engage the attention of the Government at no distant day.

Mr. CASEY. I did not expect that this motion would be reached this evening or that the discussion would take the wide range it has done, or I would have been better prepared to speak on the subject.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. CASEY moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. ELLIS, I would like to make a remark with a reference to a statement made by the hon. gentleman who made this motion. He has included in the list of wrecked banks the Bank of New Brunswick. That is a mistake, because that bank is not in the position of the others at all. It is quite true, it has reduced its capital, but it has done that to return it to its shareholders because it was not able to use the capital so returned. At present its stock is selling above par.

Mr. CASGRAIN. It was the Commercial Bank of New Brunswick which I stated had failed. The statement I read from is an official statement coming from the Department of Finance.

Mr. LOVITT. The hon. gentlemen mentioned that the Bank of Yarmouth had reduced its capital. It did that because it had more money than it could lend out to advantage, and it asked Parliament to grant permission to pay it back to its shareholders, which was done. I consider that an evidence of good management, and not of bad management.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) I wish also to state that the bank of which I have the honor to be president, has been mentioned in the same category, but no bank is in a better position in this country.

Motion to adjourn debate agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. LAURIER. I would ask the hon. leader of the Government if he is in a position to say whether the health of the hon. Minister of Finance will permit him to go on with the Fishery Treaty to-morrow.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am happy to be able to say that it is quite sufficient.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like to ask whether it is the intention of the Government to invite Parliament to pass an address to the Imperial Government asking for legislation to confirm the boundaries of Ontario as defined by the arbitrators in 1878 and the Privy Council in 1884.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Will the hon. gentleman give notice of a motion?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell.) I intend to put it in another way—on going into Supply.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 11 p. m.

PRAYERS.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved the second reading of Bill (No. 65) respecting a certain Treaty between Her Britannic Majesty and the President of the United States. He said: Mr. Speaker, in rising to move the second reading of this Bill, I desire to say that if I had not on so many past occasions experienced the kind indulgence of both sides of the House, I should hesitate to undertake, in the present state of my health, bringing forward the very important subject that it now becomes my duty to lay before the House. I am glad to know, Sir, that the question of the protection of our fisheries, and of the results that have followed the course that was adopted by the Government and Parliament of Canada, has not been a party question. I am glad to know, Sir, that in approaching the very important subject that I am now submitting to the House, I can rely on the patriotic consideration of this question by gentlemen on both sides of the House to whom it is thoroughly familiar, and who on various occasions and in various capacities have been called on in the past to deal with it. For more than a hundred years this question has been a source of irritation between the Imperial Government of Great Britain, the Government of the United States, and the people and Governments of British North America. So long ago as 1783 a treaty was made between the Government of Great Britain and the Government of the United States at Paris in relation to the fisheries. Article 3 of that treaty provided:

"It is agreed that the people of the United States shall continue to enjoy, unmolested, the right to take fish of every kind on the Grand Bank, and on all the other banks of Newfoundland; also in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and at all other places in the sea where the inhabitants of both countries used at any time heretofore to fish; and also, that the inhabitants of the United States shall have the liberty to take fish of every kind on such part of the coast of Newfoundland as British fishermen shall use (but not to dry or cure the same on that Island), and also on the coasts, bays and creeks of all other of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America; and that the American fishermen shall have liberty to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors and creeks of Nova Scotia, Magdalen Islands and Labrador, so long as the same shall remain unsettled; but so soon as the same, or either of them, shall be settled, it shall not be lawful for the said fishermen to dry or cure fish at such settlement, without a previous agreement for that purpose with the inhabitants, proprietors or possessors of the ground."

Now, I need not say to the House that the concession made to the people of the United States to enjoy in common with the people of Great Britain the fisheries of this country, was a treaty of a very extraordinary and abnormal character. I need not remind the House that the Treaty of Ghent, which was made between Great Britain and the United States at the termination of the War of 1812, is found to be entirely silent upon this subject, for the reason that the Government of Great Britain had arrived at the conclusion that it was impossible to permit the continuance of such an unwarranted interference with the rights of the people of British North America as had been enjoyed by the people of the United States under the Treaty of 1793. The Government of the United States took the ground that the treaty was not affected by the war. That position, however, was strongly controverted by Her Majesty's Government, and as the representatives of the United States Government had been instructed not to concede on the question of the fisheries, and the Government of Great Britain were equally inexorable on that point, the only course that could be adopted was to give the question the entire go by. It therefore found no place in the Treaty of 1812. The Government of Great Britain, however, acting upon the principle that they had maintained—the principle which has come to be recognised throughout the world—that a war abrogates all treaties, and especially treaties of that character, asserted their rights in these territorial waters of British North America, and proceeded to seize fishermen of the United States for trespassing in these waters. The result of that difficulty was the Treaty of 1818, in which this question was again considered by the two Governments, and I may call attention to the terms of the principal article of that treaty, so far as the fisheries are concerned:

"Whereas differences have arisen respecting the liberty claimed by the United States for the inhabitants thereof, to take, dry and cure fish on certain coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America, it is agreed between the high contracting parties that the inhabitants of the said United States shall have, forever, in common with the subjects of His Britannic Majesty, the liberty to take fish of every kind on that part of the southern coast of Newfoundland which extends from Cape Ray to the Ramea Islands, on the western and northern coast of Newfoundland; from the said Cape Ray to the Quirpon Islands; on the shores of the Magdalen Islands; and also on the coasts, bays, harbors and creeks, from Mount Joli, on the southern coast of Labrador, to and through the Straits of Bellefleur, and thence northward, indefinitely, along the coast, without prejudice, however, to any of the exclusive rights of the Hudson's Bay Company; and that the American fishermen shall also have liberty, forever, to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks of the southern part of the coast of Newfoundland hereabove described, and of the coast of Labrador; but so soon as the same, or any portion thereof, shall be settled, it shall not be lawful for the said fishermen to dry or cure fish at such portion so settled, without previous agreement for such purpose with the inhabitants, proprietors, or possessors of the ground; and the United States hereby renounce, forever, any liberty heretofore enjoyed or claimed by the inhabitants thereof to take, dry or cure fish on or within three marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks or harbors of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America not included within the above mentioned limits: Provided, however, That the American fishermen shall be admitted to enter such bays or harbors for the purpose of shelter and of repairing damages therein, of purchasing wood, and of obtaining water, and for no other purpose whatever. But they shall be under such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent their taking, drying, or curing fish therein, or in any other manner whatever abusing the privileges hereby reserved to them."

Now, Sir, that treaty which was made between the Government of Great Britain and the Government of the United States, seventy years ago, has been the cause of constant recurring irritation and difficulty between the two countries; and I need not remind the House that no portions of Her Majesty's dominions have been so vitally and deeply interested in that question as what are now known as the Dominion of Canada and the Province of Newfoundland. This treaty is very striking in two particulars. It gives the same territorial advantages, but to a very limited extent, over a certain portion of the Island of Newfoundland and what is now known as Canada, to the Government of the United States, as were given under the Treaty of 1793, and in return for that—I believe it is perhaps an unparalleled concession by any Government of one country to another—was secured the formal renunciation on the part of the Government of the United States of the liberty of their fishermen to enter any other portion of the jurisdictional waters of what was then known as British North America, except for four specified purposes. Even the privileges enjoyed under those four specified purposes were distinctly declared to be subject to their being used in such a manner as in no way to abuse the privileges thus granted. The adoption of this treaty was followed by the passage of laws on the part of the Imperial Parliament and also of the British North America Provinces for the purpose of giving it effect. Of course, although the treaty distinctly laid down the International law as between the two countries, special legislation was requisite in order to provide a means for carrying that treaty out and for enforcing its provisions on the part of Great Britain and on the part of British North America. The exclusion of the United States fishermen from the fishing grounds of British North America led again to collision and difficulty. Seizures were made, the old difficulties that had existed before the formation of the treaty were again called into activity by the presence of the United States fishermen in our waters, and by the measures which were taken, especially by Great Britain, for the purpose of protecting the rights of the inhabitants of British North America. The result of these difficulties was the Reciprocity Treaty. The firm stand taken by Her Majesty's Government, the firm position taken to protect the undoubted rights of her subjects in British North America, led to the adoption, in 1854, of what is known as the Reciprocity Treaty, a treaty which for twelve years removed all difficulties in connection with this question. On that occasion there was no attempt to limit, define, or interpret the points that had been raised in the controversy between the two countries, but they received their quietus, and all these difficulties were removed by the adoption of a policy of giving to them Provinces of British North America and Newfoundland certain commercial privileges by which the trade between this country and the United States was extended. I may say that I took the opportunity, when delivering my speech on the financial condition of the country a year ago, to draw the attention of the House to the results of that treaty, and I will just call the attention of the House again for one moment to a single extract in that speech, in which I referred to the trade results of what is known as the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854. It will be found that the United States, during those twelve years, from 1854 to 1866, exported to British North America home products to the extent of $300,808,370 and foreign products to the extent of $62,379,718, the total exports to British North America being $363,188,088. The imports from the British Provinces into the United States during that period amounted to $267,612,131, showing a balance during the twelve years in favor of the United States of $95,575,957. That is to say, that they sent under the operation of that treaty into the British North American Provinces over 95,000,000 more than we sent into that country. I have often been at a loss to know how any person in the United States, and much less how any person in Canada could disparage that treaty, or could speak of the effect of the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854 as having been a one-sided treaty, altogether in favor of British North America, and not equally in favor of the United States.

Mr. CHARLTON. Would not the excess include goods passing through the country in bond and in transit, such as the exportation of wheat through the western canals?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think not. I think the hon. gentleman will find that these are the legitimate figures connected with the trade of the two countries, and I noticed, shortly after the delivery of this speech, that the Hon. T. W. Bayard, the Secretary of State of the United States, was interviewed in relation to this question, and, so far as the account of that interview went, I understood him to confirm the accuracy of the figures which I had used on that occasion. I say I have been greatly at a loss to know how, under the circumstances, any person can be found, especially in this country, to treat this as a one-sided measure in the interests of Canada. So far as what is known as Canada is concerned, we know that the trade of our country took a very great bound, and that the result of the Reciprocity Treaty was to give a very vast and sudden and great and still-continued impetus to our trade with the United States; but, as I said before, the result was to give a still greater expansion of trade to the United States in relation to British North America. I am glad, after spending some three months in Washington, to be able to say that I had very intimate intercourse with gentlemen of different politics holding high positions in the Senate and House of Representatives, that I have taken many opportunities of discussing this question with them, and that the result is that I did not find one statesman in the United States who expressed his satisfaction at the termination of that treaty having taken place. I believe the general expression in that country is that commercially it was a mistake to have terminated that treaty, and that it would have been infinitely better for the United States and for Canada if that treaty had been continued. That treaty was not abrogated on commercial grounds. It was not in consequence of any commercial reasons that the abrogation took place, but it was, as is well known, in consequence of an unhappy sentiment which grew up in the United States, that, during the time of the Civil War which rent that country asunder, the sympathies of the British North American Provinces were very strongly with the South. I think there is very great reason to question the soundness of that opinion, but, although from the nature and the position of our country, being neutral territory, advantage was taken of it by the Southerners, by those who were engaged in carrying on that war from the South, to make it a basis of operations, the Government of Canada never showed the slightest favor, but took every means in their power to prevent British North America being made use of in that struggle. I think, if the records of the United States were examined, it would be found that ten Canadians, or ten British North Americans, fought in the ranks of the Northern side for every one who fought on the Southern side.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Twenty.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am inclined to think that my right hon. friend is nearer the mark than I am when he says they were twenty to one. I scarcely know of any aid or any allowance which might be proof of this, being given to any of the soldiers who fought for the South, while we know that at this moment the Government of the United States are paying a large sum of money to persons who were British subjects then and are British subjects now, in Canada, for their services during that war. Taking that as the best test that the country can show as to where its sympathies were, as far as the substantial and most important kind of aid could be found, it will be seen that British North America rendered a great deal more support and assistance to the North than to the South. Now, I may say that the Treaty of 1854 removed for twelve years all these difficulties, but, unfortunately, from the causes to which I have alluded, I believe to a large extent that a misapprehension of the true facts of the case led to that treaty being abrogated. Both parties in this country, both parties in the various Provinces—because it was before the Union of Canada—regretted that the abrogation took place. I believe there was not a Province in what is now the Dominion of Canada that did not make every exertion first of all to avoid the abrogation of that treaty, and, after it was abrogated, to endeavor to have it or something equivalent to it restored at as early a period as possible. But those efforts were unsuccessful, and then, and while these efforts were being continued, as hon. gentlemen opposite know, Canada resorted to a system of licenses to prevent a sharp interference with the practiced habits of United States fishermen of fishing in the waters of British North America. We adopted a mode of endeavoring to prevent collision and difficulty. While there might be no hope of our being able to settle this question by a recurrence to something like the Treaty of 1854, every effort was made by the adoption of licenses to remove irritation and prevent collision of every kind, in order to favor, as far as possible, the solution of the question in that way; but ultimately we were obliged to fall back on the principle of protecting our fisheries, we were obliged to adopt such measures as the fishermen had a right to expect at our hands; being excluded from the American market by high duties, having their calling very seriously interfered with, they had a right to demand at the hands of the Government and the Parliament of Canada that measures should be taken for the protection of the rights which they undoubtedly enjoyed and which, under the Treaty of 1818, had been settled in what one would suppose was as clear and concise and emphatic a manner as it was possible that any question could be settled. The result was that seizures again occurred, and the American fishermen, encroaching upon the waters of British North America, found themselves again in difficulties. The result of that was, as you all know, that in 1871 a new treaty was made, and I have often thought of the old adage, that "everything comes to him who waits," when I have thought of the manner in which my right hon. friend on my left was attacked in this House and out of it, in connection with the Washington Treaty, and the satisfaction he must have experienced when, after the treaty had been in operation for ten years, there was not a single public man in Canada but was ready to do everything possible to maintain and to continue that very treaty. On that occasion, as hon. gentlemen know, my right hon. friend made the same effort to settle this question upon the lines that had been settled in 1854; the effort was to obtain from the United States, instead of a money payment for the privileges which their fishermen were anxious to enjoy in the waters of Canada, such an expansion of commercial intercourse, and the increase of trade between the two countries, as would meet the wishes of the people of Canada, and be a settlement that would commend itself to the judgment and approval of everybody. That effort, however, was not successful; and when the treaty was presented for consideration to this House—and I remember the occasion well, when hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House felt it their duty to criticise very severely that treaty, and we were compelled, in self-defence, to say something in its support—I remember very well appealing to hon. gentlemen opposite, as I shall appeal to them to-day, not to press the Government unduly to show to Parliament and to show to the country the advantages that were obtained by the Washington Treaty of 1871. One of the conditions of the treaty was that an international arbitration should take place at Halifax for the purpose of ascertaining the increased value of the fisheries of Canada to the people of the United States over and above the omission of the duty on fish and the corresponding right to fish in their waters, that the balance of advantages should be examined by an international arbitration for the purpose of arriving at the amount that should be paid by the United States to Canada. I appealed to hon. gentlemen opposite on that occasion not to compel us, in self-defence, to show that the treaty which had been signed was one advantageous to Canada, not to compel us to take such strong grounds as would be used against us when that arbitration, at a subsequent time, should take place. Well, Sir, I am sorry to say that my appeal on that occasion was not as successful as I trust it will be on this occasion; I am sorry to say that we were forced to make some very strong and very clear statements to the House in justification of my right hon. friend for putting his name to the Washington Treaty of 1871. Well, just as I expected, and nobody knows better than the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), who sits opposite—for this arbitration took place in the city where he lives—no person knows better than himself, that one main element of the United States case was the production of the very speeches which we had been compelled to make on the floor of this House in defence of that treaty. Every word that we stated on that occasion was used to our disadvantage and to our detriment—I will not say that it was very successfully used, because I do not think that Canada has any great right to complain of the amount that was awarded on that occasion, $5,500,000 for the period during which the treaty was to last, for the benefits derived by the people of the United States over and above those which were conceded by giving free fish. Of course, we know that the treaty was abrogated. Many persons have said, Sir, that we were not only successful in that arbitration, but that we were too successful, that, in fact, the award that was made was the main reason why the United States took the earliest possible moment to denounce that treaty and to terminate it. I do not believe, myself, that the award was too successful, I believe it is almost impossible to over-estimate the advantages of enjoying the fisheries that, fortunately for us, are contained in the jurisdictional waters of Canada. But, as I said before, unfortunately that treaty was abrogated. And, Sir, I must, in passing, pay my tribute to the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), who at that period led the Government of this country. It is well known that that hon. gentleman, in the discharge of what he conceived to be, and what undoubtedly was, the high duty that we owe to Canada in the high position he occupied, adopted measures to prevent that question of money ever being considered. The hon. gentleman sent one of his colleagues, or if not one of his colleagues at the time, a gentleman belonging to his party, of great ability and of great attainments, the late Hon. George Brown,—he sent him to Washington to co-operate with the British Minister at Washington, and once more he made a strenuous effort to settle this question of increased value of our fisheries over those of the United States, and over the advantages to be derived from having an opportunity of entering our fish free in the American market; I say, he obtained the appointment by Her Majesty's Government of the Hon. George Brown as commissioner, and that gentleman exhausted every effort in his power to carry out the views of the hon. member for East York, to again revive the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854. As that treaty had been refused on a former occasion, he went further than the lines of that treaty, and by introducing a certain number of articles to be passed free between the two countries, as well as the natural products of the two countries, he endeavored to enlarge and expand what had been obtained by the Treaty of 1854. I believe there was not a single item that was free under the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854, that the Hon. Mr. Brown did not embody in the treaty which he signed as to be made free between Canada and the United States, under the Treaty of 1874, which last treaty was arrived at between the two Governments. As I said before, and as I said the other day, I feel it is only right in passing to say, that the efforts to obtain the freest possible commercial intercourse between Canada and the United States, consistent with the rights and interests of the two Governments, is a policy that does not only belong to one party, but it is the property of both parties in this country. The hon. member for East York showed his hearty appreciation of the value of such a policy, when he was leading his Administration, just as much as my right hon. friend showed it on the occasion of going to Washington in 1871, and on all and every occasion when that question has come up for consideration. But the Senate rejected that treaty, or, at all events, did not take it up, and consequently we were thrown back upon arbitration; and I think it is a matter of sincere gratification, and always will be to the people of Canada, to know that after the most careful and painstaking examination, after taking all the sworn testimony that could be adduced on the side of the United States, and by Canada, and after the most careful consideration of that testimony, and the fullest consideration of the whole question, that international commission awarded no less than $5,500,000, or something approaching $500,000 per annum, as the value of the fisheries of Canada over and above those of the United States, and the additional advantage of having a free market in the United States for the fish of Canada. Now, Sir, under the circumstances, that Treaty of 1871 was abrogated on 1st July, 1885. But I must do the Government of the United States the credit to say that they seemed to be equally impressed with the Government of Canada as to the importance of avoiding the difficulties and collisions that were likely to arise out of the abrogation of that treaty, and as those difficulties were likely to again present themselves a measure was arranged jointly between the Government of the United States and the Government of Great Britain, on behalf of the Government of Canada, for the purpose of endeavoring to avoid those difficulties again presenting themselves. Past experience had shown both countries how exceedingly undesirable it was to have men like the fishermen of the two countries, who were away from home, who were not under such easy control as persons on land are, carrying out measures the end of which it might be very difficult to foresee; and at the suggestion of the British Minister, Mr. Bayard, the then distinguished and now equally distinguished Secretary of State of the United States, entered into a temporary arrangement whereby American fishermen were allowed the privileges of the treaty during the remainder of the season—that is, the season of 1885—with the understanding that the President should bring the question before Congress at its next session, and recommend a joint commission by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain to consider the question in the interest of good neighborhood and friendly intercourse between the two countries, thus affording a prospect of negotiating for the development and extension of trade between the United States and British North America. I use Mr. Bayard's words. The Government of Canada most readily assented to this view, and true to the policy that had been invariably pursued on both sides of this House, that of doing everything possible to promote trade relations between the two countries and to remove difficulties connected with the fisheries, the Government at once agreed that if the President would send to Congress a recommendation of the appointment of a commission having such object in view, they would allow the American fishermen to have free access to the fisheries of Canada, the same as they had enjoyed during the continuance of the treaty. President Cleveland, keeping good faith with the Government of Great Britain and Canada, sent a message to Congress on 5th December, 1885, premising that:

"In the interests of good neighborhood and of the commercial intercourse of an adjacent community, the question of the North American fisheries is one of much importance."

He recommended a commission:

"Charged with the consideration and settlement, upon a just, equitable and honorable basis, of the entire question of the fishing rights of the two Governments."

Unfortunately, the Senate did not approve the recommendation. The fishermen of Gloucester, who, naturally, I suppose, confined their attention to their own interests, and regardless of the effects of the course they proposed to pursue, at once petitioned Congress in the most earnest manner against any such proposal. They declared they did not want to have anything to do with the fishing grounds or waters of Canada, and they induced the Senate to reject the proposal by a vote of thirty to ten, and the proposal was rejected accordingly. We were then thrown back, necessarily, upon the only means of protecting the rights and interests of Canada. I may say that a very mistaken apprehension has arisen from the continuous exertions of all parties and classes in this country to obtain reciprocal trade relations with the United States. The policy of obtaining the free interchange of the natural products of the two countries, the products of the sea, of the forest, of the farm and of the mine, as I have said, has been continuously the policy of both parties in this country, and they have pressed that in season and out of season upon our great neighbors to the south of us. And that, unfortunately, has led to a very erroneous impression. When my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was compelled to adopt the same policy that had been adopted by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), who organised that department with great ability and who filled the position of Minister of Marine and Fisheries with equally great ability during a considerable time; I say when the Minister of Marine and Fisheries fell back upon the same policy his predecessor had adopted under like circumstances and took such measures as were absolutely necessary and indispensable for the protection of the rights and interests of the fishermen of Canada, the United States complained bitterly. Difficulties again took place. Fishermen, perhaps, are the most intractable and uncontrollable people in the world, and when a fisherman gets on board his little smack he thinks he is monarch of all he surveys, and he can go where he pleases, and do what he pleases. The result was that, as before, collisions occurred. Those parties brought themselves under the operation of the law, and it was absolutely necessary, as I have said, in the defence of Canadian fishermen, to make examples of those parties who showed that disregard for law. The result was, an entirely erroneous impression grew up throughout the United States. It was shared by the Government—by the Senate, by the House of Representatives. It was accepted by the great body of the people; and the press and the people of the United States, almost without exception, came to the conclusion, without a particle of ground to justify it, that Canada was enforcing a most harsh, ungenerous and unwarrantable construction of the terms of the Treaty of 1818, for the purpose of forcing reciprocal trade relations upon the United States. Hon. gentlemen opposite know that this became a universal sentiment in that country. One can understand the mass of the people in the United States sharing such an impression. People say, and at the outset it seems a reasonable proposition: "Why is it that the fishermen of the United States of America cannot obtain the same consideration in a United States port that a Canadian fisherman obtains in the United States port?" Well, Sir, the answer is obvious. The American Government renounced the right to enter our waters, as England and Canada never did renounce the right to enter the waters of the United States of America. The United States, in consideration of certain territorial rights over a portion of our country, in a part of Newfoundland and Labrador, and the Magdalen Islands, and in consideration of obtaining such territorial rights as I believe are unparalleled in the world in any other country, renounced forever the rights of their fishing vessels of any kind whatever to come into the jurisdictional waters of Canada or British North America, as it was then called, except for specified purposes, and then under such terms and conditions as would forever prevent their abusing those privileges which we allow them to enjoy. The press of the United States has conceded this, but you cannot make the mass of the people understand it, and it is astonishing how many men of standing and position in the United States never seem to have grasped that question that the fishermen of the United States occupy entirely a different position in the waters of Canada from that which the fishermen of Canada occupy in the waters of the United States. This was not done by an Act of the Government of this country, but one can see, Sir, how easy it is that the mass of the people, not understanding those terms, not understanding the character of this treaty, and not understanding the obligations which the Government of the United States had taken in regard to this question, should be misled. Then, Sir, another difficulty arose, and that was with reference to the rights that those fishing vessels should enjoy when in our waters. It was claimed by the Government of the United States, in 1818, that no commercial vessel could come into the waters of British North America from the United States, that there was no intercourse, that those were privileges given to the fishing vessels by that treaty beyond anything that was enjoyed by any other class of vessels. And when a changed condition of things came about; when the commercial arrangements of 1830 had entirely changed the status of their fishing vessels in our waters, under that commercial arrangement it was provided, that the trading vessels could enter freely the ports of British North America and the United States trading vessels could enter our ports. As there was no exemption or exclusion of fishing vessels, they claimed that rights had been acquired by the fishing vessels that entirely took them out of the category of the Treaty of 1818, under which they were restricted from going into our waters for any but the four purposes. I think, Sir, that that contention, upon examination, proves to be entirely unfounded. I do not think it would be possible for any constitutional lawyer to maintain that proposition for a single moment. The arrangement of 1830 was a commercial arrangement, founded upon an Act of Congress, on the one side, authorising the Government of the United States whenever the King in Council would admit United States vessels to the Bermudas, the Caicos, the British West Indies and the ports of British North America, including Newfoundland; that whenever the King in Council would, by proclamation, admit their vessels to our ports, they would admit our vessels in the same way to theirs. It was, therefore, a bilateral arrangement entered into and based upon an Act of Congress upon the proposition made by the President and upon the Order in Council made by the King. Now, Sir, the treaty is a superior instrument to that Order in Council, and that Order in Council is silent as to fishing vessels. The treaty solemnly declared that the people of the United States renounced forever the right to claim for a fishing vessel any such commercial privileges whatever. And under those circumstances it is a principle in law, constitutional as well as general law, and I believe accepted by all countries, that you cannot repeal and change and alter a specific provision by a general one unless some arrangement had been subsequently provided as to such specific provision. The general terms as to vessels in the commercial arrangement of 1830 and the absence of any reference to fishing vessels, left fishing vessels exactly in the same position as they were before. But, Sir, that was not the only ground. It was also claimed that under the clause of the Washington Treaty of 1871, to which my right hon. friend was a party, there was a bonding clause in that, and that this bonding clause provided that the United States vessels were authorised to tranship their cargoes in bond in the same way that Canadian vessels were allowed to tranship their cargoes in bond through the United States. But again, Sir, not only was there no reference made to fishing vessels being relieved from the renunciations of the Government of the United States under the Treaty of 1818, but there was the fact—as hon. gentlemen opposite, many of whom watched this matter at Halifax, well know—that when this question was raised and the representative of Canada said: "You are enjoying privileges here in the transhipment of fish under the treaty, and you are enjoying the advantage of buying bait and supplies of all kinds for your fishermen and under this treaty, you must consider what is due to the Government of Canada for those privileges which you enjoy." I say, Sir, that Mr. Foster, acting as the Agent of the Government of the United States, moved a resolution declaring that under the Washington Treaty, the Government of the United States had no such right and no such privilege to tranship a cargo of fish or buy bait or supplies of any kind whatever. Although during the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854 it had been freely permitted by the Government of Canada during the 12 years that the Washington Treaty was in force, they declared that under clause 29, as it stands there to-day, and under which this right is claimed, that they had no such privileges before the fishery clause was removed from that treaty, as it was by its abrogation. Therefore I say that when this matter comes to be examined, the House will see the position we occupy, the House will also see the difficult position we were in when we had the public mind of the United States inflamed by a misapprehension on this question. When we had the Government and Congress of the United States acting as one man in relation to this question, it will be at once appreciated how difficult and how serious this matter had become. Although we were not giving an ungenerous, nor not giving an extreme interpretation to the treaty at all, but that we were simply doing that which my hon. friend opposite found it necessary to do as his successor, that is to defend the just rights of the fishermen of Canada—and no Government would be worthy of the name of Government who would shrink for a single moment from that duty—the result was that because we took this action the sentiment of public men in the United States became inflamed, and instead of anything like increased freedom of commercial intercourse or of anything that was calculated to be of advantage or benefit to the two countries, they had recourse to the passage of what was called a Retaliatory Act. It was not a Retaliatory Act, but it was a Non-intercourse Act based upon an entire misapprehension of the position of the two countries and of the questions in relation to them. And as I said a year ago when standing here, it was an Act that was entirely uncalled for. Well, Sir, I took the opportunity of drawing the attention of this House at some little length to the position in which I stood in relation to that Non-intercourse Act. I said that it was the only cloud on the commercial horizon of Canada, and I pointed out the unwarrantable character, as I considered it, of the Act. I pointed out that it seemed to be founded on an entire misapprehension of what the position of Canada was in relation to this question. I was very severely criticised—if not by hon. gentlemen opposite, who are always extremely indulgent to me—by the press representing them, for that speech. It was stated to be a very offensive speech, and to have a tone that was calculated to be extremely irritating to the Government of the United States, and two or three leading and prominent newspapers in this country have from that day to this asserted that here in my place in Parliament I declared that non-intercourse would be a very good thing for Canada. Well, Sir, as I dare say you know, I do not often correct statements made in the press, however much they may misrepresent what I say or do; but I may here take the opportunity of saying that no man can read the speech I delivered on that occasion and find any foundation whatever for any such statement. I did state that it would become the imperative duty of the Government of Canada, in vindication of the rights of our fishermen, to adopt the policy of protecting our fisheries. I stated that there was no warrant for such an Act as had been passed in the United States; and as the best means of protecting ourselves against the effects of a policy so unjust and so injurious to everybody—so detrimental to the interests both of the United States and Canada—I pointed out that, fortunately for Canada, we had attained a position that did not leave us so entirely at the mercy of our neighbors to the south of us as we should otherwise have been. I pointed out that the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway had given the people of Canada means for the free intercourse of one Province and one part of our people with another, without their being forced to go through the United States of America. I used language as strong, I think, as could be used to show the opinion I had of such an Act, when I said:

“Deeply as we would deplore so mad and so unjustifiable an act on the part of a great country like this great Republic of the United States adopting such a barbarous policy as that of non-intercourse with a friendly power, we stand in the proud position of knowing that if that policy were adopted to-morrow, we have perfected our own lines of communication and have the most complete means of communication from the furthest and most remote section of our country down to the sea.”

I think, Sir, that that was calculated to show that we had to a certain extent protected ourselves from the ruinous position we should have been placed in if we had not those means of inter-communication; and I do not think that was inviting non-intercourse or intimating that it was a policy of which I approved. I said further:

“Now, intercourse would not be an unmixed evil. I would deeply deplore it; every member of the House and every intelligent Canadian would deeply deplore any interruption of the commercial relations which exist between this country and the United States, but I cannot forget that, if the policy of non-intercourse were adopted, it would lead to the development of those channels of communication between ourselves.”

In another place I said:

“While I most earnestly hope no such policy will be adopted.”

I thus call attention for a moment in passing to the language I then used in order to show that I was not guilty of the supreme folly that I would have been guilty of if I had spoken of non-intercourse between 60,000,000 of people of the United States of America and 5,000,000 on this side of the line as anything but what every intelligent Canadian would deplore, as I think every intelligent American ought to deplore it. But, Sir, I will just say that this speech does not seem to have been attended with the very unpleasant results that some people in this country feared, who thought it was pitched in too defiant a tone for a small people like the people of Canada, and was calculated to exasperate our neighbors and bring about those unfortunate results. All I can say is that those remarks received a very considerable amount of attention in the press of the United States. Some portions of them appeared in leading journals in the United States; and the result was, Sir, that instead of having any reason to suppose that I had been guilty of an indiscreet act in making the references which I felt, as a member of this House, I was bound to make in dealing with the position in which the country stood, the only result, so far as I am aware, was this. I do not know that the speech had any connection with it; but I know this, that a mutual friend—I have no objection to mentioning that it was Mr. Wiman—at an early day after this speech was delivered, intimated to me that he had had a long conversation with the Secretary of State of the United States, Mr. Bayard, and that that gentleman had said that he would be very glad to have an opportunity of discussing the mutual relations of Canada and the United States with either my right hon. friend the Premier of Canada or your humble servant. I brought that statement under the notice of His Excellency the Governor-General and my right hon. friend; and as it was quite impossible for him to leave his place in Parliament at that time, I took advantage of the Easter holidays to accept this informal invitation. I went down to Washington, and was presented to Mr. Bayard by Her Majesty's Minister there. Our conversation on that occasion, as you are aware, was personal and private, but the House will be able to gather what the effect of that conversation was, when I refer to the result. It was on the 21st of May that I had that interview with Mr. Bayard, and I can only say that it was a very gratifying one in every possible respect. That distinguished gentleman seemed fully to appreciate what he owed to the great country in which he filled the high function of Secretary of State, and he showed also his appreciation of the importance of maintaining the most friendly commercial relations with Canada. I am relieved, however, from any violation of secrecy in regard to that interview in view of the correspondence which occurred. Mr. Bayard told me that he would repeat our conversation to the President of the United States, and would communicate to me the result at an early day. On the 31st of May, I received a letter with which hon. gentlemen are all familiar. I will not trouble the House with reading the whole of it; but it is necessary, in order to give a proper view of the basis of the conference from which this treaty has resulted, that I should draw the attention of the House to some of the remarks made by Mr. Bayard in that letter. In his letter to me he said:

“The immediate difficulty to be settled is found in the Treaty of 1818 between the United States and Great Britain, which has been questioned ever since it was concluded, and to-day is suffered to interfere with and seriously embarrass the good understanding of both countries in the important commercial relations and interests which have come into being since its ratification, and for the adjustment of which it is wholly inadequate, as has been unhappily proved by the events of the past two years. I am confident we both seek to attain a just and permanent settlement—and there is but one way to procure it—and that is by a straightforward treatment on a liberal and statesmanlike plan of the entire commercial relations of the two countries. I say commercial, because I do not propose to include, however indirectly, or by any intendment, however partial or oblique, the political relations of Canada and the United States, nor to effect the legislative independence of either country.”

I am glad to know that Mr. Bayard had too much respect for the people of Canada, and he has since learned, in the most conclusive manner, that his views were well founded, to come to any other conclusion than that no Canadian would ever consent to be legislated for by any country in the world.

“When you were here I prepared to send my reply to the ‘observations’ upon my proposal for the settlement (of November 15 last), which were communicated to Mr. Phelps by Lord Salisbury on March 24, and also to express my views of his lordship's alternative proposition. Your visit and invitation to negotiate here was entirely welcome, and of this I endeavored to impress you. Conversation with the President has confirmed these views and now it remains to give them practical effect. Great Britain being the only treaty-making party to deal with the United States, the envoys of that Government alone are authorised to speak in her behalf and create her obligations. I presume you will be personally constituted a Plenipotentiary of Great Britain to arrange here, with whomsoever may be selected to represent the United States' terms of agreement, for a modus vivendi to meet the present emergencies and also a permanent plan to avoid all future disputes. It appears to me that as matters now stand the colony of Newfoundland ought to be represented and included, for a single arrangement should suffice to regulate all the joint and several interests involved. I should, therefore, be informed speedily through the proper channel as to the authorisation and appointment by the Imperial Government of such representatives.

"The gravity of the present condition of affairs between our two countries demand entire frankness. I feel we stand at 'the parting of the ways.' In one direction I can see a well assured, steady, healthful relationship, devoid of petty jealousies, and filled with the fruits of a prosperity arising out of a friendship cemented by mutual interests, and enduring because based upon justice; on the other, a career of embittered rivalry, staining our long frontier with the hues of hostility, in which victory means the destruction of an adjacent prosperity without gain to the prevalent party—a mutual, physical and moral deterioration which ought to be abhorrent to patriots on both sides, and which I am sure no two men will exert themselves more to prevent than the parties to this unofficial correspondence."

I replied on the 10th June to Mr. Bayard in the following terms. I will not trouble the House by reading the whole of the letter, but only such parts that will show the basis of this conference:

"MY DEAR MR. BAYARD,—I had great pleasure in receiving your letter of May 31, evincing as it does the importance which you attach to an amicable adjustment of the fisheries question and the maintenance of the cordial commercial relations between the United States and Canada, under which such vast and mutually beneficial results have grown up. I entirely concur in your statement that we both seek to attain a just and permanent settlement—and that there is but one way to procure it—and that is by a straightforward treatment on a liberal and statesmanlike plan of the entire commercial relations of the two countries. I note particularly your suggestions that as the interests of Canada are so immediately concerned, Her Majesty's Government should be invited to depute a Canadian statesman to negotiate with you a 'modus vivendi' to meet present emergencies and also a permanent plan to avoid all disputes,' and I feel no doubt that a negotiation thus undertaken would greatly increase the prospects of a satisfactory solution."

I concluded by saying:

"I have thought it my duty and also the most effectual manner of giving effect to your suggestion, to make known to Lord Lansdowne the purport of my correspondence with you. He is strongly desirous of facilitating a settlement, and will at once bring the matter before the Secretary of State, with an expression of his hope that no time will be lost in taking steps for establishing, by means of personal communications with your Government, a modus vivendi such as you have described, and also for arriving at an understanding in regard to a lasting adjustment of our commercial relations."

The result you know. I will read, in order to place the House in full possession of the exact state of affairs, an extract from Mr. Bayard's letter to Mr. Phelps, the American Minister in London:

"The visit here of Sir Charles Tupper, on behalf of the Canadian Government, was received with cordiality, and expressions were exchanged of a mutual desire for the settlement of all existing difficulties, and for the increased freedom of commercial intercourse between the United States and Canada. In consequence of the statement made by Sir Charles Tupper on the occasion referred to, I wrote him a personal and unofficial letter on 31st May, and received on 10th June his reply, and copies of this correspondence were duly sent to you. Yesterday, Sir Lionel West handed me, without comment, the following copy of a telegram to him from Lord Salisbury:

"If the Secretary of State will formally propose the appointment of a Commission as suggested by him in his correspondence with Sir Charles Tupper, Her Majesty's Government will agree with great pleasure."

'SALISBURY.'

"And I have just telegraphed you to the following effect:—

"PHELPS, Minister, London.

"Sir Lionel West handed me yesterday a telegram from Lord Salisbury agreeing to the negotiation suggested by him informally in correspondence with Sir Charles Tupper after his visit to this capital, and requesting me to make a formal proposal which will be forwarded to you at once."

'BAYARD.'

I intend to read but two other extracts as the only other parts of this correspondence which are pertinent to the subject:

"The number of plenipotentiaries to be employed on either side does not seem to be immaterial to the object in view. The Treaty of 1854 comprehended the same class of questions substantially, and as I have before remarked in my correspondence with you, was negotiated by the Earl of Elgin, at that time Governor General of Canada, and Mr. Wm. L. Marcy, then the Secretary of State for the United States. By referring also to our prior treaties with Great Britain, it will be found that the number of plenipotentiaries employed on either side varied, and was frequently unequal."

He further said:

"It is regarded by the President as of the highest importance that a distinct and friendly understanding should without delay be arrived at between the United States and Great Britain touching the question of the rights which belong respectively to the citizens of the United States and the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty in relation to the fisheries on the coasts of the British possessions in North America, and as to any other questions which affect the trade and commercial relations between the United States and those possessions. You are, therefore, instructed to propose to Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, the appointment of an Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, to meet in the city of Washington a Minister Plenipotentiary of the Government of the United States, duly authorized by the respective Governments to treat and discuss the mode of settling all questions which have arisen out of the fisheries on the coasts of British North America, and all other questions affecting the relations between the United States and Her Britannic Majesty's possessions in British North America."

The House having heard those extracts, will at once understand the circumstances under which this conference was brought about and plenipotentiaries appointed on both sides. Her Majesty's Government appointed the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain as leader of the conference on the British side; they appointed Her Majesty's Minister at Washington, Sir Lionel Sackville West, as the second plenipotentiary. The Colonial Minister sent a despatch to Lord Lansdowne, the Governor General of Canada, to say that the British Government wished the Government of Canada to say who would be acceptable as representing the Government of Canada at this conference, and it is only right to my right hon. friend (Sir John A. Macdonald) that I should say that they intimated, as it was very naturally to be expected they would, that the appointment to that position of the same distinguished gentleman, who had acted as a Joint High Commissioner in 1871 with such ability and success, would be entirely acceptable to Her Majesty's Government. I came out to Canada without the slightest idea whatever that I would be appointed in connection with this commission. I returned here after having discharged the duties which were incumbent on me and which I had been called upon to perform. Immediately, my right hon. friend told me that he was anxious that I should go to Washington as the third plenipotentiary. Lord Lansdowne was good enough to join in expressing his desire that I should fill that position. I daresay, if the truth were known, my right hon. friend here thought that having had so much to do with the negotiation of this conference, and representing, as I had the honor of representing in the Government of Canada, the interests of one of the most important of the Maritime Provinces, the Province of Nova Scotia, there was a certain fitness in my being called upon to discharge this duty. I thought that, under the circumstances, I could not decline, but I made it a condition that I should have the able and invaluable assistance of my colleague, the Minister of Justice, as the legal adviser of the British side at this conference, as I knew that matters of the greatest importance would arise in which the opinions and the advice and the knowledge of that hon. gentleman, his legal and constitutional knowledge, would be invaluable. With the utmost readiness, that hon. gentleman at once consented to associate himself with the Commission in that capacity; and I must at the same time tender my heartfelt thanks to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, whose province I was to a certain extent apparently invading, for the very zealous and hearty and valuable co-operation which his intimate knowledge of that subject enabled him to give us. I take this opportunity of saying that a statement which has been made by leading public journals in this country in reference to my own position on that occasion is erroneous. A good deal of sympathy has been expressed for me. I have already mentioned the great kindness which I have received even from my opponents in this country, but an amount of sympathy has been extended to me which I must disavow any occasion for. A great deal has been said and a great deal of sympathy has been expressed, as to the unfortunate position in which Sir Charles Tupper found himself in Washington in battling on the one side for the rights of Canada, and finding the pressure of Her Majesty's Government on the other side; and that in fact I was compelled, by the strong line which was taken by Her Majesty's representative, Mr. Chamberlain, to yield and surrender what it must have cost me a great deal of pain and suffering to do. I would be unworthy of the position I occupy in this House if I did not at once disavow anything of the kind. I do not think it would have been possible for Her Majesty's Government to make a better and a more judicious selection than they did in Mr. Chamberlain, as the leader of the British side in that conference. That hon. gentleman is one of the foremost statesmen in England; that right hon. gentleman, as the House very well knows, as the leader of the Radical party in Great Britain, was perhaps especially qualified, by the position he occupied in Imperial politics, to be an acceptable envoy to the United States of America; and, after three months of very intimate intercourse and association in the city of Washington, I have no hesitation in saying that I do not believe it would have been possible for Her Majesty's Government to select any gentleman who would have been more acceptable to all classes of people in that great capital. In regard to my own position in that conference, I have already shown the House how largely I am responsible for what has taken place. The conference was initiated from the interview which took place between myself and Mr. Bayard. I was subsequently asked to serve as one of Her Majesty's plenipotentiaries on that important mission; but I am bound to say that if, instead of the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain and Sir Lionel Sackville West, I had had as my colleagues two of the foremost statesmen of Canada, taken from either side of the House, it would have been impossible to have had the contentions of Canada more uniformly supported than they were from the beginning to the end. If there is any mistake, if this treaty is not what Canada had a right to expect it should be, I am bound to say that there is no man more responsible for that than myself. These hon. gentlemen, from the beginning to the end, stood by the interests of Canada in the most unflinching way. I have heard, in this House and out of this House, that it was desirable that the time should come when Canada could appoint her own plenipotentiaries and envoys to deal with the negotiation of treaties, but I speak from experience and from a knowledge of the facts when I say that a greater mistake it would be impossible to conceive. In the position which Canada occupies, great and important as it is, and with the great future we have undoubtedly before us in the development of the enormous resources of this country, while the time may come when we will be in a position which will enable us to go into an international conference with that power and influence which alone will qualify a plenipotentiary to negotiate with other countries, until that time comes, it is impossible to overrate the value of having the Empire of Great Britain behind us. A plenipotentiary is able to command just that amount of respect when he is fighting a keen and hard battle for his country, just that amount of influence and power which that country commands among the States of the world; and I say that, until we obtain that influence and that power, nothing would be more idle or detrimental or suicidal to the best interests of Canada than to divest ourselves or to be relieved from the potent influence of standing under the ægis of the mightiest Empire in the world. Now, I must say a single word with reference to my colleagues representing the Government of the United States. I have already given you a tolerable insight into the views of Mr. Bayard. That hon. gentleman, as the House knows, is the worthy representative of a long line of the most eminent statesmen in the United States, and no person in the Government of that country commands more uniformly or more deservedly the respect and confidence of the United States than the Hon. T. W. Bayard, the Secretary of State. In the Hon. W. L. Putnam, we had opposed to us a gentleman occupying so distinguished a legal position in New England that his name has been frequently heard within the last fortnight as the successor of that eminent jurist, the late Hon. Chief Justice of the United States; we had in him a gentleman more intimately acquainted with the fishing interests of the United States than almost any other gentleman who could be suggested, and whose legal standing and position are calculated to obtain the confidence and respect of all who know him. In the third plenipotentiary representing the United States, we had Mr. Angell, President of the Michigan University at Ann Arbor, a gentleman who, although a supporter of the Republican party, was selected in consequence of his great professional knowledge of international law, and the fact that he had been selected by a Republican Government in the United States to discharge most important duties as a Commissioner to China, in the arrangement of a treaty. I do not believe, Sir, that it would be possible for any Government in the United States to select three gentlemen more eminently patriotic, more heartily devoted to the interests of their country, than the three gentlemen I have named; and after sitting face to face with them for three months in keen and sharp controversy, the only result of our communication has been to leave upon my mind the very highest respect for the character, standing and ability of those gentlemen, and a desire not only of continuing the acquaintance which I had the pleasure of making with them, but that it should perpetuate a genuine and thorough friendship. I can only say, Sir, that when I came to meet them in conference, I was greatly surprised, and you will not be surprised to learn that such was the case after hearing the papers I have read with reference to commercial intercourse, after the statement of the President of the United States in his Message of 1885, asking for a commission, after the letters which passed between Mr. Bayard and myself, you will readily understand that I went there expecting and looking forward to a settlement of this question on very much the same lines as those upon which it had been settled in 1854, and to some extent, in 1871. I am right in saying that the instructions with which I was charged by this Government were to obtain, if it was possible, as near an approach to the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854 as I could obtain, that is, the policy of carrying out free exchange in the natural products of the two countries, I was to urge that policy, and I think you will have no doubt as to the course pursued by me after reading the proposition that I made in the conference on the 3rd December, 1887:

"Sir Charles Tupper begged leave to submit a note containing the following proposal from the British plenipotentiaries. That with a view of removing all causes of difference in connection with the fisheries, it is proposed by Her Majesty's plenipotentiaries that the fishermen of both countries shall have all the privileges enjoyed during the existence of the fishery articles of the Treaty of Washington, in consideration of mutual arrangement providing for greater freedom of commercial intercourse between the United States and Newfoundland."

It has been suggested that this is very vague. Well, I confess I am unable to see it. I considered that in formulating that proposal, I was bound to ascertain if the Government of the United States were prepared to accept any greater freedom of commercial intercourse, to ascertain to what extent they were prepared to meet Canada in order to secure for their fishermen the enjoyment of the advantage which they had under the Treaty of 1854, and under the Treaty of 1871. If that proposal does not formulate as broad and as general an invitation to the Government of the United States, as could be made, provided they were willing to deal upon a commercial basis at all, I should be very happy if any hon. gentleman will point out to me wherein the proposition is wanting. And what did Mr. Angell say?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The offer is unrestricted.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman says the offer is unrestricted, and I intended it should be so. I intended to give the Government of the United States the fullest opportunity of stating just how far they were prepared to go in reciprocal trade with Canada. I knew, Sir, that the air was full of stories of commercial union, full of stories of unrestricted intercourse, and I thought I could not do a better service to Canada, under these circumstances, than to ascertain at the very outset what was the position of the United States as to that question. I do not hesitate to tell you what that position is. Although I do not intend to make reference to a past debate, in which I regret very deeply I was not able to participate, although a large number of gentlemen dealt with that question on both sides of the House—and I think you were rather fortunate in not having another speech inflicted upon you on that occasion by myself—I shall make no reference to this; but I am bound to take this opportunity of saying that you may go to Washington, as I did, you may mingle for three months, as I did, with the leading men of all parties and all classes, you may go through the House of Representatives from beginning to end, and canvass every man, and you may go to the Senate of the United States and canvass every man, and I say you will not find a single man who will talk to you on the subject of unrestricted reciprocity, as I did not find at the time when public attention was being turned to it in this country.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). There are two Bills before Congress.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Was it not desirable that we should know what the views and sentiments of the United States were upon the subject? Talk to them, Sir, of commercial union—I tell you that I did not meet a man of any party, I did not meet an American statesman who would not hold up both hands for commercial union with Canada. Why, Sir? Because he knows that it would give Canada to the United States, he knows that you would occupy the degrading position of having a neighboring country make your tariff, and impose the taxes upon you. I say, Sir, that it is a condition of things from which the most craven Canadian would recoil. This proposition of unrestricted reciprocity, of free trade with the United States, with liberty to make our own tariff with the rest of the world, I say I did not meet a man—I discussed this question fully and freely from day to day with scores of leading public men in the United States—I did not meet a man with an intelligent head on his shoulders, that would talk about such a thing for a single moment. Why, Sir, they treated the very proposition with scorn. They said: "Do you suppose that we intend to make a free trade arrangement with Canada, to adopt free trade with England, and destroy the position that we occupy in relation to all the vast industries of this country? I say, Sir, that under these circumstances I did a service to Canada. And you have got the answer. You did not get from Mr. Bayard the statement: "If you will go the whole length of unrestricted reciprocity with us, if you will make everything free, then we will talk with you." Nothing of the kind. Here is the answer, coming from the leader of the Administration of the United States, which conclusively shows that—I was going to say, but I won't say it, after the interesting and animated discussion we had in this House, I will not say that it was a waste of time to take up a fortnight of the time of Parliament in discussing that which it is just as rational as to have been discussing how to construct a railway from Canada to the moon. The answer is here:

"While continuing their proposal heretofore submitted—on the 20th ultimo—and fully sharing the desire of Her Britannic Majesty's plenipotentiaries to remove all causes of difference in connection with the fisheries, the American plenipotentiaries are constrained, after careful consideration, to decline to ask from the President authority requisite to consider the proposal conveyed to them on the 3rd instant as a means to the desired end, because the greater freedom of commercial intercourse so proposed would necessitate an adjustment of the present tariff of the United States by congressional action, which adjustment the American plenipotentiaries consider to be manifestly impracticable of accomplishment through the medium of a treaty under the circumstances now existing."

I will give the hon. gentlemen something further that will be still more conclusive:

"Nor could the American plenipotentiaries admit that such a mutual arrangement as is proposed by Her Britannic Majesty's plenipotentiaries could be accepted as constituting a suitable basis of negotiation concerning the rights and privileges claimed for American fishing vessels. It still appears to the American plenipotentiaries to be possible to find an adjustment of differences by agreeing on an interpretation or modification of the Treaty of 1818, which will be honorable to both parties and remove the present causes of complaint to which end they are now—as they have been from the beginning of this conference—ready to devote themselves."

Mr. Bayard gives a further illustration of the position in his letter to the Senate. It is dated Washington, 22nd March, and in it he says:

"In conformity with the invariable course pursued in previous negotiations, when the conference met it was agreed that an honorable confidence should be maintained in its deliberations, and that only results should be announced and such other matters as the joint protocolists should sign under the direction of the plenipotentiaries. With this understanding, which was strictly kept, the discussions of the conference proceeded, through its numerous and prolonged session, with that freedom and informality in the exchange of views which the nature of the negotiations required and without which its progress would have been materially hampered and any agreement rendered very difficult of attainment."

"Upon the conclusion of the treaty some members of the conference at once left the city under the pressure of other duties, and it is thus possible that some statements were excluded that otherwise might have been placed in the joint protocols."

I have explained to the House my great surprise at finding they did not give what I assumed that the purely formal protocols to which I assented would give, that is to say, all the proposals made, and the counter-proposals and the replies on both sides. I assumed that the protocols would contain those. Mr. Bayard has explained how it was that this was done.

"After the conference had finally adjourned and Sir Charles Tupper had returned to Ottawa, a request was received through the British Minister that assent be given to the publication of a certain proposal which had been submitted by the British plenipotentiaries and decided by the Americans. The consent as desired was given, and I enclose herewith a copy of the papers so referred to. Every point submitted to the conference is covered by the papers now in the possession of the Senate."

I wish the House to note that. Although we have not given any proposals and counter-proposals, here is the statement, which I confirm as being thoroughly and entirely accurate, that the papers submitted to the Senate, as the papers submitted to you give all the information necessary for the consideration of this question.

"Excepting the question of damages sustained by our fishermen, which, being met by the counter-claim for damages to British vessels in Behring's Sea, was left for future settlement."

President Angell, who was one of the commissioners, after he returned home, made the following observations:—

"We were a long time getting down to the real work of the commission, all the parties interested were so varied. The British and Canadian commissioners were especially anxious to make a reciprocal free trade treaty a part of the treaty before they would settle on the fishery question. More than one-half the time was occupied in this manner. The real work has been done within the last month. We told them over and over that the tariff was a matter which must be settled by Congress, and that we could do nothing about it. I must say, if this treaty is not ratified by the Senate they will make a great mistake."

I give you President Angell's statement, and I will now give the House a still more authoritative statement, bearing on the same subject. I have here the report of the Judicial Committee of the House of Representatives, to whom was referred the question as to the power of the President to negotiate treaties with foreign governments. This report is No. 2680, 43 Congress, 2nd Session :

"Mr. Tucker, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report :

"The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives embodied in this report, respectfully submit their report thereon."

"The resolution is in these words :

"Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be directed to report to the House whether the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, can negotiate treaties with foreign Governments by which the duties levied by Congress on importations can be changed or abrogated."

"The question thus referred to the Committee is one of great importance in its relations to our foreign intercourse and our internal Government."

"Your Committee have thus considered the question on the true interpretation of the language of the constitution; upon the construction of the Government itself; on the historic developments of the constitution from its British original through the articles of Confederation to its present form; on analogy to the British prototype; on precedents and the authority; and have come to the conclusion expressed in the following resolution, which, though the discussion has taken a wider range, is confined to the question submitted by the resolution referred to the committee :

"Resolved, that the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, cannot negotiate treaties with foreign Governments by which the duties levied by Congress can be changed or abrogated, and such treaties to be operative as law must have the sanction of an Act of Congress."

I have therefore shown the grounds on which the United States plenipotentiaries are refused in the most positive manner, as they have stated in their reply over and over again, to take up the question of trade relations. You may ask me then what Mr. Bayard meant by using the words "these commercial questions and this commercial intercourse between the two countries." I confess I was misled. I confess frankly I took the same view as hon. gentlemen would take, I think, on reading his letter to me and my letter to him and his instructions to Mr. Phelps, and I was not prepared to be met by an absolute refusal on the part of the United States plenipotentiaries to take up and consider the question of commercial intercourse at all. But the explanation was this, and I think it is right and fair that in his absence I should give it. Mr. Bayard states now, and has stated throughout, his great desire to have the freest commercial intercourse between the two countries consistent with the position and interest of the two countries. He says, if you want to see the policy of the Government of the United States you have it in the President's Message to Congress; there is our policy. Our policy is to meet this enormous surplus of revenue in the United States, not by a reduction which will strike at the labor and capital of the country by reducing the duty on manufactured articles simply and purely, but it is to meet it by two courses—by making everything that operatives use cheap, by making it free, by making the natural products of the two countries free; in other words, by removing the duties from the food and things that are used by operatives, and by removing the duties from raw materials, which instead of directly aiding the manufacturing industries is a protective policy. I say, Sir, that after studying the policy of the United States, the Democratic—the free trade party of the United States as they are very improperly called, for there is no free trade party in the United States, they have got beyond that long ago—after examining their policy, after reading the President's message, after reading the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, after reading the speech of Mr. Carlisle, the Speaker of the House of Representatives on taking the chair, I have come to the conclusion that their policy is just as close to the policy of the Government of Canada as any two things possibly can be. Our policy is to make natural products free, our policy is to make raw materials free, our policy is to make the country as cheap a country as we can for the artisan, and at the same time to give his labor such a return, by such protection of the manufacturing industries of the country, as will build up those manufactures and give employment to the people. Now, Sir, that is our policy. Mr. Bayard and those other gentlemen said that "there is only one way to reach this (for Congress alone can take the duty off any article), and on account of the exasperation that has been excited in this country by those fishery difficulties you have seen the result, you have got an unanimous Bill passed by the House of Representatives and passed by the Senate and assented to by the President, you have got a Bill to meet what they hold was the inhospitable conduct, (they used good deal stronger terms in some of their State papers I am very sorry to say), of Canada in reference to the treatment of their fishermen, our representatives have said that they would never purchase from Canada any immunity for their fishermen by reciprocal trade arrangements" imbued (and improperly imbued), as their minds were, with the idea that we had adopted that policy to force reciprocity upon them. They imagined we did it for this purpose instead of doing it as we did it to protect our rights. While we were ready to have the freest commercial intercourse in the natural products of the two countries we never attempted to use that as a means or as a lever by which to coerce the people of the United States. We were simply and wholly animated by a desire to protect as we were bound to do the fishermen of this country who are engaged in one of our greatest and most important industries. Well, Sir, what was this Bill? It not only provided for shutting Canadian fishing vessels of all descriptions out of their ports but it contained a provision against all interchange of trade. Here is one of the provisions :

"That whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that American fishermen are visiting or being in the waters or at any ports or places of the British Dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied or abridged in the enjoyment of any rights secured to them by treaty or law, or are or they lately have been unjustly vexed or harassed in the enjoyment of such rights, or subjected to unreasonable restrictions, regulations or requirements in respect to such rights; or otherwise unjustly vexed or harassed in said waters, ports or places, or whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that any such fishing vessels or fishermen having a permit under the laws of the United States to touch and trade at any port or ports, place or places, in the British Dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied the privilege of entering such port or ports, place or places, in the same manner and under the same regulations as may exist therein applicable to trading vessels of the most favored nations, or shall be unjustly vexed or harassed in respect thereof, or otherwise be unjustly vexed or harassed therein, or shall be prevented from purchasing such supplies as may there be lawfully sold to trading vessels of the most favored nation; or whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that any other vessels of the United States, their masters or crews so arriving at or being in such British waters or ports or places in the British Dominions of North America are or then lately have been denied any of the privilege therein accorded to the vessels, their masters or crews of the most favored nation or unjustly vexed or harassed in respect of the same, or unjustly vexed or harassed therein by the authorities thereof, then, and in either or all of such cases it shall be lawful and it shall be the duty of the President of the United States in his discretion, by proclamation to that effect, to deny vessels, their masters and crews of the British Dominions of North America, any entrance into the waters, ports or places of or within the United States (with such exceptions in regard to vessels in distress, stress of weather or needing supplies as to the President shall seem proper) whether such vessels shall have come directly from said dominions on such destined voyage or by way of some port or place in such destined voyage elsewhere;—"

And this point covering complete non-intercourse with the entire country.

—"and also to deny entry into any port or place of the United States of fresh fish or salt fish or any other product of said dominions or other goods coming from said dominions to the United States."

That was the law placed upon the Statute-book of the United States by the unanimous vote I believe of both the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States. If there was a "no" at all it was a single one. That expressed the sentiments and the feeling in the United States of America, and our friends the plenipotentiaries representing the United States, said: "If we make a treaty with you, however small the inducement, you might be willing to accept and consent to it, is certain of absolute rejection by the Senate, because the Congress of the United States have stated their position firmly, and they will not permit any interference on the part of the Administration of the United States by treaty, with anything that involves a change in the fiscal laws of the United States. They said secondly that not only was that the case but such was the expression of public men in regard to Canada and the treatment by Canada of their fishermen, that if to-morrow any relaxation of the commerce of the United States was made by an Act of Congress it would contain a clause excepting Canada from its operations so as to deny us its advantage. But they say our policy is proclaimed on the house tops, you will read it in the President's speech, you will see it everywhere, our policy is as far as we can to make the natural products that come into the country free and what lies in the way of that policy is this irritation connected with the fishery question. If we can solve that, if we can take that out of the way you will find at once that our own independent policy; the policy of the United States on this question of commercial intercourse will be such as to produce the most intimate commercial relations again with the Dominion of Canada." And, Sir, under those circumstances, denied as we were the free consideration of the question, of which fact I have given you abundant evidence, we turned our attention to the only means by which we could avert what everybody would feel would be the greatest disaster that could befall this country. We turned our attention to the means by which it could be averted and those were the removal of those causes of irritation between the United States and Canada (for it was Canada rather than Great Britain that was referred to) and by removing those causes of irritation, and giving free scope to this policy to which they were committed, we believe that it would at a very early day give us everything that we could desire in the way of greater freedom of commercial intercourse. Now, Sir, I am in somewhat a similar position in explaining this treaty, which I have now reached, to that in which I was in 1871 when defending the treaty of my right hon. friend under somewhat different circumstances. Then I said: "Every word that you force us to say in support of this treaty will be used against us at Halifax in diminution of the payment that we are entitled to for the greater value of our fisheries." To-day I am in a somewhat similar position. For every word that I say in defence of the treaty to which I have put my hand and to which I ask the sanction of this House with the utmost confidence, every word that I say in support of it may be used to-morrow in the Senate of the United States, where support to the treaty may be more difficult to obtain than it is in the House of Commons of Canada. The House will, therefore, understand that on this occasion it cannot be expected from me that I shall point out very elaborately the great advantages accruing to Canada under the treaty to which we have placed our hands. What I say is this—I say, Sir, that the course that has been adopted in reference to this treaty has been adopted with a view to secure in the way that was found practicable, the best interests of Canada. I am told, in fact I received a message, that the hon. leader of the Opposition wished me to lay on the Table of the House a map showing what Canada claimed under the Treaty of 1818 in regard to the headland question, and another map to show what the result of this treaty was—how much we had surrendered, or how much we had secured. I can only say that I am not able to respond to that invitation, for this reason, that this treaty provides, in regard to the delimitation, that the work shall be done by commissioners, two appointed on each side, eminent men of high qualifications, who shall mark on British admiralty charts the lines as they are laid down and agreed to in the treaty. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition will at once see that it would not do for me to anticipate the action of that court of delimitation, or to undertake in advance to set aside the important work with which they are charged, and give exactly my view of it.

Mr. LAURIER. I have seen it done.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He has seen it done, and he has seen it done in this very case. I have seen in the New York Herald—I do not know who gave it to them—the delimitation marked; and I have seen in the Globe newspaper that very enterprising journal which gives so much attention to these important questions—this question of delimitation dealt with, and a map published showing the results of the delimitation, both as to Newfoundland and as to Canada. Now, I do not intend to endorse the letter-press of this article, which declares that there has been a complete surrender of Canadian interests by your humble servant; but I will say this much, that this is a very good effort on the part of an enterprising journal to put before the country the results of the delimitation as described in the treaty. It is very specifically described in the treaty, and those who study this map attentively, will, I think, be able to form a very fair idea of the results—quite as good as they would from any unauthorised map which I could have constructed, and which I would have no right to lay before the House. I do not think it was a complete surrender, and I will briefly tell the House why. But before proceeding to that matter, I may say that there was one subject on which I was glad to find that the American plenipotentiaries, and myself especially were entirely as one. They expressed no wish to acquire the right to fish in the jurisdictional waters of Canada. With that expression of opinion on their part I heartily concurred. I believe, Sir, it would have been difficult to obtain any possible treaty that could repay Canada for having her inestimable fishing grounds thrown open again to United States fishermen. With the recent modes of catching fish by means of purse seines, my fear would be that if our fishing grounds were thrown open to our neighbors to the south of us, in ten or fifteen years we should have very little more fisheries than they have. I believe such an event would lead to their destruction, and, therefore, I was very glad to find that there was no desire in the part of the United States to acquire the right to fish in the inshore grounds of Canada; and I want it to be kept steadily in view that in all the arrangements provided by this treaty, Canada holds for Canadians her fishing grounds for their own exclusive use and benefit; and, Sir, with the intelligence, the industry, and the enterprise of our people, I am quite certain that they will be able under the provisions of this treaty to hold their own anywhere. I will now, Sir, proceed to deal with the subject of the treaty itself, and I take up first the most important question, that of delimitation. I need not tell you that that is a question which for seventy years has been an open sore. It is a question, which from the day the Treaty of 1818 was signed down to the present hour, as my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) knows, has been a most fertile cause of discussion between the United States and Great Britain and Canada. The Americans have maintained from the very outset that what we termed our exclusive right to shut them out of all bays was not well founded in the treaty. They have maintained for seventy years that they had an indefeasible right under that treaty to approach within three miles of the shore of any bay or indentation. My hon. friend shakes his head; but I hold in my hand authorities, and I could give them to him by the score, in which they have again and again maintained that position, and demanded that right.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did not Great Britain for forty years enforce her construction of that Treaty of 1818?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I can only say that nobody knows better than my hon. friend that Great Britain induced him to recall his regulations and instructions, after he had issued them, and restricted his jurisdiction to within three miles of the shore.

Mr. MITCHELL. And why? Because Great Britain could control the Government of this country, and I had to do it; that is why.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Never mind. My hon. friend's enquiry was as to the position of Great Britain, and I give it to him. Great Britain has always contended, and has rightly contended, for technical exclusion from any bay, and the Crown officers of England have sustained that contention. But my hon. friend knows that it is one thing to hold a technical construction, and it is another to undertake to enforce it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the hon. gentleman let me put one question to him? He states that Great Britain has held a technical construction of the Treaty of 1818. I would say that Great Britain has actually enforced her technical construction for forty years. And with reference to what the hon. gentleman says about exclusion from bays, the first decision was given in reference to the Bay of Fundy, where the headland on one side was American and the headland on the other was Canadian or Nova Scotian. That was the first give-away of our treaty rights.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My hon. friend then means that for the first forty years Great Britain held a particular view which she has abandoned for the last forty years.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not mean that. I will say what I mean if the hon. gentleman will let me. I say that for the first forty years Great Britain legitimately enforced that contention and the Americans recognised it. Under the decision in the case of the Bay of Fundy, one side of which was American and the other side Nova Scotian, it was held that that bay was not exclusively an English bay, and upon the decision in that case our rights were given away and suspended by England, and were not enforced as strictly as they had been before.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Well, I do not intend to be drawn into a discussion by my hon. friend, because I do not question very much his statement; but I want to ask him whether he thinks a right which is technically claimed but practically abandoned for forty years, is gaining in strength. I take a different view. But perhaps my hon. friend will allow me to proceed, and reserve his remarks for a future period. On the 17th September, 1841, Lord Stanley wrote to Lord Falkland—

"Her Majesty's Government have attentively considered the representations contained in your despatches, respecting the policy of granting permission to the fishermen of the United States to fish in the Bay of Chaleurs, and other large bays of a similar character on the coast of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia; and apprehending, from your statement, that any such general concession would be injurious to the interests of the British North American Provinces, we have abandoned the intention we had entertained on the subject, and shall adhere to the strict letter of the treaties which exist between Great Britain and the United States, relative to the fisheries in North America, except in so far as they may relate to the Bay of Fundy, which has been thrown open to the North Americans under certain restrictions."

So that Lord Stanley, intimated practically that what was done in the bay of Fundy was to be the rule.

Mr. MITCHELL. No.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The very opposite.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He says in so many words that this was what they had intended but that they had abandoned the idea upon representation.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Let the hon. gentleman read it again.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER:—

"Mr. Everett thought that the negotiations were now in a most favorable state —"

That is, after the Bay of Fundy was given up.

"—for a full and satisfactory adjustment of the dispute.

He had the fullest assurance that the British Government contemplated a further extension of the same policy by the adoption of a general regulation that American fishermen should be allowed freely to enter all bays of which the mouths were not more than six miles in width."

In May, 1845, Lord Stanley communicated this intention to Lord Falkland, who immediately replied. Then Nova Scotia came forward, and Canada came forward, and the result of their firm remonstrances, based on this constitutional right, was that he receded from the intention to allow the Americans to go within three miles of the shore, and decided to maintain the original contention.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is what I said exactly. I come to this question, and, as I said before, no public officer, in my judgment, no Minister, ever exhibited more zeal or ability in the management of his department than did my hon. friend.

Mr. MITCHELL. Never mind that.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. From the time it was organised under his charge he showed the greatest possible determination to hold on to all that he had, and to get as much as he could in the interests of Canada. Now, I will draw the attention of my hon. friend and the House to the fact that, actuated by that motive, in 1870, he sent out the following instructions:

"In such capacity your jurisdiction must be strictly confined within the limit of three marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of Canada, with respect to any action you may take against American fishing vessels and the United States citizens engaged in fishing."

Mr. MITCHELL. Under instructions from England.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No. This is before the pressure, as the hon. gentleman will see, but he went on trying to get in the thin end of another wedge, and I commend his attempt. He said:

"Where any of the bays, creeks, or harbors, shall not exceed ten geographical miles in width, you will consider that the line of demarcation extends from headland to headland, either at the entrance of such bay, creek, or harbor, or from and between given points on both sides thereof, at any place nearest the mouth, where the shores are less than ten miles apart; and may exclude foreign fishermen and fishing vessels therefrom, or seize, if found within three marine miles of the coast."

Then he went on to give the jurisdiction and the action that should be taken under it; and the bays from which he instructed his officers to exclude American fishing vessels are those ten miles in width. What since? We have a despatch from Lord Granville to the Governor General:

"Her Majesty's Government hopes that the United States fishermen will not be for the present prevented from fishing except within three miles from land or in bays which are less than six miles broad at the mouth."

That is the answer to the instructions. My hon. friend, I grant you, was under compulsion; he was, I grant you, under pressure from Her Majesty's Government; but that only makes the case stronger from my standpoint, and my standpoint is that in the position we occupy, dependent upon Her Majesty's Government for that right arm, and strength, and power, which will enforce a regard for the interests of the people of this country, we must have some deference for Her Majesty's Government. Considering that fostering care which Her Majesty's Government have at all times given the interests of Canada, we are bound to reciprocate by meeting any just claim for consideration from the party which is mainly involved in our contentions. Therefore, I say my hon. friend was right, but he did withdraw that instruction, and he issued in its place the following instructions, as contained in a report of Council:—

"The Council is aware that when the British Government in 1845 opened the Bay of Fundy to American fishermen, as an amicable relaxation of treaty rights, the act was officially regarded as a practical abandonment by American authorities of the British construction of the Convention of 1818. It was immediately followed by a demand for general application to all intends exceeding six miles in width."

So that I say to my hon. friend that I gave in his own terms, as sustaining the statement that I made of the demand of the Government of the United States to have access to our waters within three miles of the shore, whether in bays or out of bays.

Mr. MITCHELL. I promised not to interrupt the hon. gentleman, and I will not; but I will simply say that I have a complete answer to that.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No doubt the hon. gentleman is so ingenious that he could answer himself over and over again.

Mr. MITCHELL. He is so careful in his public capacity that he can do it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have no fault to find with my hon. friend in his public capacity. I have a great deal more fault to find with him in his private capacity, as sitting on the other side of the House.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do you think there is much difference between us.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Here is a despatch from Downing Street, dated 6th June 1870:

"Her Majesty's Government are fully aware that no step should be taken which should prejudice the question."

I want to draw the attention of the House to the fact that this was not a settled or concluded question, that it was not a question upon which the Governments of Great Britain and the United States had agreed or on which they had arrived at a common interpretation; and I want to draw my hon. friend's attention to the doubt that Her Majesty's Government had upon the subject. What do they say?

"Her Majesty's Government are fully aware that no steps should be taken which should prejudice the question—what are Canadian waters? Or should admit the right of United States fishermen to fish within those waters except within the limits prescribed by the Convention of 1818."

But they do not abandon the hope that the question of abstract right may yet be avoided by some arrangement between Canada and the United States, or that the limits may be definitely settled by arbitration or otherwise; and while any expectation of this kind exists, they desire to avoid all occasions of dispute, so far as this is possible, consistently with the substantial protection of the Canadian fisheries. With those objects, they think it advisable that United States fishermen should not be excluded from any waters except within three miles from the shore, or in the unusual case of a bay which is less than six miles wide at its mouth but spreads to a greater width within. It will, of course, be understood and explained to the United States Government that this liberty is conceded temporarily and without prejudice to the right of Great Britain to fall back on her treaty rights, if the prospect of an arrangement lessens, or if the concession is found to interfere practically with the protection of the Canadian fisheries. That was also a despatch from Lord Granville. Now, under the pressure of this, as my hon. friend has stated, he changed his instructions in reference to the ten miles and put in six miles, and forbade his officers to interfere with the American fishermen, not as in the first instructions he gave, if they were within three miles of the mouth of the bay, but only if they were within three miles of the shore, and he says:

"Until further instructed, therefore, you will not interfere with any American fishermen unless found within three miles of the shore, or within three miles of a line drawn across the mouth of a bay or creek, which, though in parts more than six miles wide, is less than six geographical miles in width at its mouth. In the case of any other bay, as Baie des Chaleurs, for example —"

The very bay he excluded them from was more than ten miles wide.

—"you will not interfere with any United States fishing vessel or boat or any American fishermen, unless they are found within three miles of the shore."

Mr. MITCHELL. Under positive instructions from England, against my representations and everything else.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think I have satisfied my hon. friend that, as far as Her Majesty's Government were concerned, while they maintained the abstract right under the treaty, they were unwilling to raise the question of bays, and the result is, as my hon. friend knows, that for the last thirty-four years, certainly since 1854—and I will not go further back than 1854—there has been no practical interference with American fishing vessels unless they were within three miles of the shore, in bays or elsewhere.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will his honor allow me to ask him one question?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would ask the hon. gentleman not to do it now. I was in hopes to finish by 6 o'clock and I am sure the House will sympathise with me in that desire. This Government instead of considering this as a question passed beyond controversy, did what? The hon. gentleman was a member of the Government at the time, and the Government deputed Mr., now Sir Alexander Campbell to go to Lord Kimberley and ask for the appointment of a commission on which England and the United States and Canada would be represented, to settle what was the correct view in reference to the British bays, to settle this very question of delimitation.

Mr. MITCHELL. Oh, no, not that.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MITCHELL. For the purpose of maintaining colonial rights to the fisheries as claimed by England.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will read from a despatch of Lord Kimberley:

"Mr. Campbell brought under my consideration the following subjects:—The first was the protection of the Canadian fisheries from encroachments by foreign fishing vessels. On this point I concur with your Ministers, that it would be desirable that the questions which have been so long in dispute with the United States, as to the geographical limits of the exclusive fishing rights of Canada under the Treaty of 1818, should be settled, by a joint British and American commission, on which the Dominion should be represented. Her Majesty's Government will propose to the United States Government the appointment of such a commission."

I give that to the House as the proof that, so far from this being regarded as a question upon which no question could arise, it was not so treated. Lord Kimberley, in a despatch of the 10th October, 1870, said:

"The object of Her Majesty's Government is, as you will observe, to give effect to the wishes of your Government, by appointing a joint commission, on which Great Britain, the United States and Canada are to be represented, with the object of enquiring what ought to be the geographical limits of the exclusive fisheries of the British North American colonies. In accordance with the understood desire of your advisers, it is proposed that the enquiry should be held in America."

And then there is a memorandum from the Foreign Office giving the reasons for the appointment of that commission, and from that I will read a single sentence:

"The right of Great Britain to exclude American fishermen from waters within three miles of the coast is unambiguous, and, it is believed, uncontested. But there appears to be some doubt what are the waters described as within three miles of bays, creeks, and harbors. When a bay is less than six miles broad, its waters are within the three miles limit, and therefore clearly within the meaning of the treaty; but, when it is more than that breadth, the question arises whether it is a bay of Her Britannic Majesty's dominions."

I hope I have satisfied the House that, so far from the question of delimitation, when we took it up at Washington, being one on which no question could be raised, it was an open question in which Canada and Great Britain on the one side maintained an extreme contention, and the United States Government maintained the very reverse, which was also an extreme contention.

Mr. MITCHELL. Nothing of the kind.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If I have not made it clear to the hon. gentleman, I am sure I have not been so unfortunate with the rest of the House. Now, what more? The hon. gentleman knows that, in the first place, the Government of Canada had agreed to a commission to ascertain what these rights were. Would we agree to a commission to ascertain whether a foot of land in Canadian territory was ours or belonged to some one else? The hon. gentleman knows that we would not, but we did agree to this commission. My hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) seemed a little while ago to be somewhat restive as to whether there was any doubt at all on this subject. A great many members in this House will recollect that, when the Treaty of Washington had been arranged, that hon. gentleman moved in this House that, before the Halifax Commission should sit, the doubts respecting our geographical limits should first be settled. I am not saying that I did not agree with him, but I say that at that time the question was not raised properly, and I opposed him, and I gave my reasons for so opposing him. If you look at the debates of that date, you will find, in the statements made by my right hon. friend the leader of the Government and those of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, the desire was expressed that these doubts, which undoubtedly did exist, should be set at rest, but we did not think the time opportune before the sitting of that Halifax Commission. When we changed sides, and the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) sat on this side of the House, with the hon. member who, I regret to know, is no longer able to lead that side of the House, after having pressed upon us the vital importance of having this question settled before the Halifax Commission sat, they forgot all about it. When they had to deal with the responsibilities of office, and to discharge the duties which rest upon Ministers of the Crown, they agreed with us that it was not desirable to raise the question before the sitting of the Halifax Commission, and they have allowed it to sleep until now. I am frank to say that the British plenipotentiaries now have made concessions.

Mr. MITCHELL. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear," but did he ever hear of any two nations, or of any two individuals, who had a difficulty or controversy between them, going into an arrangement to have it amicably settled and adjusted without both sides giving way in some degree or other? I think the very spirit and policy of this omission which was proposed, was to ascertain, to settle and to rule these doubts, and I say, when we met these gentlemen and they proposed to us this ten mile limit, and said: If you give up the extreme contention that no bay, however broad its mouth, can be entered by an American fisherman, we will agree to take the ten mile limit, and when they met us further and said that, in addition to that they would take up and consider the question of any special bays we thought ought not to be open to foreigners, then we took this question up, as we were bound to take it up, and found a solution by mutual concession. Instead of giving them their contention that they could go into the Baie des Chaleurs within three miles of the shore, we made a treaty by which they cannot enter the Baie des Chaleurs at all. And the hon. gentleman knows that the Miramichi Bay, the Egmont Bay, and a number of other bays that we consider of vital importance to be kept free from any kind of intrusion, have been conceded to us on the one side. We met them in a spirit of concession. I have no hesitation in saying that I believe that when we parted, and long before we parted, we were animated by the conviction that we owed it to the countries we represented, by mutual concessions, as far as could possibly be done, to find such a solution as would settle these questions that have disturbed the intercourse and threatened the peace of the two greatest English-speaking nations of the world, on the best terms that we could possibly find.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Will the hon. gentleman tell us the meaning of article 5?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman will possess his soul in patience for a little while, I will try to do so. What is article 5? If the hon. gentleman has it in his hands, perhaps he will read it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).—

"Article V.—Nothing in this treaty shall be construed to include within the common waters any such interior portions of any bays, creeks, or harbors as cannot be reached from the sea without passing within the three marine miles mentioned in Article I of the Convention of October 20, 1818."

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am obliged to my hon. friend for his question, and I will give him a most explicit and, I am quite sure, a satisfactory answer. I hold the delimitation of a bay in my hands. It is imaginary, it is true, but it is none the less just what you may meet with at the mouth of any bay. This bay is fifteen miles from mainland to mainland, and yet under the instructions of my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) not to go within three miles of the shore, they could not get into that bay. Why? Because there is an island in the mouth of the bay, and the island carries its three miles of mainland stretched around it, the same as the mainland. I will send it over to my hon. friend to show him just what that article means, and the reason why it was necessary, in order to provide for a possible contingency by which a bay being fifteen miles wide, they could not get into it now. I said: You do not propose by that ten-mile arrangement to enter a bay that you could not enter upon the six-mile arrangement, do you? Certainly not. Then I gave them this delimitation, and that was put in the treaty for the purpose of giving effect to it, and to prevent giving any possible uncertainty. Now, Sir, as I said before, we were met in a broad and liberal spirit, and I think the sentiment that animated us on both sides was that we owed it to each other and to the countries we represented, not to quarrel over points that could be satisfactorily adjusted, and that if it were possible to find a solution that would be equitable to both countries and advantageous to all, it was our duty to find that solution, and to agree upon terms that we could honorably ask Great Britain on the one side, and the United States on the other, and Canada, to accept, as a great improvement upon the existing condition of things. Therefore, as I said, all made the concession, not of any thing that has been enforced practically by Canada, but the technical right to exclude from bays that were more than six miles wide.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before passing away entirely from the subject of delimitation, to which I drew the attention of the House for some time, I would like to say that in addition to the doubts which have been admitted on all sides to exist and required to be set at rest, the Government of the United States had a very strong standing ground, a very strong position, in the delimitation which was adopted by what was called the North Sea convention, a convention between Her Britannic Majesty, the German Emperor, the King of Prussia, the King of the Belgians, the King of Denmark, the President of the French Republic, and the King of the Netherlands, regulating the North Sea fisheries. This convention was signed at The Hague on the 6th May, 1882; and if, upon a deliberate review of the bays from which foreign vessels should be excluded, the powers adopted the principle of limiting that exclusion to bays that were less than ten miles in width, you can readily see the strong position the Government of the United States would have in claiming that the delimitation should have some regard to the international policy of these great countries that had been dealing with a precisely similar question. Article 2 of the convention says:

"The fishermen of each country shall enjoy the exclusive right to fish within a distance of three miles from low water mark."

"The three marine miles mentioned in Article I of the Convention of October 20, 1818, shall be measured seaward from low water mark; but at every bay, creek or harbor, not otherwise specially provided for in this treaty, such three marine miles shall be measured seaward from a straight line drawn across the bay, creek or harbor in the part nearest the entrance at the first point where the width does not exceed ten marine miles."

As I have said before, to accept the delimitation, to accept as the jurisdictional waters of Canada from which foreigners shall be excluded, the ten-mile limit as proposed by the Government of the United States, was to stand not only upon the ground that a good deal of doubt and hesitation seem to have been exhibited by Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Canada in dealing with that subject, but they had in addition the precedent of the Hague convention, where all the great powers to which I have referred, after careful examination and deliberation, decided that the fishermen of all countries should be at liberty to come into any waters where the bay was more than ten miles wide at the mouth. When we accepted this ten mile delimitation, which was all that appears to have been aimed at by any Canadian Government, the extreme limit that any person had proposed as a matter of delimitation, we made it a condition of the acceptance of that restriction that certain bays should be exempted from its operation, and although I have furnished hon. gentlemen opposite with a chart on which those delimitations are marked by myself, as I thought it would hardly do to do that, it will be seen by the examination of such representations as have been given on this subject, that the exceptions which the plenipotentiaries of the United States were willing to concede have left us very small ground for complaint, although I frankly state it was a concession made by the plenipotentiaries of Her Majesty for the purpose of arriving at a common ground on which we could solve the difficulties with which this question was surrounded. Our concessions did not stop there. I am quite ready to admit, and I think it might as well be stated in the outset, that the Canadian Government would find it, I would find it quite as difficult as our friends the plenipotentiaries of the United States would find it, to justify this treaty if it was to be examined in the light of the extreme contentions maintained previously. I need not inform the House that in diplomatic intercourse it is customary, it is right for the representatives of Government to state the strongest and most advanced ground that they possibly can in relation to every question, and I would not like, I confess, to be tried before the House by the ground taken by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice and by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. The ground they took was quite right, they were authorised by the strict terms of the treaty in taking the strong ground they did, they would have failed in their duty to this House and to this country if, called upon to deal with this question as a matter of diplomatic intercourse and discussion between the Government of the United States and of Canada, they had not taken the extreme contention that the literal terms of the Treaty of 1818 would warrant. They did their duty in adopting that course; but when it came to a question of conference, to a question of international discussion for the purpose of ascertaining whether between the extreme contention on the one side and the extreme contention on the other, any standing ground may be found on which the two parties may meet and settle a dispute of great international difficulty by mutual concession, the case is entirely altered, and the responsibility resting upon the plenipotentiaries of any country would be very great if they refused to consider fair and reasonable concessions on the one side and to meet them by fair and reasonable concessions on the other. So that I have no hesitation in saying that, dealing with this great question in that spirit, dealing with a question that is of vital importance to the British Empire, of vital importance to the Government of Great Britain who were constantly threatened with being embarrassed and brought into serious difficulties and collision with the great country to the south of us, a question too of great magnitude to the United States of America, a question of still greater magnitude, in my judgment, to the people of Canada, one on which we had more at stake and more to lose in a great struggle of that kind than either of the great countries to which I have referred—I say looking at the question in that broad and national spirit, looking at it with a desire to remove the possibility of what I consider would be the greatest misfortune that could happen to the civilised world, a collision between the two great English-speaking families, looking at it from that broad standpoint, it would have been criminal on my part and on the part of those who represented Her Majesty's Government and the interests of the people of Canada if they had hesitated, by making fair and reasonable concessions, to endeavor to find a common standing ground that would present a solution of those important and serious questions, that might enable a treaty to be formulated and accepted as a just and equitable settlement upon both sides. As I have said, our concessions did not rest at the delimitation. We come now to the next portion of the treaty, and that is the treatment of American fishermen within our waters. I trust I have explained article 5 to the satisfaction of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and the other articles immediately following refer to the mode of delimitation and do not require any special remarks from me. Article 9 says:

"Nothing in this treaty shall interrupt or affect the free navigation of the Strait of Canso by fishing vessels of the United States."

I may explain to the House that that was not a surrender of British interests or Canadian interests at the dictation or at the request of the plenipotentiaries of the United States. That clause was inserted in the treaty by ourselves, and for this reason: That the rule for the delimitation which was adopted, the ten-mile rule, would have necessarily excluded, if we took in Chedabucto Bay, which we did take in by making the delimitation, as hon. gentlemen will see, not from one side of the main land of the bay to the other, which would have opened it to the United States, but from the island between; by that delimitation the United States would have been shut out altogether from passing through the Strait of Canso because they could not have gone into Chedabucto Bay, and therefore they asked that Chedabucto Bay should be excluded from the delimitation, from being an exclusive bay, in order to prevent their being shut out of the navigation of that Straits of Canso. Well, Sir, under those circumstances we met that by providing nothing new. We provided simply that nothing in this treaty should interrupt the free navigation of the Straits of Canso, as previously enjoyed by fishing vessels to which we confined it, and in that way we avoided making an exception of Chedabucto Bay, which is the entrance from the Atlantic side to the Straits of Canso. Article 10 provides:

"That United States fishing vessels entering the bays or harbors referred to in Article I of this treaty shall conform to harbor regulations common to them and to fishing vessels of Canada or Newfoundland."

I do not think that requires any reference on my part because it speaks for itself, and it simply provides that whatever harbor regulations there are in force the fishing vessels shall be obliged to conform to them. Article 10 further provides:

"They need not report, enter, or clear, when putting into such bays or harbors for shelter or repairing damages, nor when putting into the same, outside the limits of established ports of entry, for the purpose of purchasing wood or of obtaining water; except that any such vessel remaining more than twenty-four hours, exclusive of Sundays and legal holidays, within any such port, or communicating with the shore therein, may be required to report, enter, or clear; and no vessel shall be excused hereby from giving due information to boarding officers."

I may say, Sir, with reference to this, that a great deal was made of the apparent injustice of subjecting vessels obliged to put in for humane purposes, such as vessels in distress and vessels under stress of weather to come under the clause of the treaty that allowed vessels to come in for those four purposes. A great deal was made of the difficulties that were thrown in their way, and the obstructions that were placed apparently by Canada, in the way of their exercising and enjoying those privileges that the Treaty of 1818 clearly and distinctly provided they should enjoy. I think, Sir, that this House and the people of this country will agree with me that it was not undesirable in the interests of good neighborhood, in the interests of the good reputation of Canada for humane and friendly consideration to vessels in distress, obliged to put into our ports for shelter, and especially where they had under the treaty right a right to come in under such circumstances, that we should remove any obstructions or hindrances that lay in their way. It was urged, on the other hand, that in the United States our fishing vessels were not treated with the same stringency that those vessels were which under treaty right are permitted to come into our waters for those four purposes, and evidence was placed before the commission to show that in the port of Portland the course pursued was a more liberal course than the stringent regulations which had been used in Canada. The collector of that port who had been collector for 9 years was examined and gave his testimony as to the treatment of the Dominion vessels in the United States waters. He was asked:

"During the time you have been deputy collector, whether or not, there have been numerous cases of Dominion vessels, including vessels engaged in fishing in that port, and if they failed to report, though lying more than twenty-four hours, have penalties been imposed for such failure during the term of your service?"

His answer was, as I remember:

"If there were any instances of Dominion vessels failing to report when lying more than twenty-four hours, their presence has been overlooked by the port officers. I do not recall from memory a single instance when or where a penalty was imposed, and I find no record of any such payments in the accounts of this office."

Under those circumstances we felt that we might fairly allow vessels that had no connection with the shore, vessels coming in distress, or vessels coming in under stress of weather to take shelter on our coast, that we might fairly exempt them from reporting for a period of 24 hours provided they did not touch the shore. It was represented that in many cases the previous regulations had involved great hardship and difficulty, that the custom houses were remote from the outlying portions of the harbor where the shelter was obtained, and that to remain long enough to go up to the custom house officer and to make the necessary report would involve a very serious delay and might prevent them getting to sea at all at the time they would desire. I do not conceive that any very great injury to our interests is likely to result where these privileges are only extended to vessels which are not permitted at all to communicate with the shore. The moment they have a communication with the shore, that moment it is incumbent upon them to report, or they are liable to the pains and penalties provided by this Act if they do not do so. I think this House will agree with me and I believe the people of this country will agree with me that it was a wise provision to relieve them of what they found to be a great hardship, and so aid in effecting the removal of a very false impression abroad where people did not understand how stringent the necessity was for guarding their shelter.

"They shall not be liable in such bays or harbors for compulsory pilotage."

It was represented that a fisherman coming in by distress or by stress of weather was compelled to take a pilot or was subject to the charge for a pilot and that this was felt to be very onerous while the fact is that our own fishermen were practically free from any such pilotage regulations and it was therefore a concession to remove the pilotage dues. I admit it was a concession to relieve them from the charge of pilotage. It was a case in which in my judgment "the play was not worth the candle," and the money that would be obtained for pilotage was very small, while it would create a most unpleasant impression abroad if it were understood that while giving them the shelter the treaty compelled us to give them, we took the opportunity to force upon them a charge for pilotage that they did not require and which they thought unnecessary.

Mr. MITCHELL. Are not vessels under a certain size exempted from pilotage, Sir Charles?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Under 80 tons they are exempt. As my hon. friend knows our fishermen are pilots themselves, and they do not require to pay, and this was practically putting their fishermen upon the same footing as our own fishermen in regard to this charge.

Mr. MITCHELL. Certainly.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And the same regulation, we were informed, was the practice in the ports of the United States. At all events we believed that that was not a very great concession to make.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is not much.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My hon. friend is right; it is not much. I think he will quite agree with me it was too small a matter to quarrel over—too small a matter to be a question of a breach between two nations.

Mr. MITCHELL. If you did nothing more than that we would be satisfied.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. At the same time it was a contention, and it was a concession for the purpose of meeting them half way as far as we were able, and which we were glad to be able to do. The article further says:—

"They shall not be liable in such bays or harbors for compulsory pilotage; nor, when therein for the purpose of shelter, of repairing damages, of purchasing wood, or of obtaining water, shall they be liable for harbor dues, tonnage dues, buoy dues, light dues, or other similar dues; but this enumeration shall not permit other charges inconsistent with the enjoyment of the liberties reserved or secured by the Convention of October 20, 1818."

The truth is that although there appears to be a considerable concession in that it does not amount to much from the fact that we have no light dues. In Newfoundland where they have rather heavy light dues it is a much more serious concession than it is in Canada, but Mr. Winter, the able Attorney General of Newfoundland, whose advice and assistance we had throughout these negotiations, felt that that was a concession that the island of Newfoundland would not object to although they would lose something in the way of light dues. Now, Sir, article 11 provides:

Newfoundland under stress of weather or other casualty may unload, reload, tranship or sell, subject to customs laws and regulations, all fish on board, when such unloading, transshipment, or sale is made necessary as incidental to repairs, and may replenish outfits, provisions and supplies damaged or lost by disaster; and in case of death or sickness shall be allowed all needful facilities, including the shipping of crews."

I do not think, Sir, I shall have to take much time in satisfying this House that, although this is a very considerable and important concession, and although we were not compelled, in my judgment, under a strict literal interpretation of the Treaty of 1818 to make it, it was a wise and judicious concession to make. What would be thought of Canada if an American, or a United States fishing vessel—I do not like to use the word American, because I think it is a term we have as much right to as our neighbors; I prefer to speak of them as the people of the United States, and ourselves as Canadians, and when I speak of the whole continent of America, I do not hesitate to apply the term American to the people of both Canada and the United States. But what would be thought of Canada if a vessel of the United States, loaded with mackerel or fish of any other description, were driven by stress of weather, and perhaps in a sinking condition and compelled to resort to a Canadian port, and if, instead of allowing her to tranship her cargo or sell it on paying the duty and go to a marine yard for repairs, we said: No, you must throw overboard the whole of your cargo, because we find you are not allowed to bring your fish into Canada.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do you not refuse a vessel that privilege?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I say that under the Treaty of 1818, we could refuse. Under the strict interpretation of that treaty, they had no right to unload their cargo and tranship or sell it; but what I say is that in making this concession—it is an undoubted concession—we were only acting from the dictates of humanity and with a due regard to the credit and reputation of our country all over the world.

Mr. MITCHELL. But I ask the question, did you not refuse it in one case?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, I did not refuse.

Mr. MITCHELL. You would not, I know; you are too warm-hearted.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If my hon. friend really wants a frank answer—and he knows how frank I desire to be on all these occasions—I will tell him. I said: Under this treaty you have no right to do it, but we will allow you to do it when the application is made; but, we said it must not be regarded as a precedent, but it is a concession, and in attempting to reach a settlement of these questions there must be concessions on both sides. Article 11 further provides:

"Licenses to purchase in established ports of entry of the aforesaid coasts of Canada or of Newfoundland, for the homeward voyage, such provisions and supplies as are ordinarily sold to trading vessels, shall be granted to United States fishing vessels in such ports promptly upon application and without charge, and such vessels, having obtained licenses in the manner aforesaid, shall also be accorded upon all occasions such facilities for the purchase of casual or needful provisions and supplies as are ordinarily granted to trading vessels; but provisions or supplies shall not be obtained by barter, nor purchased for resale or traffic."

That was another concession. There is no doubt at all, Sir, that these were rights which under the strict terms of the Treaty of 1818 they could not demand, nor could they insist upon their being granted; but at the same time I think I am within the judgment of the House on both sides, when I say that in the case of a vessel which is homeward bound and requires provisions or needful supplies to take her home, if, for instance, she has some of her rigging carried away, or some of her salt washed overboard, and is obliged to lose her voyage in going back to a distant port to refit, a provision that she may obtain casual and needful supplies of that kind was demanded in the interests of good neighborhood, and it was not going too far to say that we would allow them to enjoy those advantages. Therefore, Sir, I am glad to believe that article 11 will meet with the hearty approval of the House and the country, and that they will feel that we have only acted with a wise judgment, and with due regard to the best interests of Canada for the sake of removing an international unpleasantness, in putting these provisions into this treaty. Article 12 provides:

"Fishing vessels of Canada and Newfoundland shall have on the Atlantic coasts of the United States all the privileges reserved and secured by this treaty to the United States fishing vessels in the aforesaid waters of Canada and Newfoundland."

I do not pretend that this is accomplishing a great deal, because, as is well known, Canadian fishing vessels do not require to resort to any great extent to the waters of the United States; but at the same time it is a reciprocal arrangement, and it shows that we are not granting anything to the fishermen of the United States that they are not prepared to grant in express terms to the fishermen of Canada. Article 13 provides:

"The Secretary of the Treasury of the United States shall make regulations providing for the conspicuous exhibition by every United States fishing vessel, of its official number on each bow; and any such vessel, required by law to have an official number, and failing to comply with such regulations, shall not be entitled to the licenses provided for in this treaty. Such regulations shall be communicated to Her Majesty's Government previously to their taking effect."

The object of that is obvious. Under the arrangements of the Government of the United States every vessel has an official number, and it will save a great deal of trouble if that official number is required to be exhibited in such a conspicuous form that the moment you see the vessel you will know that it is an American fishing vessel. That will enable you to investigate her character and position and everything about her. Although I have seen the Government of the United States very severely criticised for subjecting these vessels to such an indignity, I do not regard it in that light at all. It is purely a matter of business between the two countries for the purpose of facilitating the recognition of vessels, and thus making it much easier to deal with any question that may arise in relation to her; and as you will know every vessel to which you have given a license, the moment you see a vessel, you will know whether she has a license or not. This measure gives you an opportunity of identifying a vessel, and protecting your fishing grounds much more effectually than you could do without it. Article 14 provides:

"The penalties for unlawfully fishing in the waters, bays, creeks, and harbors, referred to in article 1 of this treaty, may extend to forfeiture of the boat or vessel and appurtenances, and also of the supplies and cargo aboard when the offence was committed; and for preparing in such waters to unlawfully fish therein, penalties shall be fixed by the court, not to exceed those for unlawfully fishing."

That is to say, if you are able to establish a charge against the vessel of unlawfully fishing or unlawfully preparing to fish, the court may in its judgment forfeit the vessel, but a discretion is left with the court, which it had not before, of imposing a comparatively much lighter penalty than the forfeiture of the vessel. I do not think anybody will question the wisdom of dealing with this question as we have done. We have left the penalty for unlawfully fishing to extend to the forfeiture of the vessel and everything appertaining to her. I think the House will agree with me that the penalty for the lighter offence should be lighter, and that the efficiency of the law is likely to be much greater with the lighter penalty than with the extreme ones that existed before.

"And for any other violation of the laws of Great Britain, Canada or Newfoundland relating to the right of fishery in such waters, bays, creeks, or harbors, penalties shall be fixed by the court, not exceeding in all three dollars for every ton of the boat or vessel concerned. The boat or vessel may be holden for such penalties and forfeitures."

That penalty does not apply to unlawful fishing or preparing to fish, but it applies to the lighter offences, such as attempting to purchase bait or anything of that kind. The penalty is reduced to a reasonable one, $3.00 a ton, but yet sufficient, in my judgment, to secure probably a more prompt and effective administration of the law than would be secured if you made the penalty a great deal higher.

"The proceedings shall be summary and as inexpensive as practicable."

I do not know that anybody but the judges in the courts of Vice-Admiralty could complain of that. The object of every civilised country should be to have the laws administered in as inexpensive and summary a mode as practicable.

"The trial (except on appeal) shall be at the place of detention, unless the judge shall, on request of the defence, order it to be held at some other place adjudged by him more convenient."

That is to say, it is proposed that instead of bringing these cases to the Court of Vice-Admiralty at Halifax, or St. John, N. B., or Quebec, as the case may be, it is proposed that the judge shall be sent to deal with the case in a summary manner, that the trial shall take place immediately at the place where the witnesses are all present and the facts can be ascertained, and thus save the cost and inconvenience occasioned by laying up a vessel for a year or two while awaiting judgment.

Mr. MITCHELL. Such as occurred in the Adams case.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There were two sides to that case. The delay did not rest altogether with us, but a very long delay took place at the instance of the owners of the Adams.

"Security for costs shall not be required of the defence, except when bail is offered. Reasonable bail shall be accepted. There shall be proper appeals available to the defence only; and the evidence at the trial may be used on appeal."

That is, we do not propose to appeal against the judgments of our own judges, but we allow an appeal to foreigners who are affected by the judgments of our own judges and who have not the same confidence in their judgments that we have. All this is done for the purpose of saving time and costs, thus avoiding endless irritation through delay.

"Judgments of forfeiture shall be reviewed by the Governor General of Canada in Council, or the Governor in Council of Newfoundland, before the same are executed."

Thus in a case in which, for nominally fishing or for nominally preparing to fish, the judge forfeits the vessel, that decision shall not be carried into execution until the Governor General in Council shall have had the opportunity of deliberately examining the evidence upon which that judgment was founded, so as to remedy the judgment if they think there is any ground for the exercise of greater lenity than the judge has felt himself able to use. Article 15 is, of course, a contingent article. As I have already informed the House, the plenipotentiaries of the United States stated they were quite unable to put anything in the treaty that would necessarily touch the fiscal policy of their country. They said that to do so would be simply to invite rejection of the treaty, on the ground that they had infringed the jurisdiction which Congress had taken, the United States Congress having as I have shown the House, adopted, in the most authentic form, the policy not to allow any changes in their tariff except by the act of Congress itself. We therefore put this in the contingent clause, and we provide the concessions that have been made with reference to limitation, and with reference to the treatment of United States fishing vessels, when compelled to resort to our ports in distress or in need of casual supplies or for a homeward voyage. All these were made absolute by the treaty; but when it came to that which is of absolute value to the United States fishermen, when it came to that which enables the United States fishermen to make Canada a basis of supplies for the purpose of better competing with our own fishermen, we then felt that we had a right to take our stand, and if Her Majesty's plenipotentiaries have not been able to support the extreme contention of the Canadian Government hon. gentlemen will find that, on the other hand, the plenipotentiaries of the United States, who had, as a matter of diplomatic intercourse, taken a very strong ground as to the indefeasible rights of American fishing vessels to obtain, as commercial vessels, whatever supplies they required for carrying on their fishing in our ports—to be able to purchase bait, to be able to purchase supplies of every kind and to be able to tranship their fish—they will find that our friends on the other side had, in the same way, to concede a great deal as compared to the extraordinary contention that they had made. Here it is provided, as a just and proper security to the interests of the fishermen of Canada, who have the right, while excluded by heavy duties from the markets of the United States, to such protection as the Treaty of 1818 has provided for them, that whenever the question arises as to Canada being made the basis of supply for the American deep sea fishing vessels—because the question of fishing is not in controversy at all, the Americans having given up the right to catch fish in the judicial waters of Canada—that only can be done for a sufficient quid pro quo. We have provided in article 15:

"Whenever the United States shall remove the duty from fish-oil, whale-oil, seal oil, and fish of all kinds (except fish preserved in oil), being the produce of fisheries carried on by the fishermen of Canada and of Newfoundland, including Labrador, as well as from the usual and necessary casks, barrels, kegs, cans, and other usual necessary coverings containing the products above mentioned, the like products, being the produce of fisheries carried on by the fishermen of the United States, as well as the usual and necessary coverings of the same, as above described shall be admitted free of duty into the Dominion of Canada and Newfoundland."

I think that is a measure which will meet with the hearty approval of the House.

"And upon such removal of duties, and while the aforesaid articles are allowed to be brought into the United States by British subjects, without duty being reimposed thereon, the privilege of entering the ports, bays and harbors of the aforesaid coasts of Canada and of Newfoundland shall be accorded to United States fishing vessels by annual licenses, free of charge, for the following purposes, namely:

"1. The purchase of provisions, bait, ice, seines, lines, and all other supplies and outfits;

"2. Transhipment of catch, for transport by any means of conveyance;

"3. Shipping of crews.

"Supplies shall not be obtained by barter, but bait may be so obtained.

"The like privileges shall be continued or given to fishing vessels of Canada and of Newfoundland on the Atlantic coasts of the United States."

I think that will be regarded as a fair and reasonable proposition, that, if fishing vessels of the United States are allowed to make Canada a base for obtaining their supplies and furnishing all the materials necessary for the outfit of a shipping voyage, for the transhipment of their catch, and making our harbors and ports the means of carrying on their industry, the fishermen of Canada, with whom they are in that case better able to compete than they could otherwise, are entitled to have their fish entered free in the ports of the United States. While the plenipotentiaries of the United States were not able to make this an absolute provision, I do not hesitate to say that I look confidently to the period in the not remote future when fish will be made free and the fishermen of the United States will be able to obtain all the advantages in our ports which are here given to them. It will be observed that we have made this much larger in its provisions than either the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854 or the Washington Treaty of 1871, inasmuch as we have made it cover many articles which were not covered by either of those treaties, and not only that, but we have taken care to guard against what might be called the rather sharp practice, if such a term were admissible in regard to a neighboring country, that, while allowing our fish to come in free, they should impose a duty upon the cans or tins or coverings in which the fish went in. More than that, we have made this cover all the inland waters of Canada, as well as the sea coast, and have made this provision as to the entry of free fish, provided they take advantage of this clause and make Canada the base of their supplies, apply to the fish of British Columbia, that is, to the whole of Canada, the same as it does to the Atlantic coast. I think I have now dealt with the treaty in its entirety as it stands, and I have only to refer to the modus vivendi in Schedule B, which provides that, while this treaty is sub judice, before it can be ratified by the Senate of the United States, the Parliament of Canada and the Legislature of Newfoundland, during two years or pending that ratification, until these privileges to which the American fishermen would be entitled if our fish is made free, those privileges shall be enjoyed by the American fishermen on the payment of $1.50 per ton. I need not tell you that, on the eve of the ratification of a treaty of this kind by the Senate of the United States, a collision between the fishermen of the two countries or anything which would incite bad blood or become a cause of prejudice would probably prevent the ratification of a treaty which would be otherwise ratified, and to prevent that we offered in this modus vivendi for two years the privilege to these American fishermen of obtaining these various benefits which are provided for in the treaty by the payment of $1.50 per ton. I do not think this will be regarded as an excessive rate, and I think it will greatly conduce to good neighborhood between the United States and Canada. This modus vivendi was accepted by the United States plenipotentiaries in the most kindly spirit. They recommended the President to submit it to the Senate for their information, and I think I may say that it carries on the face of it the ratification and approval of the Governments of both countries. Now, having run through the various provisions of the treaty, I am happy to say that I shall have to detain the House but a few minutes longer, but I would like to draw the attention of the House to what has been accomplished by this treaty. I have told you what position Canada stood in with regard to the United States of America before the initiation of these proceedings. I have told you that we stood face to face with an enactment which had been put on the Statute-book by a unanimous vote of Congress, ratified by the President, providing for non-intercourse between the United States and Canada. I need not tell you that that Bill meant commercial war, that it meant not only the ordinary suspension of friendly feeling and intercourse between two countries, but that it announced much more than that. If that Bill had been brought into operation by the proclamation of the President of the United States, I have no hesitation in saying that we stood in a relation to that great country of commercial war, and the line is very narrow which separates a commercial war between two countries from an actual war. Speaking a year ago, I pointed out in my remarks, with a view to deter the possibility of such an Act going into force, all the advantages that in our present position we could avail ourselves of to protect ourselves against such a suicidal act on the part of the United States. I said then that it would be a mad act. I say so now. No man who knows anything of the intimate commercial relations which exist between Canada and the United States could contemplate such an Act going into operation without feeling that it would tear up from the foundation those intimate social and commercial relations which exist between these two countries, which, in friendly commercial rivalry, are making a rapid progress which has attracted the attention of the civilised world. It would produce a condition of things the end of which no man could foresee. If that Act had been adopted, I thought we had no means of looking to any increased commercial intercourse between that great country and the Dominion of Canada. Under those circumstances, it behoved the Government of Canada to adopt any means in its power to avert such a disaster, which, great as it would have been to Canada, would have been greater to the United States. But that would be a very poor compensation for the injury which we would sustain, to know that we had a companion in misfortune suffering more than we suffered ourselves. We found Congress putting on the Statute-book a direction to the President that, on the first United States vessel being seized or harassed, or refused the advantages which they said they were entitled to, they called upon him as the Executive of that country to put that Non-intercourse Act into force. That was the condition of things when I went down last Easter to see Mr. Bayard at Washington. If you compare the condition of things to-day with the condition of things that existed then, there is no man, I care not how partisan he may be, how unfriendly to this Government he may be, who can judiciously look at the position of this question then and now, without coming to the conclusion that we have emerged from midnight darkness into the light of day under the auspices of this treaty. It may be said: Suppose that the treaty is rejected by the United States Senate—a not improper contingency—I need not tell the House that one of the advantages we enjoy under British institutions, is that we are saved from the extreme and violent antagonisms of party that every fourth year the Presidential election brings about in the United States. Now any man who knows anything of the politics of the United States, knows that however good a measure is, however valuable, however much it commends itself to the judgment of every intelligent statesman in that country, it is a matter almost of honor on the part of the party in opposition to prevent the Government of the day from doing anything that would give them any credit or strengthen their hands in the country; that on the eve of a Presidential election, it is next to impossible to induce the Republican majority in the Senate to sanction anything that a Democratic Administration has carried through, however valuable that may be. But, Sir, take the very worst contingency, suppose this treaty is rejected by the Senate, and what then? Why, will we be relegated back to the position we stood in a year ago? Not at all. If our efforts, by mutual conciliation, by concessions on both sides to find a common standing ground, that we could present to all the parties to this treaty, as an honorable and equitable agreement that might be fairly accepted if these efforts are to fail, if after three months' negotiations we had broken up with embittered relations, because we found that it was impracticable to get any common grounds of meeting on which the Governments of the two countries could join, there is no question that matters would have stood in a worse position than that in which they stood when we undertook these negotiations. But, Sir, that is not the position. Let the Senate of the United States to-morrow reject this treaty, I trust they will not do so; I have a hope that there is independent statesmanship enough in the great Republican party of the United States who have the power at their disposal to-day in the United States Senate, to allow that sentiment of statesmanship to overweigh the party advantages they hope to obtain by preventing the present Administration from settling this vexed question—but when they remember that for 70 years, these questions have been agitated which are now disposed of, they may see that if they should come into power themselves at any early date it would be an advantage to have this vexed question between the two great English-speaking families of the world set at rest, that there may be no renewal of the difficulties which have existed so long a time. But let me take the very worst contingency, that of the rejection of this treaty, and how do we stand? Why, Sir, let me read from a letter of the Secretary of State of the United States, written to the citizens of Boston, who invited him to go there to deliver a speech upon the subject. In Mr. Bayard's letter, of 26th March, he says:

"I am convinced that the welfare and true interest of our country and a just and wise treatment of the British American population on our northern frontier alike counsel the adoption of the treaty. In its initiation, negotiation and conclusion I can truly say for my associates, and myself, no views but those of a single minded patriotic intent have been allowed place or expression, nor can a trace or suggestion of partisanship be justly alleged. The sole and difficult question to which the treaty relates, the fishery rights, of one nation in the jurisdictional waters of another, began with the first dawn of our recognised independent existence as a nation and ever since has conspicuously presented itself at intervals exciting bitter controversy, and never been satisfactory or pre-eminently disposed of. Meanwhile the surrounding circumstances have importantly changed in advance with rapid and vast growth. The Treaty of 1818 remains unaffected in its terms by seventy years of such material progress and development on this continent, as we of to-day are the witnesses. Unless the Treaty of 1818 shall be wholly abrogated and recurrence necessarily had to the dangerous status that John Quincy Adams so ably but unavailably discussed with the Earl of Bathurst, in 1815, and which had resisted all efforts of negotiation and at Ghent in the year previous, it is manifest that a joint and equitable construction in consonance with their existing relations and mutual needs must be agreed upon between Great Britain and the United States and this, I affirm, is done by the present treaty."

Again he says:

"Conciliation and mutual neighborly concessions have together done their honorable and honest work in this treaty, paved the way for the relations of enmity and mutual advantage."

Now, Sir, I ask you whether all that we have done, all the time, all the trouble that have been expended in this matter is not amply compensated for by the declaration of the Secretary of State of the United States bearing his tribute and his testimony, to the fair, and honest, and just interpretation of the Treaty of 1818. And what more, Sir? Let me read from the Message of the President of the United States:

"As a result of such negotiations, a treaty has been agreed upon between Her Britannic Majesty and the United States, concluded and signed in this capital, under my direction and authority, on the 15th of this February inst, and which I now have the honor to submit to the Senate, with the recommendation that it shall receive the consent of that body, as provided in the constitution, in order that the ratifications thereof, may be duly exchanged and the treaty carried into effect. The treaty meets my approval, because I believe that it supplies a satisfactory, practical, and final adjustment, upon a basis honorable and just to both parties, of the difficult and vexed question to which it relates. A review of the history of this question will show that all formal attempts to arrive at a common interpretation, satisfactory to both parties, of the first article of the Treaty of October 20, 1818, have been unsuccessful and with the lapse of time the difficulty and obscurity have only increased.

"Negotiations in 1854, and again in 1871, ended in both cases in temporary reciprocal arrangement of the tariffs of Canada and Newfoundland and of the United States, and of the payment of the money award by the United States. Under which the real questions in difference remain unsettled, in abeyance, and ready to present themselves anew just as soon as the conventional arrangements were abrogated.

"The situation, therefore, remained unimproved by the results of the Treaty of 1871, and a grave condition of affairs, presenting almost identically the same features and causes of complaint by the United States against Canadian action and British default in its correction, confronted us in May, 1886, and has continued until the present time.

"The four purposes for which our fishermen under the Treaty of 1818 were allowed to enter the bays and harbors of Canada and Newfoundland within the belt of three marine miles are placed under a fair and liberal construction, and their enjoyment secured without such conditions and restrictions as in the past have embarrassed and obstructed them so seriously.

"The enforcement of penalties for fishing or preparing to fish within the inshore and exclusive waters of Canada and Newfoundland is to be accomplished under safeguards against oppressive or arbitrary action, thus protecting the defendant fisherman from punishment in advance of trial, delays, and inconvenience and unnecessary expense.

"The hospitality secured for our vessels in all cases of actual distress, with liberty to unload and sell and tranship their cargoes, is full and liberal.

"These provisions will secure the substantial enjoyment of the treaty rights for our fishermen under the Treaty of 1818, for the contention has been steadily made in the correspondence of the Department of State, and by our Minister at London, and by the American negotiators of the present treaty.

"The treaty now submitted to you has been framed in a spirit of liberal equity and reciprocal benefits, in the conviction that mutual advantage and convenience are the only permanent foundation of peace and friendship between States, and that with the adoption of the treaty now placed before the Senate, a beneficial and satisfactory intercourse between the two countries will be established so as to procure perpetual peace and harmony.

"In connection with the treaty herewith submitted I deem it is also my duty to transmit to the Senate a written offer or arrangement, in the nature of a modus vivendi, tendered on the conclusion of the treaty on the part of the British plenipotentiaries, to secure kindly and peaceful relations during the period that may be required for the consideration of the treaty by the respective Governments and for the enactment of the necessary legislation to carry its provisions into effect if approved.

"This paper, freely and on their own motion, signed by the British conferees, not only extend advantages to our fishermen, pending the ratification of the treaty, but appears to have been dictated by a friendly and amicable spirit."

I ask you to contrast that language with the position we occupied a year ago in regard to the great Republic to the south of us. Let the Senate reject the treaty to-morrow, and I ask what is the changed position of Canada? Yesterday we stood face to face with a Non-intercourse Bill, sustained by the united action of the Senate and House of Representatives, sustained by almost the whole press, Republican and Democratic, of the United States, sustained with few exceptions by a prejudiced, irritated and exasperated people of 60,000,000 lying to the south of us. What, I repeat, is our position to-day? If that treaty were rejected by the Senate to-morrow, we have gained this vantage ground, that we stand in the position of having it declared by the Secretary of State of the United States and by the President of the United States that Canada has been ready to make, and Her Majesty's Government on behalf of Canada, through her plenipotentiaries, made an arrangement with the plenipotentiaries of the United States that is fair, just and equitable, and that leaves that country no possible cause of complaint. Why, what is the result? The result is this: that let a fisherman complain to-morrow of our interpretation of the treaty, of the enforcement of our most extreme construction of the treaty, the answer to him is this: Nobody is to blame for the inconvenience you suffer except the Senate of the United States, your President, the Executive of your country; the Democratic party from end to end of the United States declared it was a fair settlement, they represent an undoubted majority, in my judgment, of the people of the United States to-day, and I believe they will represent it to-morrow. We stand in the position that instead of being alone with the whole United States, President, Government and people all against us, all denouncing us as adopting a harsh and barbarous interpretation of an old, antiquated treaty for the purpose of forcing reciprocity upon them, we occupy the vantage ground of having these men out of their own mouths declaring that nothing has been wanting on the part of the Government of Her Majesty, or on the part of the Dominion of Canada to place this question on a fair and equitable basis such as might honorably be accepted by the United States. I hold we have accomplished that without injuring in the slightest degree the fisheries of Canada, without injuring Canadian interests to any extent whatever. We have made concessions, as I have said, but we have made them with the avowed object of placing all our people, not only the fishermen, but the agriculturist, the lumberman, every man in this country in a better relation with the United States than he was before. What is the result? As I have said Mr. Bayard told us, the American plenipotentiaries told us that there was but one way of obtaining what you ask. You want greater freedom of commercial intercourse. You want relaxation in our tariff arrangements with respect to natural products in which you are so rich and abundant. There is but one way to obtain it. Let us by common concession be able to meet on common ground and seek to remove this irritating cause of difficulty between the two countries out of the way, and you will find that the policy of this Government, the policy of the President and of the House of Representatives, the policy of the great Democratic party of the United States, will at once take an onward course in the direction you propose, and accomplish that which you would desire above everything else is the only way by which it can ever be attained. Those were not empty words, those were the sober utterances of distinguished statesmen, who pointed to the avowed policy of the Government of the United States as the best evidence of the sincerity of what he said. What has happened already? Already we have action by the Finance Minister of the United States, I mean Mr. Mills,—the gentleman who in the United States Congress represents the Government of the day, and stand in the most analogous position in the United States to the Finance Minister in this House, the Chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, who propounds the policy of the Administration in the House. How is he selected? He is selected by the Government. The Democratic party sustaining the Government selects a man as Speaker of the House of Representatives, who is in accord with the policy of the Administration for the time being, and Mr. Carlisle, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, nominates the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means and all the members of the committee, and therefore the Chairman of that committee occupies the position of representing the Government in bringing forward such Bills as will represent the views and sentiments of the Democratic party in the United States supporting the Administration. What have we got? The ink is barely dry upon this treaty before he as the representative of the Government and Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means brings forward a measure to do what? Why, to make free articles that Canada sends into the United States, and upon which last year we paid $1,800,000 of duty.

Some hon. MEMBERS. We paid?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I ask, Sir, if that is nothing.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Who paid?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not intend to insult both the great political parties of this country who have since 1854 and long before maintained that the interests of Canada—the interests of British North America—were intimately bound up in obtaining free intercourse with the United States for our natural products. I do not intend to insult the two great parties in this country by telling them that they are both fools, that they do not know what they are doing. Down to the present hour we have adopted the policy on both sides of the House, and we have pledged ourselves to the people to do everything that lay in our power to obtain a free market for the natural products of our country with the United States, and I say you must answer me the question as to whether that was an act of supreme folly or whether it was wise statesmanship on the part of both parties in this country to adopt that policy, before you ask me such a question as “who pays the duty?” I say that under this Bill which has been introduced and which, I believe, will pass, for it does not require two-thirds of the Senate where the Republican majority is only one in the whole House to pass this inter-national law, it requires a majority of one only and I am very sanguine that this Bill will pass during the present session. Modified it may be, but I am inclined to think the amendments will be still more in the interests of Canada than as the Bill stands to-day. If this is the case I think we may congratulate ourselves upon securing the free admission of our lumber, upon which we paid during the last year no less than $1,315,450 to get it into the United States. On copper ore made free by the Mills’ Bill we paid, or there was paid to make it meet the views of the hon. gentlemen opposite more correctly, $96,945. On salt $21,992 duty was paid. This is rendered free by the Mills’ Bill. I am sorry to find as I hoped would be the case from the first copy of the Bill that came to me that potatoes were not included amongst vegetables. I am sorry to find there is a doubt, as to whether vegetables not specially enumerated will not exclude potatoes. In grappling with this policy of making the natural products of the two countries free, you do not expect any person who wants to carry a Bill to put a heavier load upon his shoulders than he is able to carry, lest he may break down and do nothing. You expect him to take it in detail, and as I believe, you will find the policy contained in this Bill of making those natural products of Canada free, carried out until you have perfect freedom of intercourse between the natural products of Canada and the United States of America. Of wool we sent last year 1,319,309 lbs. of one kind, and a variety of other kinds, upon which a duty was paid to the extent of $183,852. Now as I say on articles of prime importance and interest to Canada the removal of duty by the Mills’ Bill amounts to no less than $1,300,193. You will be glad to hear that I do not intend to detain the House any longer. In discharge of the duties—the very onerous and important duties—of one of Her Majesty’s plenipotentiaries at that conference, I have steadily kept in view what in my heart and judgment I believed were the best interests of Canada. In the measure which I have the honor to submit to this House I believe will be found embodied a Bill which it is of the most vital importance to Canada to pass. As it stands to day the Government of the United States through the plenipotentiaries who represented it have only my humble opinion to sustain the course that has been taken. I was not there as the representative of the Government of Canada, nor can my signature to the Bill necessarily imply the confidence and support of even the Administration. I occupied on that occasion the high position of one of Her Majesty’s plenipotentiaries, charged not only with the responsibility of what I owed to Canada, but also the responsibility of what I owed to the Empire. I can only say, Sir, that I feel I would best discharge my duty to the Empire by steadily keeping in view the interest of Canada. I believe, Sir, that there is no way in which any public man in this country can promote the interests of the great Empire of which we form a part, better, or as well, as by taking such a course of public action as will build up a great British community on this northern portion of the continent of America. I believe, Sir, that we owe it to the Empire as well as to ourselves, steadily to keep in view every measure that will conduce to the rapid progress of Canada, the development of her inexhaustible resources and the building up of a great and powerful British community on this side of the Atlantic. I say, Sir, that in the discharge of the duties I have steadily kept that in view, and I believe the course which has been pursued will not only commend itself to the judgment and the support of the great majority in this House, but that the great majority of the people in this country will feel that in the adoption of this treaty and in asking the House to sanction the treaty I am only taking a step that is calculated to conduce to the progress and greatness and best interests of Canada in as large a degree as any measure that can possibly be brought before it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Mr. Speaker, the Government have had the advantage of having the treaty submitted to this House for ratification, defended by a gentleman who is very well versed in the negotiations by which that treaty was brought about, and the House had the advantage of hearing from an old parliamentary hand in his most eloquent and I may say sophistical manner the reasons which in his opinion would justify it in assenting to this treaty. The hon. gentleman must have been painfully conscious during his speech—which in many parts was more than usually eloquent even for him—that he was not carrying with him the hearty assent of those who are accustomed to cheer his utterances. The hon. gentleman, Sir, must have painfully felt the absence of those cheers which generally greet the utterance of any policy when propounded by himself, and he must have felt, Sir, that it was only when he indulged in that eloquent peroration which had nothing to do with the treaty whatever, and in which he referred to the consolidation of British power as something antagonistic to the United States that he found a hearty cheer from those behind him. The hon. gentleman's speech may, I think, be fairly divided into four parts. The first part was an historical resumé of fishery matters. With a great deal of the history he stated, I have no fault to find; with the omission of a large part of that history I have some fault to find. The second part of his speech, Sir, may be called the laudatory part. The hon. gentlemen paid compliments with a profuse hand to everybody who was associated with him in the construction of this treaty. I have no objection to make to these compliments; I have no reason to doubt that they may have been to a large extent deserved. Even from the Right Hon. Mr. Chamberlain down to the meanest associate he had with him, he told the House that there never was such a collection of men congregated together at the negotiation of any treaty. Well, Sir, we are not going to join issue with him on that part of his speech. The hon. gentleman then proceeded to the third part of his speech, and that was his confessions. He confessed to the House that the treaty was not what his party might have been led to expect. He confessed that it was one continuous series of concessions from Canada, without one concession made to Canada by the party with which we were treating. After exhausting his confessions, honest confessions I hope they were, the hon. gentleman then, in the fourth part of his speech, made an appeal for absolution to his followers in the House, basing that appeal on the great benefits that were to flow to the Empire from the ratification of this treaty. Well, Sir, I shall have something to say about parts of the treaty. I was amused, Sir, at the hon. gentleman's statement of the only concession that Canada was going to receive as the result of this treaty. The hon. gentleman told us that as a result of this treaty the Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives at Washington had introduced a Tariff Bill, into Congress, which would have the effect of relieving Canadians from the payment of over a million dollars of duties, which they had been accustomed to pay on their natural products sent to the United States. Sir, there are two statements of fact in that allegation of the hon. gentleman to which I wish to take exception. If he had been in this House during the last three weeks, he would have heard, not one or two, but dozens of his most prominent supporters prove to a demonstration that that duty was not paid by the people of Canada, but by the United States people themselves; and if the arguments that those gentlemen advanced so eloquently and ably are worth anything at all, the result, according to the statement made by the hon. gentleman to-night, is simply to relieve the consumer in the United States from the payment of a million dollars of duties which they have been paying under their tariff. The other exception which I wish to take to in the hon. gentleman's allegation is this: I deny that there is any analogy whatever between the position of the Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee in the United States and that of the Minister of Finance in this country. The hon. gentleman knows that the two systems of Government are entirely different. He knows that the Minister of Finance in this country speaks as the mouthpiece of the Cabinet, which is chosen to represent the majority in Parliament; and he knows—no one knows better—that the Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives may be a gentleman entirely opposed to the policy of the Cabinet; and if the Chairman of that Committee in the present instance supports the policy of the Cleveland Administration, it is an accident, and not a necessity following from their system of Government. But it does not at all follow, because that Tariff Bill has been introduced as a sequence to the treaty, that it is a necessary consequence of the treaty. That tariff was introduced in pursuance of the policy laid down by President Cleveland in his message to Congress, a policy which he adopted in dealing with that enormous surplus which the hon. gentleman stated weighed like an incubus on the people of the United States; and in pursuance of that policy, before the treaty was ever entered into at all, the Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee introduced that Tariff Bill. Sir, I hope that Bill will pass in a more enlarged sense even than it has been introduced. I hope that the article the hon. gentleman mentioned will also be inserted in that Bill, and that the people of the Maritime Provinces and Ontario may have the advantage of the free admission of their potatoes as well as their other natural products into the markets of the United States. I hope that the policy they have begun will go on until the policy developed on this side of the House and formulated in the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford is accepted in its entirety, and then the hon. gentleman will be able to use with some effect the eloquent language he used to-day about prosperity and about the Dominion of Canada becoming a strong arm of a united empire. Now, Sir, it must have struck every hon. gentleman who listened to the speech of the hon. Finance Minister, as a most extraordinary thing, if this policy of conciliation, of compromise, of fair play was to produce the tremendous and beneficial results which he predicted it would produce, that that hon. gentleman, as a member of the Government should be here defending it to-day, when we know that for the past two or three years he has been one of the strongest and most eloquent advocates of a policy directly the contrary. Why, Sir, is it not known that the hon. gentleman is the most prominent member of an Administration whose policy was utterly opposed to the policy of conciliation embodied in that treaty—an Administration, Sir, that adopted a policy which, to use his own words, drove a nation of 65,000,000 of people almost to the verge of war with us—a policy which, to use his own words consolidated for the first time in history, 65,000,000 of people and the entire press in opposition to it—a policy which they proclaimed to be cruel and brutal and ungenerous and unchristian? Yet, two years have not elapsed since the hon. gentleman's colleagues—I am not sure whether he himself did not indulge in the same strain announced in this House that such was their love of Canadian interests, and their determination to stand by the flag—which they took off their coats and waved—that they were not going to bend the knee to the United States by adopting a policy of conciliation, but were going to show the United States that this great Canada of ours would bring them down on their marrow bones. The policy of amalgamation of tariffs was carried one step further, and the manner in which they administered the Treaty of 1818, as they construed it, was as openly proclaimed to be a defiance of the United States and a determination on their part to make the people of that country conform to their construction of that treaty, whether they would willingly or not. Sir, the old policy has been disavowed to-night, and we have heard the hon. gentleman say with all his power and ability that he was not able to support to-day the policy of the hon. Minister of Justice and the hon. Minister of Marine. But, Sir, he is responsible for that policy with those hon. gentlemen, and I hold him more responsible than anybody else, and I will tell him why. Because he alone has the power to change the policy of the Government; and if he had chosen one year ago to apply his mind to the work and put down his foot and say that he would not for one be a party to that policy of anti-civilisation, the Government would have been obliged to change it, as they have done since, and adopt the policy of the hon. gentleman. One year has not passed over our heads since we saw the Government announcing a policy in this House, not of conciliation, but of defiance to the United States, and the hon. gentleman had not returned to his place a day before he made them eat their words and adopt the policy which the Minister of Justice said would be a betrayal of the best interests of Canada. I say if there is a man in the Government who is more responsible than another for this unfortunate policy, which the Government have pursued so persistently for the past two or three years, it is the hon. the Finance Minister himself. Now, the hon. gentleman opened his speech with the expression of the hope that members on this side, in discussing the treaty, would not indulge in any language which might be used by the opponents of the treaty in the United States for the purpose of defeating the Bill. I hope no such language will be used, and, so far as I am concerned, it is not my intention to use such language. But the hon. gentleman himself, under similar circumstances, when it suited his party purposes, did not scruple to use language for which this country suffered very severely afterwards. The hon. gentleman anticipated a charge which he knew would be brought against him, and, referring to the Washington Treaty, he said that when that treaty was passing through this House, he appealed to hon. gentlemen not to make statements which might afterwards be used to our prejudice. But, he said, he was obliged to make such statements, and he did not make them to our prejudice. At that time the treaty contained a provision referring to the commission, which afterwards sat at Halifax, the question of settling what damages should be paid to Canada for the fishery concessions she had made to the United States, and the hon. gentleman, in his anxiety to support for the time a Government measure then before the House, did not scruple to make statements discounting, so far as words could, any chance we might have of obtaining an award from the people of the United States. He declared in so many words that the concessions we had received from the United States ought, without the payment of a dollar of damage, to be considered the equivalent of the concessions we had made. While the hon. gentleman was speaking to-night I turned up the speech which he delivered on that occasion. He was preceded by the right hon. gentleman who is at the head of the Government, and I would ask the House to listen to the language of which these hon. gentlemen made use of when the Washington Treaty was before the House. The right hon. gentleman said:

"In looking at the treaty from a commercial point of view, and looking at the question whether it is right to accept the articles, we have to consider mainly that interest which is most peculiarly affected. Now, unless I am greatly misinformed, the fishing interests of Nova Scotia, with one or two exceptions for local reasons, are altogether in favor of the treaty. They are so anxious to get free admission for their fish into the American market that they would view with great sorrow any action of this House which would exclude them from that market, and they look forward with increasing confidence to a large development of their trade, and of that great industry; and I say that, that being the case, if it be to the interest of the fishermen and to the advantage of that branch of the national industry, setting aside all other reasons, we ought not wilfully to injure that interest. Why, Sir, what is the fact of the case as it stands? The only market for Canadian No. 1 mackerel in the world is the United States. That is our only market, and we are practically excluded from it by the present duty. The consequence of that duty is that our fishermen are at the mercy of the American fishermen—they are made hewers of wood and drawers of water for the Americans; they are obliged to sell their fish at the Americans' own prices. The American fishermen purchase their fish at a nominal value, and control the American market. The great profits of the trade are handed over to the American fishermen or American merchants engaged in the trade, and they profit to the loss of our own industry and our own people."

Sir, the hon. gentleman proved conclusively that the one great desideratum for the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces was the remission of the duty, which they were obliged to pay to the United States, and he said if they got that great concession, everything else did not amount to a row of pins. They should, he said, accept it most willingly and cheerfully, and now the hon. gentleman comes here with a treaty, in which he has not obtained for the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces one single concession, a treaty which leaves them bound to continue paying that duty in the future, as they have had to pay it in the past, and he declares this treaty is a wonderful outcome of ability on his part and on the part of his colleagues. On that occasion what did the hon. the Finance Minister say:

"Instead of the treaty surrendering our fishermen and fisheries to the destructive competition of the foreigner, the result would be—"

The hon. gentleman was a prophet then as he is to-night.

"—that the American fishermen who employed their industry in the waters of Canada would become like the American lumbermen who engaged in that trade in the valley of the Ottawa. They would settle upon Canadian soil, bringing with them their character for enterprise and energy, and would become equally good subjects of Her Majesty and give this country the benefits of their talents, and their enterprise and their capital. Was there anybody who could doubt as to the effect of removing the duty which was now levied of $2 a barrel on mackerel and $1 on herring, of taking off this enormous bounty in favor of the American fishermen and leaving our fishermen free and unrestricted access to the best market for them in the world? Was there anyone who could doubt the practical result would be to leave the Canadians, in a very short time, almost without any competition at all."

That was the view the hon. gentleman held in 1872, when he asked this House to assent to the Washington Treaty, and he was prepared to go so far then, to advance party interests, that he declared, in so many words, that we had received in the remission of duty more than an equivalent to the concession we had made, and that we were not entitled to a dollar of award. The Americans were not slow to take advantage of these statements made by two of the most prominent members of the Canadian Cabinet, and in their answer put before the Washington Commission, the most prominent statements are those which I have quoted, made by those hon. gentlemen. The American plenipotentiaries said: These gentlemen tell you, on their responsibility as members of the Canadian Government, that you have got already more than you are entitled to, and how, therefore can you ask for more? Unpatriotic as those hon. gentlemen were on that occasion, much as they did to discount the right of the country to receive a large sum in compensation, I trust their want of patriotism on that occasion will not be emulated by any body on this side. I hope we shall be now, as we have tried, whether successfully or not, for years back to be. The hon. gentleman has talked a good deal about a change of policy. Two years ago we had a policy propounded as the one necessary for the salvation of Canada, a policy diametrically opposed to the one proposed to-day. Then their policy was one of defiance; to-day their policy is one of conciliation. I do not object to the change, but I say that when the Government of a great country like this change their policy on one of the most important matters which can come before them their duty, as hon. gentlemen, is to step down from their positions and give them to those who are in favor of the new policy and who pronounced in its favor years ago. That would have been an honorable course for them to take. Then the language of the hon. gentlemen would have been received with credit and respect. The hon. gentleman laughs, and he may well laugh, because he has lived to see within the past fortnight one of his principal Ministers declare that policy to be a betrayal of Canada which was adopted a week later and yet remained in office to endorse its adoption. I want to call the hon. gentleman's attention to a few historical facts which he very carefully omitted from his historical statements. The hon. gentleman gave us a history of the Treaty of 1818, and he stated, and stated very fairly, that the renunciation clause, as it has been called in that treaty, which was signed by the American plenipotentiaries, under which they renounced certain rights or privileges—whichever you like to call them in our waters—was not made without compensation, that they received ample compensation for that renunciation. I am prepared to agree with him in reference to that. I think his statement of the Treaty of 1818 was not inaccurate, but, after passing over the Washington Treaty of 1871, he stepped down to 1885, when a modus vivendi was agreed upon for that year; but he forgot to state that, for years before the modus vivendi of 1885 was agreed upon, the attention of his Government had been called by the party with which I have the honor to be connected to the serious results which would come from the cessation of the fishery articles of the Washington Treaty, and that we would be face to face with a state of facts requiring the firmest and the most conciliatory action. In 1883, on the 28th March, when the United States gave a notice abrogating the fishery clauses of the Washington Treaty, Lord Derby sent a despatch to the Canadian Government advising them that that notice had been given, calling their attention to it, and asking them to formulate their views on the question. On the 3rd May, 1883, Lord Derby wrote another despatch again calling upon them for their views, but no answer was vouchsafed. The hon. gentleman was adopting the policy of "to-morrow." In the face of complications as grave as those which the Finance Minister has pointed out to-day, in the face of the fact that he must have known the gravity of the position, and that he had received a warning from Lord Derby that it was time to make up his mind, the hon. gentleman, true to his policy of never doing to-day what can be done to-morrow, remained silent. Then, on the 30th January, 1884, Lord Derby again called for the policy of this Government. In the despatch which I have referred to just now, dated the 3rd May, Lord Derby says:

"Her Majesty's Government will be glad if your Ministers will favor them with your view in the matter as soon as they may be in a position to do so."

On the 30th January, 1884, nearly twelve months after the notice had been given, and the attention of the Government had been officially called to the state of the facts, Lord Derby writes to the Marquis of Lansdowne:

"My Lord,—With reference to my despatches of the 3rd of May, and of the 28th December last, I have the honor to request that you will move your Government to take an early opportunity of placing me in possession of their views as to the course to be pursued in consequence of the approaching termination of the fishery articles of the Treaty of Washington."

His Lordship is getting slightly more nervous and more anxious, and urges Lord Lansdowne to move his Government to make some declaration of their policy in this matter, but the hon. gentleman remained silent. Nothing is done, and nearly a whole year goes by, and on the 4th of December, 1884, nearly two years after the notice has been given by the United States abrogating those fishery articles, Lord Derby is compelled to write another despatch, and at last he evokes an answer. In that despatch he says:

"In view of the fact that the fishery articles of the Treaty of Washington will expire on the 1st of July next, I have the honor to inform you that Her Majesty's Government are desirous of obtaining, at as early a date as possible, some expression of the views of the Government of the Dominion of Canada as to the course that they may wish pursued in negotiation with the Government of the United States, with the object of arriving at some satisfactory arrangement with that Government, in order to avoid the risks and complications which might arise from the fishery question being left in an unsettled and undecided state. You will therefore be so good as to lay this despatch before your Ministers, and to request them to favor me, at their earliest convenience, with such an expression of their views upon this important subject, as they may be in a position to supply."

The hon. gentleman had let matters slide for nearly two years, he had done nothing, but he had not only been prompted by Lord Derby, but in this House the Opposition had brought the matter to his attention, and in March, 1884, one year after the notice abrogating the fishery articles had been given, and nine months before Lord Derby wrote the despatch to which I have just referred, the Opposition brought this matter up, and used the arguments, not so ably or so eloquently, it is true, but as well as they were able to use them, in favor of peace and of the promotion of goodwill between the two countries which the Finance Minister has urged to-night in support of his treaty. We urged that, in order to meet the state of facts which we would have to meet when the treaty expired, it was necessary to do something, to enter into negotiation with our friends across the border. The resolution which I had myself the honor to move on that occasion was as follows:—

"In view of the notice of the termination of the fishery articles of the Treaty of Washington, given by the United States to the British Government, and the consequent expiration, on the 1st July, 1885, of the reciprocal privileges and exemptions of that Treaty, this House is of opinion that steps should be taken at an early day by the Government of Canada, with the object of bringing about negotiations for a new treaty providing for the citizens of Canada and the United States the reciprocal privileges of fishing and freedom from duties now enjoyed, together with additional reciprocal freedom in the trade relations of the two countries; and that, in any such negotiations, Canada should be directly represented by some one nominated by its Government."

We did not lay down any positive line of action that we asked the hon. gentleman to adopt; we did not say, this you must do, and this you ought to do, but we said, you are coming face to face with serious matters, and it is your duty as First Minister of this country to enter into negotiations with the United States, and to see if you cannot agree to some arrangement which will be profitable and honorable to both countries in order to meet those difficulties. There was another reason. Not only was the Foreign Minister of England urging them to do something, but the President of the United States himself had come down in his message to Congress and opened the door for us to enter, had held out, as it were, the right hand of fellowship to us, and in his message to Congress in the December preceding the March when this resolution was moved by the Opposition, the President in his message to Congress said:

"Notice of the termination of the fishery articles of the Treaty of Washington was duly given to the British Government, and the reciprocal privileges and exemptions of the treaty will accordingly cease on 1st July, 1885. The fisheries industries, pursued by a numerous class of our citizens on the northern coasts both of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, are worthy of the fostering care of Congress. Whenever brought into competition with the like industries of other countries, our fishermen, as well as our manufactures of fishing appliances and preparers of fish products, have maintained a foremost place. I suggest that Congress create a commission to consider the general question of our rights in the fisheries, and the means of opening to our citizens, under just and enduring conditions, the richly stocked fishing waters and sealing grounds of British North America."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The recognition of the worth and value of our fisheries is a recommendation to Congress that steps should be taken for the purpose of opening up those fisheries to American citizens, and an invitation was made to the hon. gentleman, if he was disposed to adopt a policy of conciliation, to hold out his hand to the hand of the President of the United States. But what did the hon. gentleman do? The hon. gentleman treated the invitation of the President, and the urgent request of Lord Derby—I will not say with contempt; he is too much of a diplomatist to do that—but certainly with silence; and when he did come to speak it was too late. Just a few months before the treaty expired he found there was not time to enter upon negotiations at all, and he suggested a modus vivendi, that free fish should be given to us, and free fishing to them; but the hon. gentleman accompanied that with the declaration that used to be received with such cheers by hon. gentlemen who sit behind him, that he was not going to bow the knee and ask for any favors from the United States or any other person. In a dispatch written by Lord Lansdowne, no doubt at the hon. gentleman's instance, I read:

"In the face of these circumstances my Government does not consider that it would be consistent with the respect which it owes to itself, to appear as a suitor for concessions at the hands of the United States."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Too high and mighty then. The hon. gentleman does not cheer to day. He was not prepared to ask concessions then, he was not prepared even, so high and mighty was he, to stand upon an even plane with the President of the United States, to grasp the hand of friendship which, metaphorically, had been extended across the border to him. O, no, he says, I cannot demean myself by asking any concessions from this great sixty millions of people, but I would suggest that a modus vivendi might be a good policy in that way. Well, Sir, they did not accept the suggestion, but they accepted a modification of it by which they got free fishing and we did not get free fish, and the hon. gentleman accepted that. That was the history of the transaction, and that was the policy which the hon. gentleman pursued. Sir, I denounced that policy before as inimical to the best interests of Canada, as a policy, under the circumstances, not maintaining our dignity, but derogatory to our dignity. I say it would have been much more dignified on our part if, when the President of the greatest Republic on the face of the earth had made a declaration to his Congress that I have just read, we had come forward in a manly way and said: Yes, we recognise the great complications which will ensue when these fishery articles will expire, we recognize the truth of the statement that we possess the richest fishing ground, and the most richly stocked waters in the world, and we are prepared to deal with you as honest men, on an even footing, as one nation with another. But no, Sir, the hon. gentleman lost his opportunity, he let it go by, as he has lost many other opportunities; and to day he is in the humiliating position of having to swallow a treaty not half as favorable as I have no doubt he could then have obtained. Well, then, when the season of 1885 was at end, what did the hon. gentleman do? Sir, we spoke great words in this building at the time. Hon. gentlemen took their coats off, as it were, and the Canadian flag was swung round their heads, and we heard a great deal of talk here, and a great deal of cheering about a vigorous foreign policy. Why, Sir, they entered upon this foreign policy like Olivier, the Prime Minister of Napoleon III, when he went to war with Germany with a light heart. They were prepared to fight the Americans and if the Americans did not give them what they wanted, they would bring them down to their marrow bones. We will get out our navy, we will man our cutters, we will put our captains on board, we will seize American ships and drive American sailors to desperation, we will soon teach them that we are the great Canadian people. The hon. gentleman went on at that time, not standing by the construction of the treaty, which, as I said then, and as I repeat now, in itself might be technically correct, but adopting an amendment of that treaty which was hurtful and harmful in the extreme, a policy which was capricious; at one moment, in 1885, giving them all they wanted, giving them our fisheries for nothing, and the next year not even admitting American fishermen to enter our harbors without being obliged to enter at the custom house and pay fees. Sir, the Americans did not so much complain of the construction we put upon the treaty in 1866 as of the vexatious and harassing and unnecessary conditions that we attached to the execution of that treaty. That was what was stated by them, and I will read soon a short extract from the declaration made by them after the season was over, bitterly complaining and denouncing our policy as inhospitable, as anti-Christian, as opposed to the principles on which the commercial relations of the two countries had been based for years previous. They say now, as they did then, that the construction we put upon the treaty was not a false construction, but that the manner in which we administered that treaty was calculated to irritate the fishermen themselves, and to destroy any confidence that the people or Government of the United States might have in the good-will and friendship of the Dominion of Canada. Well, Sir, we were not satisfied with the Treaty of 1818, and with the Imperial Acts, and the Canadian Acts, which were passed to put that treaty in force. The hon. gentleman, in pursuance of his vigorous policy, introduced an amendment to the Fishery Act, declaring that any American fishing vessel that entered within the prohibited ports—mark you, that crossed the lines—was liable to seizure and forfeiture. Mind you, from the year 1818 to the year 1886, we had gone on enforcing that treaty in pursuance of the Imperial and Canadian statutes. The hon. gentleman spoke of the vigorous Administration of my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell). He did not require such an Act as this; he enforced the treaty of 1818 firmly and with vigor; but his Administration was not a capricious one; he laid down certain lines and kept to them. But these gentlemen were not satisfied with the law of the land, and for the purpose—I won't say for the purpose of irritating the Americans still more, because I do not believe that could have been their intention—but carried away with the improper belief in the greatness of this Dominion, in our power to make the great nation to the south of us bend the knee, we passed this Act of 1886, declaring that any vessel that entered into the prohibited waters should be subject to seizure and forfeiture. Well, Sir, that Act did not receive the royal assent at once; it was reserved by the Governor General and received the royal assent on the 26th November, 1886, after the season had closed. And, Sir, we know what the policy of the Government then was. The Finance Minister has taken pains to-night to disavow any sympathy with that policy. I hope the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and the Minister of Justice felt very comfortable when he told them to-night that he could not endorse the lines of action they had laid down. He was not responsible except in an indirect way, I suppose, and he wanted to wash his hands clear of it altogether. That policy was one inimical to the maintenance of good relations between the United States and Canada, and the hon. gentleman is now boiling over with love and affection for his American cousins; and, therefore, not even by implication, would he endorse the reports which were afterwards made Minutes of Council, signed by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries and by the hon. Minister of Justice. He washes his hands clear of them, he did as has often been done by a leading member of the Cabinet when one of his juniors does not please him—he sat upon them and disavowed the policy altogether. But these hon. gentlemen have got to take it all the same. Let us see what that policy was, because it is very important in determining whether we should accept the new policy of the Administration to find out how far that policy differs from the one they recommended to this House a few years ago, and which they said should twelve months ago be accepted as necessary for the maintenance of our dignity. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries made a report to Council in which he laid down the policy of the Government. With much of the report I have no fault to find, and I may say in passing that I do not find fault with the construction they put upon the treaty, that I agree very largely, if not altogether, with the legal arguments by which the Minister of Marine, and especially the Minister of Justice, supported the construction they put upon the treaty. I think in the legal controversy the Minister of Justice had with the other side he came out the victor—that is my opinion; but I complain that they were not satisfied with putting a construction upon the treaty and then carrying out that construction in a firm and reasonable way, but they were determined that the customs law of this country should be dragged in to harass, to irritate, to worry and drive to desperation the American fishermen, as it did drive them to desperation. The hon. gentleman in that report says:

"It is not however the case that the convention of 1818 affected only the inshore fisheries of the British Provinces; it was framed with the object of affording a complete and exclusive definition of the rights and liberties which the fishermen of the United States were thenceforth to enjoy in following their vocation as far as these rights would be affected by facilities for access to the shores or waters of the British Provinces or for intercourse with their people. It is therefore no undue expansion of the scope of that convention to interpret strictly those of its provisions by which such access is denied, except to the vessels requiring it for the purposes specifically described.

"Such an undue expansion would, upon the other hand, certainly take place, if under cover of its provisions, or of any agreements relating to general commercial intercourse which may have since been made, permission were accorded to the United States' fishermen to resort habitually to the harbors of the Dominion, not for sake of seeking safety for their vessels or for avoiding risk of human life, but in order to use those harbors as a general base of operations from which to prosecute and organise with greater advantage to themselves the industry in which they are engaged."

The hon. gentleman then thought this would amount to a practical repeal of the treaty; that was his opinion then. But the hon. gentleman comes into court to-day and asks us to accept a treaty in which all of those concessions have been made, in which nearly every claim put forward by the United States Government at that time has substantially, to use the words of President Cleveland, been conceded to United States fishermen. They have told us it would be a practical repeal of the treaty and monstrous to allow such a thing. If the Government had voluntarily then done without compulsion, what they have done now at the point of the bayonet and under compulsion, we would have occupied a very much more honorable position and a much stronger position than we do to-day. Then we had the policy of the Government in this connection laid down by the Minister of Justice. In a report which he made in reply to some complaints furnished by the Minister at St. James, Mr. Phelps, the Minister said:

"But that which Mr. Phelps calls 'literal interpretation' is by no means so preposterous as he suggests, when the purpose and object of the treaty come to be considered. While it was not desired to interfere with ordinary commercial intercourse between the people of the two countries, the deliberate and declared purpose existed on the part of Great Britain, and the willingness existed on the part of the United States to secure, absolutely and free from the possibility of encroachment, the fisheries of the British possessions in America, to the people of those possessions, excepting as to certain localities in respect to which special provisions were made. To effect this it was not merely necessary that there should be a joint declaration of the right which was to be established, but that means should be taken to preserve that right. For this purpose a distinction was necessarily drawn between United States vessels engaged in commerce and those engaged in fishing. While the former had free access to our coasts the latter were placed under a strict prohibition.

"The purpose was to prevent the fisheries from being poached on, and to preserve them to the subjects of His Britannic Majesty in North America not only for the purpose of fishing within the waters adjacent to the coast, which can under the law of nations be done by any country but as a base of supplies for the pursuit of fishing in the deep sea. For this purpose it was necessary to keep out foreign fishing vessels, excepting in cases of dire necessity, no matter under what pretext they might desire to come in. The fisheries could not be preserved to our people if every one of the United States fishing vessels that were accustomed to swarm along our coasts could claim the right to enter our harbors, to post a letter or send a telegram or buy a newspaper, to obtain a physician in case of illness or a surgeon in case of accident, to land or bring off a passenger, or even to lend assistance to the inhabitants in fire, flood or pestilence or to buy medicine or to purchase a new rope."

To-day the Minister of Finance comes back from Washington fresh with laurels as assistant to Her Majesty's plenipotentiary and loaded with compliments from that hon. gentleman, he asks us to accept a treaty which concerns everything which he previously said would ruin our fisheries. I think the hon. gentleman might have done this: He might have said that was my policy and I believe in it, and if it turns out that the rest of the Government cannot accept it, I am prepared to step down and out and let another man come in and carry out an opposite policy. I say it is not right for those hon. gentlemen having taken the stand they did, having declared that it was essential for the protection of our fisheries to prevent American fishermen entering our ports even to post a letter or to purchase medicine, now, having adopted a treaty which admits them for all these purposes to change their policy and ask this House to assent to the new policy. Then we had the policy laid down by the Minister of Marine in still stronger language. In a report he made to the Privy Council on 1st February, 1887, he said as follows,—and I wish hon. gentlemen to follow me in the quotations I am making from these reports and to note the fact that these dates are, June, July and 1st February, respectively. The dates will be important in a moment because they will, in connection with the fact I am going to mention, serve to show why these brave gentlemen changed their policy so materially. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries says in this Minute, and mark you all those reports were adopted in their entirety by the Government of the hon. gentleman, approved in a Minute of Council and forwarded to the Home Government.

"It is not to be expected that after having earnestly insisted upon the necessity of a strict maintenance of these treaty rights, and upon the respect due by foreign vessels, while in Canadian waters, the municipal legislation by which all vessels resorting to those waters are exuberant, in the absence moreover of any decision of a legal tribunal to show that there has been any straining of the law in those cases in which it has been put in operation, that the Canadian Government will suddenly and without the justification supplied by any new facts or arguments withdraw from a position taken up deliberately and by doing so in effect plead guilty to the whole of the charges of oppression, inhumanity and bad faith, which in language wholly unwarranted by the circumstances of the case, have been made against it by the public men of the United States."

"Such a surrender on the part of Canada would involve the abandonment of a valuable portion of the national inheritance of the Canadian people, who would certainly visit with just reprobation those who were guilty of so serious a neglect of the trusts committed to their charge."

Sir, these are the brave words which the hon. the Minister made use of in the month of February, 1887, but to-night he comes in and he pleads guilty to the charge of oppression, to the charge of inhumanity, and to the charge of bad faith. He surrenders on the part of Canada he abandons the valuable portion of the national inheritance which he said was necessary to our national existence, and the result is if he is a good prophet, he will be visited with just reprobation by those who committed this trust to his hands. Sir, it may be asked what brought about this sudden change of front? Up to February they were hurling defiance at the gentlemen across the border. They said: You tell us that our policy is an inhuman policy, that it is a policy of bad faith, that it is a policy calculated to estrange the two countries. No matter the Minister of Marine says it is a deliberate policy and we would be craven (that is the meaning of his language) if we backed down from the trust which has been committed to our hand and we are going to return that trust unsullied to the hands of those who gave it. Sir, if the hon. gentleman, when he is confronted with a new policy entirely at variance with that which he said was a "deliberate" policy, came before us and said: "I cannot in conscience remain as a member of the Government and I shall let new men carry out that policy—" I would forgive him, I would say it showed a spirit of manly independence. But I cannot conceive how this gentleman, who laid down this policy in the strong language that he embodied in the state paper I have quoted from, should come down and ask us to accept this treaty as a fair and honorable treaty between both parties. Every claim made by the United States has substantially, although not in words, been admitted, and to-day, Sir, the Finance Minister, even with all his ingenuity, was not able to tell this House of one concession—and I watched him from beginning to end—which our American neighbors had made to the great Canadian people. Now, Sir, just at that time, just when the hon. gentleman was nailing his colors to the mast in Canada here, the Minister of the United States at the Court of St. James was formulating in a state paper the complaints which the Americans had against our administration of the law. Sir, I will ask your attention to that for one moment, because unless we see what they complained of, and what the hon. gentleman refused to remedy, we cannot tell whether by this treaty they have conceded all that the Americans claimed or not. I find, Sir, that Mr. Phelps, in a despatch to the Marquis of Salisbury on the 26th of January, 1887, formulated his complaints against the administration of our fishery laws in these terms:

"The United States Government is not able to concur in the favorable view taken by Lord Iddlesleigh of the efforts of the Canadian Government 'to promote a friendly negotiation.' That the conduct of that Government has been directed to obtaining a revision of the existing treaty is not to be doubted. But its efforts have been of such a character as to preclude the prospect of a successful negotiation so long as they continue, and seriously to endanger the friendly relations between the United States and Great Britain.

"Aside from the question as to the right of American vessels to purchase bait in Canadian ports, such a construction has been given to the treaty between the United States and Great Britain as amounts virtually to a declaration of a most complete non-intercourse with American vessels. The usual courtesy between friendly nations has been refused in their case, and in one instance, at least, the ordinary offices of humanity. The treaty of friendship and amity which in return for the very important concessions by the United States to Great Britain reserve to American vessels certain specified privileges, has been construed to preclude them from all other intercourse common to civilised life and to universal maritime usage among nations not at war, as well as from the right to touch and trade accorded to all vessels.

"And quite aside from any question arising upon construction of the treaty, the provisions of the Custom House Acts and Regulations have been systematically enforced against American ships for alleged petty and technical violations of legal requirements in a manner so unreasonable, unfriendly and so unjust as to render the privileges accorded by the treaty practically nugatory.

"It is not for a moment contended by the United States Government that American vessels should be exempt from those reasonable port and Custom House regulations which are in force in countries where such vessels have occasion to visit. If they choose to violate such requirements, the Government will not attempt to screen them from the just and legal consequence.

"But what the United States Government complain in these cases is that the existing regulations have been construed with a technical strictness, and enforced with a severity, in cases of inadvertent and accidental violation where no harm was done, which is both unusual and unnecessary, whereby the voyages of vessels had been broken up and heavy penalties incurred. That the liberal and reasonable construction of these laws that had prevailed for many years, and to which the fishermen have become accustomed, was changed without any notice given. (On every opportunity of unnecessary interference with the American fishing vessels to the prejudice and destruction of their business has been availed of."

The hon. gentleman will see that while he complained of the construction of the treaty he did not base the main ground of his complaint upon the severe construction of the treaty by the Dominion Government at all, but he based it upon the systematic enforcement, as he termed it, against American ships of alleged petty and technical violations of the custom house regulations and acts. There is no doubt, as was afterwards stated by Mr. Bayard in his despatch, that the petty actions, trivial in themselves, against the American fishing vessels which suffered from the attempt to enforce customs regulations against them in every port, did more than anything else that was done by the Government of the day to irritate the American nation, to irritate the American fishermen and to bring about that state of non-intercourse which the hon. gentleman referred to and the Retaliatory Bill which was passed. But, Sir, just at the very time when these hon. gentlemen were declaring that they could not surrender one iota to the Americans, we find that they agreed to give up the whole case altogether. We find that on the 24th day of February, the Secretary of State for the Colonies in England telegraphed to the Governor General of Canada as follows:—

"Her Majesty's Government, while endeavoring to procure this ad interim arrangement, feel it right to intimate to you that they are disposed to think, after much consideration of the entire subject, that the best and simplest settlement of the present difficulties might be arrived at if both parties would agree so as to permit the discussion of the more extended commercial arrangements—to revive, for time at least, if not permanently, the condition of things which existed under the Treaty of Washington, fish and fish productions being again recipro-cally admitted duty free, and the fishery being once more reciprocally thrown open."

On the 26th February the Government telegraphed in reply:

"Referring to your telegram of the 24th February, Canadian Government is prepared to accept your suggestion of reverting temporarily the condition of things existing under the Treaty of Washington without at present raising the question of indemnity."

Pursuant to their telegram Lord Salisbury made the offer to the American Government, but nothing appears to have come of it. Now, Sir, on the 3rd day of March, just a few weeks after the hon. Minister of Marine had penned the report which I have just read, the United States Government, pressed by the fishermen, and, as the hon. Minister said, by a determined and united people and a united press, and driven to desperation by the way in which Canada had carried out the treaty, introduced the Retaliatory Bill; and that Bill, Sir, altered the whole circumstances of the case. The entire character of our protective service at once changed. Hon. gentlemen then saw that they had been pushing this matter too far. They saw that they could not re-enact in 1887, as they were termed by the United States, the tyrannical acts and the tyrannical construction of the customs laws which they had enforced in 1886. They saw, Sir, that the American Government and people would not submit to dictation. The possible consequences of that Retaliatory Bill were not overdrawn by the hon. Finance Minister when he said it would stop the whole intercourse between the two people, and would be destructive of the trade and commerce of Canada. But while the hon. gentleman put that construction on the Retaliatory Bill to-day, what did he do one short year ago? He was then engaged in backing up the policy of the Minister of Marine which he disavows to-night, and he then told us that that Non-intercourse Bill, as he termed it, would not be an unmixed evil. It would lead, he said, to the development of better intercourse between ourselves. To-day he tells us it would produce a commercial disaster in Canada the end of which no one could foresee. Sir, he was prepared with a light heart to go into the war a year ago; to-day he tells us, and tells us I believe truly, that that Retaliatory Bill, if it came into force, would paralyse the prosperity of Canada; it would put an end to the prosperous intercourse which prevails between us and our neighbors in the United States; and it would hurl the present Government from power—and that I believe was the motive that compelled these hon. gentlemen to retrace their steps and adopt a policy antagonistic to the policy they pursued a year ago. But, Sir, what are we to say? One year ago I heard the hon. gentleman challenge the Government of the United States to put that Retaliatory Bill into force. We were not afraid of them, he said: [It will not be an unmixed evil;] we will develop intercourse among ourselves, and good will come out of it in the long run; and the 120 gentlemen who sit behind him cheered the sentiment to the echo. To-day he tells the same gentleman that it would be the greatest disaster that could happen to Canada, and they turn around and cheer that sentiment. Sir, I do not know any sentiment the hon. gentleman could utter with his grave face that his followers behind him would not cheer. Then, Sir, shortly after the hon. gentlemen made that warlike declaration in the House, he saw fit to change his mind. He had a message from Secretary Bayard, and who was the mediator chosen by these two great nations to carry a communication from the Secretary of the United States to the Finance Minister of Canada? Who was the confidential envoy entrusted with the secret minds of those gentlemen? No less a person than Mr. Erastus Wiman, who has been denounced in this House by dozens of hon. gentlemen opposite as an apostate to his country; who is sneered at by the Conservative press throughout this country as a man having a fad. He is the man who above all others is chosen by the Secretary of State of the United States to convey a confidential intimation to the Finance Minister of Canada that it would be well for them to meet and have a confidential talk over this matter. Well, Sir, not only was he chosen by the Secretary of State of the United States, but he was accepted by the Finance Minister of Canada, and the Finance Minister has put the sign manual of his approval on him to-night; and I would venture to say that there is not a man sitting on the benches behind him who will ever hereafter speak of Erastus Wiman except with respect—no more “rasses,” and no more “fads.” I did not hear the interruption of the hon. Minister of the Interior. But when the hon. gentleman who leads him, who leads the Government, and who can force his policy on them when he likes, tells them that Mr. Erastus Wiman is a man to be trusted, I think the hon. gentleman will accept the statement. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman went to Washington, and he has given us a frank statement of the interchange of views that took place between him and Secretary Bayard. Sir, I never read in my life with more pleasure than the communications which passed between those two gentlemen; and if the hon. gentleman would to-day step out from the party that is trammelling and keeping him from doing what I believe his own heart tells him should be done—if he would come out to-day and formulate in this House the policy which he favored in that letter, he would not only draw from behind him a larger following, but he would receive from this side of the House a most cordial support.

Mr. HICKEY. That is too thin.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) And the hon. gentleman, I venture to say, would be one of the first to follow him. Now, Sir, let me refer to a thing which I endorse most cordially. We know that the hon. gentleman's first contention was first advanced by the hon. the Secretary of States. That hon. gentleman, in some extraordinary way, nominated the Finance Minister as the Commissioner for Canada. Well, I am not going to take objection to the nomination of the hon. gentleman. I am going to take objection to the theory he laid down to-night that the right to negotiate our own commercial treaties would be a suicidal policy, if we had it conceded to us, but I am not going to object, after his having been nominated by the Secretary of State, to that nomination having received the cordial approval of Her Gracious Majesty. I wonder if Mr. Wiman had anything to do with suggesting the hon. gentleman's name? What does Mr. Bayard say:

“I am confident we both seek to obtain a just and permanent settlement—and there is but one way to procure it—and that is by a straightforward treatment on a liberal and statesmanlike plan of the entire commercial relations of the two countries. I say commercial because I do not propose to include, however indirectly, or by any intendment, however partial or oblique, the political relations of Canada and the United States, nor to affect the legislative independence of either country.”

Well, the hon. the Minister of Finance to-night quoted with approval that sentiment of Mr. Bayard. Mr. Bayard, he believed was sincere, and Mr. Bayard said there was but one way to procure a just and permanent settlement, and that was by a liberal statesmanlike treatment of the entire commercial relations of the two countries, which did not involve, directly or indirectly our political independence. The hon. gentleman said he believed that Mr. Bayard, in so saying, spoke the truth; but what have his followers been stating for the past three weeks? They have been declaring that Mr. Bayard did not tell the truth, and that a settlement upon a broad, liberal and statesmanlike plan of the entire commercial relations of the two countries necessarily involved the surrender of our political independence. That is what not only one the hon. gentleman's followers said, but it is what many of them repeated over in a parrot like manner. They have had their answer to-night from the First Minister who tells them they are all wrong, and that the proposition of Secretary Bayard, that a statesmanlike settlement, on a broad, generous basis, of the entire commercial relations of the two countries does not involve, directly or indirectly, the surrender of one atom of our political independence. I hope now that hon. gentlemen opposite will cease shouting their senseless cry of disloyalty and accept the construction put upon the proposition by their own leader the First Minister. Well, we had that offer, and I did not catch from the hon. gentleman why it was negotiations were at once entered upon. I did not hear him state why the matter remained over from May last until the following November, but we do know that while no negotiations were entered into, the entire policy of the Government with regard to the carrying out of our fishery laws was remodelled and changed; there were no more seizures, there were no more alleged breaches of custom laws. There were no more vexatious and harassing seizures and detention of American vessels, and although, formally, the instructions remained as they were before, practically and substantially, they had so entirely changed that they were no longer in force. The hon. gentleman said, and I was sorry to hear him say it, that he was proud Canada had not the right to negotiate her own commercial treaties. He was proud, he said, that we had not the nomination of our own commissioners and plenipotentiaries. Sir, I take issue with him. I submit, without fear of contradiction, that the one arbitration which ever has been held between Canada and United States, which resulted honorably to the people of Canada, in which we got a fair meed of justice, was that arbitration in which we appointed our own Minister. When the Halifax Commissioner was being appointed, it was a matter of history that the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie, who led the Government, was pressed very strongly by the Imperial Government to accept the nomination of an English gentleman to be nominated by them, and it is to his credit that he refused to bow to their dictation in that respect, and insisted upon Canada's right to nominate the gentleman who should be appointed to represent her. It was a lucky day for Canada when the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) had the pluck and the manliness to assert Canadian dignity and the right of Canada to have a Canadian appointed to represent her on that commission. The hon. gentleman would lead us to imagine that forsooth if this right was conceded to Canada, our interests would be sacrificed, that we would not have the prestige which now attaches to the appointment made by Her Majesty at the dictation of her Minister, whoever he may be. Was that the case in Halifax, when Sir Alexander Galt acted on behalf of the Dominion? Is it not true that every one conceded that the management of the case by the nominee of the Canadian Government reflected the highest credit on his ability, integrity and diplomacy, and on the Government that appointed him? Therefore, the hon. gentleman's statement is not one I can endorse. Before I sit down, I wish to say a few words about the treaty itself. It is a record of surrenders on our part; it is a record of concessions on our part, and I am sorry to say there is no record of any concessions in return on the part of the Americans. Our fishermen have no compensating concessions made to them. The hon. gentleman could not name one. Our fishermen to-day will fish in our waters, access into which has been given the American fishermen, and when the vessels of the two nations bring the results of their season's work to Boston, our fishermen will be handicapped to the extent of two dollars a barrel. I am not going to use on this point my own language, but will quote again the language of the hon. gentleman himself, which I gave in the early part of my remarks, and the language of the First Minister when he said that “under these circumstances Canadian fishermen would become the hewers of wood and drawers of water to the fishermen of the United States.” That is the condition in which the hon. gentleman has left them to-day. His treaty is a non-conditional surrender on the part of Canada to all that the Americans claim. What is the statement made by the President of the United States himself in respect to this treaty. He says:

"The history of the events in the past two years shows that no feature of Canadian administration was more harassing and injurious than the compulsion upon our fishing vessels to make formal entry and clearance on every occasion of their temporarily seeking shelter in Canadian ports and harbors."

He was not complaining of the construction put upon the treaty, because he admits, and the American Senate consented to admit, that the legal construction put by the Government upon the words of the treaty is correct. But he says:

"You have harassed and injured our fishing vessels by compelling them to make out entries and clearances in your ports."

And this treaty relieves them from all that.

"Such inconvenience is provided against in the proposed treaty and this most frequent and just cause of complaint is removed. The articles permitting our fishermen to obtain provisions and the ordinary supplies of trading vessels on their homeward voyages, and under which they are accorded the further and even more important privilege on all occasions of purchasing such casual or needful provisions and supplies as are ordinarily granted to trading vessels, are of great importance and value. The licenses which are to be granted without charge and on application, in order to enjoy these privileges, are reasonable and proper checks in the hands of local authorities to identify the recipient and prevent abuse, and can form no impediment to those who intend to use them fairly."

"The hospitality secured for our vessels in all cases of actual distress, with liberty to unload and sell and tranship their cargoes, is full and liberal. These provisions will secure the substantial enjoyment of the treaty rights for our fishermen under the Treaty of 1818, for which contention has been steadily made in the correspondence of the Department of State and our Minister at London and by the American negotiators of the present treaty."

If Grover Cleveland is correct in his construction, it has been an unconditional surrender by the Government of Canada to the demands of the people of the United States. I am not, just for the moment, contending that these concessions are unjust in themselves, but I am contending that the men who declared a year ago that they were unjust, and that they could not possibly concede them, and that the concession of them would prove ruinous to Canada, stand to-day in a position the most unenviable that any statesmen can possibly occupy, when they ask us now to accept this treaty, which concedes everything which they said before could not possibly be conceded because it would be ruinous. They should step down and let other men make the concessions. That is their duty, and that is the course any English statesmen would take; but they do not understand that. What does Secretary Bayard say about it? He says:

"The United States have secured practically everything we have been contending for. I do not hesitate to say that, if Canada had conceded to the United States fishermen in 1818, one fourth of the rights that are secured for them by this treaty, there would have been no trouble at all. We would not have heard a single complaint, because no grievance would have been felt. Every difficulty that the American fishermen has had to contend with has been removed by this treaty. Generally it can be stated that no fishing ground of any value whatever to American fishermen has been conceded to Canada by this treaty."

That is the view Secretary Bayard takes of it. That view is correct. We stand here to-day giving our assent to a treaty of unconditional surrender on the part of the Canadian people and the Canadian Government. We boasted of what we could do, we talked about reciprocity of tariffs, we spoke about bringing the Americans on their knees to us, we talked about forcing them to do this and to do that; and to-day we are in the humiliating position that we have to concede at the point of the bayonet what it would have been manly and honorable and better for us to have conceded voluntarily two years ago. Now, I want to call the attention of the House for a moment or two to the treaty itself. The hon. gentleman says that, when he went there to Washington, his instructions were not limited, that he was instructed by the Government to obtain as near an approach to the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854 as he could get, but it is perfectly evident, from the language he made use of in reply to Secretary Bayard, that he was prepared to go much further than that. What does he tell us to-night? He says, I made an offer to the United States Government on the 30th November:

"That with the view of removing all causes of difference in connection with the fisheries, it is proposed by Her Majesty's plenipotentiaries that the fishermen of both countries shall have all the privileges enjoyed during the existence of the fishery articles of the Treaty of Washington, in consideration of a mutual arrangement providing for greater freedom of commercial intercourse between the United States and Canada and Newfoundland."

The hon. gentleman did not confine that to natural products. He was challenged by my friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and was told, that means unrestricted reciprocity. What was the answer the Finance Minister made? My offer was unrestricted, and I intended that it should be so. Is that correct? If the hon. gentleman made an offer of unrestricted reciprocity, as he says he did, he should have been in this House for the past three weeks to hear the denunciations heaped upon his unfortunate head by all his followers, to hear their statements that such an offer was disloyal, that it was striking at the foundation of Canadian liberty and undermining the pillars upon which Canadian independence rested. We hear to-day that we have been forestalled in our traitorous designs of having unrestricted reciprocity with the United States by the Finance Minister himself, and yet the hon. the Premier takes him back to his bosom, disloyal as he is, and is perfectly satisfied with him, as long as he succeeds in maintaining the hon. gentleman in power. That is the sum total of their efforts, apparently. But, although the Finance Minister tells us to-night that the offer was an offer of unrestricted reciprocity, that it was unrestricted in its terms, a fortnight has not gone by since a Minister of the Crown stated in reply to a gentleman on this side who put the same construction upon the offer, that it was a mistake, that it was not so. I think that was the Minister who interrupted me who, on page 542 of Hansard, made a declaration that Sir Charles Tupper never made an offer of reciprocity unrestricted in its character, and we have the hon. Minister of Finance to-night stating that it was so and that he intended it should be so. There will be some little curiosity on the part of the House and of the country to see those hon. gentlemen reconcile their statements, but, in view of what we have already seen, I have no doubt which policy is going to govern in the long run, if the hon. Minister remains here. The "boys" of the Cabinet, as they were called a little while ago, will have to accept the policy as he dictates it. He is the real leader to-day and the master of the policy of the Government. That is perfectly evident. Now, the hon. gentleman stated, with reference to the treaty itself, that the delimitation clauses amounted to a concession on the part of Canada to the United States. That is true. They do amount to a concession. We formerly contended for the headland theory, and that has been surrendered by this treaty. I am not going to waste much time on this, but I am sorry that the hon. gentleman made the statement he did to-night to the effect that, for the past forty years, Great Britain has withdrawn its contention in that respect. The British Government never withdrew its contention on that point. Down to 1852—

Mr. MITCHELL. 1854.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.). I am coming to 1854 afterwards, but I am referring to 1852 at present. The British Government down to 1852 consistently and persistently claimed that to be the construction of the treaty, and in 1852 the Secretary of State of the United States, the greatest Secretary they ever had, Webster himself, declared that the contention of the British Government was right and there could be no doubt about it. In a state paper, dated 6th July, 1852, Mr. Webster, Secretary of State, although contending that the wording of the Convention of 1818 was not conformable to the intentions of the United States as one of the contracting parties, says :

"It would appear that by a strict and rigid construction of this article (first article of the Convention of 1818) fishing vessels of the United States are precluded from entering into the bays or harbors of the British Provinces, except for the purposes of shelter, repairing damages and obtaining wood and water. A bay, as is usually understood, is an arm or recess of the sea entering from the ocean between capes or headlands, and the term is applied equally to small and large tracts of water thus situated. It is common to speak of Hudson Bay, or the bay of Biscay, although they are very large tracts of water.

"The British authorities insist that England has no right to draw a line from headland to headland, and to capture every fisherman who may follow their pursuits inside of that line. It was undoubtedly an oversight, in the Convention of 1818, to make so large a concession to England, since the United States had usually considered that those vast inlets, or recesses of the ocean, ought to be opened to American fishermen as freely as the sea itself, to within three miles of the shore."

The Secretary of States there admits that under the proper construction of the treaty, the contention of the British Government was correct. Senator Butler, the same year, adopted the same construction; Mr. Seward adopted the same, and a large number of others.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Everett the same.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, in connection with Lord Aberdeen's correspondence.

Mr. DAVIES. Mr. Seward said on that occasion :

"I cannot assent to the force of the argument of the hon. Senator from Louisiana. I am more prepared to go against it, because I think it is getting pretty late in the day to find the Secretary of State wrong in the technical and legal construction of an instrument. Let us test the argument. The hon. Senator says, that where the Government occupies both sides of the coast, and where the strait through which the waters of the bay flows into the Ocean, is not more than six miles wide, then there is dominion over it.

"Now, then, the Gut of Canso is a most indispensable communication for our fishermen from the Atlantic Ocean to the Northumberland Straits, and to the Gulf of St. Lawrence, for a reason which any one will very readily see by referring to the map; yet the Gut of Canso is only three-quarters of a mile wide. I should be sorry to adopt an argument which Great Britain might turn against us to exclude us from that important passage."

Again I recall the hon. Senator's argument, viz. :

"Two things unite to give a country dominion over an inland sea. The first is, that the land on both sides must be within the dominion of the Government claiming jurisdiction, and then, that the strait is not more than six miles wide; but that if the strait is more than six miles wide, no such jurisdiction can be claimed."

Upon which he commented :

"Now, Sir, this argument seems to me to prove too much. I think it would divest the United States of the harbor of Boston, all the land around which belongs to Massachusetts or the United States, while the mouth of the bay is six miles wide. It would surrender our dominion over Long Island Sound, a dominion which I think the State of New York and the United States would not willingly give up, it would surrender Delaware Bay, it would surrender, I think, Albermarle Sound, and Chesapeake Bay; and I believe it would surrender the Bay of Monterey, and perhaps the Bay of San Francisco on the Pacific coast."

Sir, not only have we here Her Majesty's Government contending for the extended construction put upon the word "bay," known as the headland's construction, but we have leading men of the United States, such as Mr. Webster and Mr. Seward, assenting to that construction, and enforcing it with arguments which, in the United States Senate, were irresistible, showing that if you do not concede that, they give up their own chief and principal bays. Now the hon. gentleman quoted from a declaration made by the British Government, made in 1866, but he omitted to quote the preceding sentence which entirely modifies the quotation he made. In 1866 the British Government stated :

"Her Majesty's Government are clearly of opinion that by the Convention of 1818, the United States have renounced the right of fishing, not only within three miles from the Colonial shores, but within three miles of a line drawn across the mouth of a British bay or creek. But the question 'What is a British bay or creek?' is one which has been an occasion of difficulty in former times. It is, therefore, at present, the wish of Her Majesty's Government neither to concede, nor for the present, to enforce any rights in this respect which are in their nature open to any serious question."

They re-affirmed the doctrine of the headlands in its fullest sense in 1870, but in view of the pending negotiations for the Washington Treaty, they declined to give their consent to their being enforced at that time. They were willing to make temporary concessions in order, if possible, that the Washington Treaty might be consummated, but they never yielded or conceded for one moment that the arguments they had advanced were unsound. I am sorry the hon. gentleman went out of this way for the purpose of putting into the mouth of the British Government an argument which they never used with reference to this question. Now, Sir, I am not disposed to find a great deal of fault with the articles of this treaty, which refer to the delimitation of our waters. They are concessions, as the hon. gentleman says, from us; there are no concessions to us that I am aware of. The hon. gentleman speaks of certain bays which are excepted. The hon. gentleman knows that some of those bays never had a fisherman in them since the Treaty of 1818 was enacted, Take Egmont Bay for instance. My hon. friend from Prince County (Mr. Yeo) comes from that quarter, and he knows it well, and my hon. friend in front of me knows it well, and they know well that in the memory of living man, an American fisherman has never been seen fishing in Egmont Bay. However, I am not here to cavil, I do not wish to make objection merely for the purpose of objecting. So far as the question of delimiting the waters is concerned, I think the compromise is not one which we should refuse to accept—I do not think we ought to, although we do give up, as the hon. gentleman says, a great deal we once contended for; we concede nine-tenths, I dare say, of what our contention was previously, but I am satisfied. In the matter of these bays we must remember that while they may be very valuable one year, they may not be valuable another. Now, the Bay of Chaleurs at one time was the chief resort for the mackerel that came from the Bay of St. Lawrence. But to-day they do not come to the Bay of Chaleurs, and hardly any fishermen enter that bay. But in a year or two the mackerel may return; therefore the exception made here of reserving the Bay of Chaleurs as out of the common waters, may one day prove to be a valuable exception, and I am glad it was made. But I do not agree with the hon. gentleman that article 9 of the treaty should be accepted in the same way. The treaty says :

"Nothing in this treaty shall interrupt or affect the free navigation of the Straits of Canso by fishing vessels of the United States."

Practically, that amounts to a concession to the United States for all time of the right, mind you, to use the Straits of Canso for fishing purposes. Heretofore they have not enjoyed that right. That is a tremendous concession we have given to them, and when the treaty is once assented to the Straits of Canso become common water to the Americans as well as to the Canadians. I say it is a great and valuable concession which we have made to them, and in return we have got nothing. But, Sir, I want to come to articles 10 and 11. Now, article 10 concedes to the United States that for which we have been contending, and that for which the Minister of Marine and the Government strenuously denied. American fishing vessels can now enter our harbors, they need not report, they need not enter and need not clear in the custom house when they come for shelter or repair, nor when they come in—

"outside the limits of established ports of entry, for the purpose of purchasing wood or obtaining water; except that any such vessel remaining more than 24 hours, exclusive of Sundays and legal holidays, within any such port, or communicating with the shore therein—" may be required to report, but they shall not be liable for compulsory pilotage nor for any dues. These are the concessions we make to the Americans. The hon. gentleman says they are reasonable concessions; but if they are reasonable concessions, why did the Government not make them a year ago, why did they bring us to the verge of war with our neighbors across the line by withholding those concessions which to day he terms reasonable and which he asks us to approve? Why not have conceded them in a frank, honorable and manly way two years ago? If that had been done, the Government would have stood very much higher in the estimation of the people than to-day, and we would have been much nearer obtaining the boon we all desire, freer commercial relations with the United States. Now we come to article 9, a most important article. That article provides :

"United States fishing vessels entering the ports, bays and harbors of the eastern and north-eastern coasts of Canada or of the coasts of Newfoundland under stress of weather or other casualty may unload, reload, tranship or sell, subject to Customs laws and regulations, all fish on board, when such unloading, transhipment, or sale is made necessary as incidental to repairs, and may replenish outfits, provisions and supplies damaged or lost by disaster; and in case of death or sickness shall be allowed all needful facilities, including the shipping of crews."

The practical construction that will be put upon the article will be this: An American captain can come into port, he can declare that he comes in from stress of weather—he is the judge of the matter, you have to accept his statement. He can come in if he loses a jib-boom, even a rope yarn; he may unload and tranship—the most valuable privilege and that for which the Americans have been contending for years, and which puts them on an equal footing with our fishermen, while our men are handicapped by a duty of $2 a barrel. Technically you may say that American vessels cannot come in unless under stress of weather or other casualty. How are you to determine it? An American comes in from stress of weather because he has lost a hal-yard, and while it is being repaired he unloads. I do not see how you can prevent it. Practically under this treaty the Americans will ask for and claim and have a right to tranship their fish in the manner they have been demanding for many years. I must confess I fail to apprehend, even after the explanation of the Finance Minister, the meaning of the latter part of the section :

A man who once obtains a license, which he can obtain gratis, has a right on all occasions afterwards, not only for the homeward voyage, but for any other voyage, to be accorded the same facilities for the purpose of casual or needful provisions and supplies as are given to trading vessels. The hon. gentleman seems to think that the construction of that clause was that it applied only to vessels when on the homeward voyage; but that is not the true construction. Having once obtained the license, they are entitled to it on all occasions afterwards. I suppose it was assumed to mean for the same season; but I do not know as to that. An American vessel will ask for the license at the first port at which she arrives, and she will be entitled to obtain it and will be entitled afterwards to the same facilities for purchasing supplies as are granted to merchant vessels. What are supplies? Who is going to put a construction upon supplies? The words are "provisions and supplies." Supplies are not, therefore, provisions, because both words are used. The Americans will say this term embraces bait. You will say it does not embrace bait. The treaty you have interpreted was plain and clearly understood, but the interpretation treaty we have now before us is difficult of interpretation and there will be trouble in regard to it from the very start. There are sure to be differences of opinion between the captains of merchant vessels as to the right to purchase bait and the Government which does not wish to furnish it. Supplies must mean something, and it is clear they do not mean provisions, and I do not know what a vessel requires except provisions and bait and things of that kind. It will be found that this treaty has not been carefully worded and is open to different interpretations, and if the broader construction that I think the Americans will claim is conceded to them, you will have given up everything that the subsequent clause provides to give the Americans, the right to purchase provisions, bait, ice, seines and transhipment of fish when the duties are removed, will be a dead letter, because they will claim they have a right to all that under article 11. I do not say they have the right, I say the treaty has been so loosely drawn that it will take a dozen Philadelphia lawyers to tell really what it does mean. I have seen half a dozen lawyers considering it, three favoring one interpretation, three another, and I have never yet found two men with the same opinion in regard to it. It is clear that difficulties will arise between Canada and the United States as to the rights to which American fishermen are entitled under section 11. I would say nothing about the modus vivendi. If the treaty was good in itself, if it was an honorable and fair treaty, I would object to a modus vivendi being agreed upon for two years such as was offered by the Commissioners from Great Britain and is attached to the treaty here. But there are not only the concessions in the treaty, it appears as if the Government were not able to give the Americans enough, and as soon as they had given all they asked, the Government then said that in good fellowship and with a wish to promote good feeling we propose for the next two years for a nominal sum to give you everything you can possibly ask and all that our fishermen enjoy on our shores. The amount of $1.50 a ton is a nominal sum, meaning as it does only $1.20 on a fishing vessel of 80 tons. However, I maintain that there will be much difficulty arising from the construction of this treaty and from the interpretation put upon its terms, very much more than on the interpretation of the old treaty. The old treaty was so plain there could hardly be two interpretations placed upon it, and it was its administration that caused complaint to be made in regard to it and the administration of the customs laws to the American fishing vessels which they thought should have not have been applied. The upshot of the whole business is, as I have said, that the Americans got all they wanted, as the President said in his Message, and as Mr. Bayard said in the interview which is published in his organ The Post. And we got what? We have listened for three hours to the Minister of Finance. Did he tell us one thing we got, one concession or one promise even from the Americans? We got absolutely nothing and we conceded everything. The hon. gentleman talked about the Americans not wanting to come within the three-mile limit to fish. He knows that, rightly or wrongly, their leading men have been convinced that the fishing privilege within the three-mile limit is valueless. I do not agree with their contention. I noticed to-day in reading a report of the Senate of the United States that upon this point they make a full report to the Senate and to the people of the States. Having examined a large number of witnesses upon the point, they conclude as follows :

"In view of all these facts well known to the great body of the citizens of the United States engaged in fisheries and embracing every variety of interest connected therewith, from the wholesale dealer, vessel owner and outfitter to that portion of the crew who receive the smallest share of the venture, it must be considered as conclusively established that there would be no material value whatever in the grant of the British Government to American fishermen of absolutely free fishing; and in this conclusion it will be seen by a reference to the testimony, that all these interests fully concur."

The reason, therefore, they did not get free fishing was because they did not ask it, and they did not ask it because they thought it was valueless. I think they are mistaken. I think, Sir, and I have always thought after listening to all the evidence given before the Halifax Fishery Commission, that the right to fish within the three-mile limit is a most valuable right in this regard. It may not be so valuable as it once was when the Americans fished with hook and line entirely. They then had to come to the three-mile limit almost entirely to catch fish, but I contend it is valuable still. Why, Sir, if a vessel goes down to the bay of St. Lawrence to catch fish, the exclusion from the three-mile limit may mean the difference between a profitable and an unprofitable voyage. The seventy, or eighty, or a hundred barrels of fish, that might be caught within the three-mile limit, and which by reason of the exclusion they will fail to catch, may mean the profits, and large profits too upon the whole voyage. The cost of going down is the same and those gentlemen may say what they like, but I maintain now and always have maintained that they are wrong in their conclusion and that the fishing privilege within the three-mile limit is still a most valuable one, but as I said before they did not get it because they did not ask for it, and they did not ask for it because after considering the report of the evidence they thought it was not worth it. When they did ask for it in 1854 and when we gave up our right to the Americans we got reciprocal trade with that country in return. In 1871 when we gave up our right under the Washington Treaty we got not only a remission of the duties upon our fish, but Sir, we got five and a half millions of money compensation paid to us for the concessions we made. In 1886 we gave them up the privileges they have been contending for and we got nothing whatever in return. What I complain of is, that we should never have attempted to harass the Americans with those custom regulations which they complained of as so arbitrary. They complained that we denied them their rights and that we not harassed them in the enjoyment of their rights and harassed them by imposing duties upon them that which ought to have been imposed, and that we threw all the difficulties we possibly could throw in the way of the exercise by them as they said of their rights under the treaty. If we had voluntarily ceded to them these concessions which have been wrung from us under this treaty we would to-day be standing in a proud position. But, Sir, they have obtained everything and we have got nothing in return. I condemn the policy of the Government because it has been an arbitrary policy. Arbitrary in so far as it applied to those American fishing vessels in the Customs Acts and regulations of the Dominion which never should have been applied to them. I condemn it as a capricious policy because, while one year you gave them the fisheries in 1885 for nothing, the next year you prosecute and persecute them with all the rigors of the law in the regulations of the custom house and the Marine and Fisheries Department, and now capriciously you turn around and, after telling the people of the country that the concessions they demand from you would prove ruinous to the fishery interest and could never be conceded without the loss of the whole fisheries, you adopt a treaty which conceded every demand to them and which you now ask the House to assent to. Well, Sir, if this does nothing more than to teach us that our highest and best policy is not to irritate our friends by the retaliatory policy which we have adopted in times gone by, if it does nothing more than to teach us to cultivate the friendly relationship which ought to exist between that great nation and this great nation to the north, we will not have paid too dearly for our lesson. I fear that while the hon. gentleman remains in power his policy will consist of the same arbitrary and capricious changes which have characterised his policy in this fishery muddle from beginning to end and who does not deserve any recommendation at the hands of this Parliament. The treaty has been agreed upon, and I for one hope that no action will be taken by this Parliament to throw it out. I am willing, Sir, it should be accepted. The right hon. gentleman smiles. I say that many of the concessions he grants to them by treaty should have been granted to them long ago. They should have been granted voluntarily, and if you had done so, I repeat as I said once or twice already, you would not now stand in the humiliating position you are in, whereby your Minister of Marine and the Government have been obliged to eat the brave words they have spoken for seven years past, and the Minister of Finance himself has been obliged to retract and withdraw the war-like words he spoke in reference to the retaliatory policy enacted by the United States, and he has had to adopt a policy in the very opposite direction to that which he asked the House to adopt only one short year ago.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, I am quite unable to agree with anything that has been said by the hon. gentleman who has just sat down. I am quite unable to believe that hon. gentleman has been sincere in one utterance that he has made in the course of the speech he addressed to this House. I am further unable to believe that the hon. gentleman was ingenuous, either in the quotations or the arguments which he presented to this House from the beginning of his speech to the end of it. I am inclined to give the hon. gentleman credit for a large degree of patriotism, but the hon. gentleman is not I am sure speaking to this country at all with regard to this treaty. He knew that this House was so well acquainted with all the negotiations that had taken place with regard to this question, with all the features of the Treaty of 1818, and with all the customs laws, he knew that the country was so familiar with this question at least those portions of the country in which the fishery question is understood at all, that I am sure that he did not intend to insult this House or to insult Canada, by expecting either this House or any portion of Canada to credit the arguments or to believe the statements which he put before this House. But the hon. gentleman evidently had a very patriotic motive and it apparently was this. Since the making of this treaty the hon. gentleman knows that from one end of the United States to the other a cry has gone up not that the United States have been captured by us, but that the interests of the United States have been sacrificed in this treaty. The hon. gentleman knows that from one end of the capitol to the other, where the Congress of the United States is now sitting, that the enemies of the Administration, the enemies of this treaty, the enemies of Canada, have been ringing the changes which he has reversed here to-night and asking that Congress should reject this treaty as being too favorable to the Dominion of Canada. The hon. gentleman entertained us for an hour and a half with a series of arguments and statements not one of which we can credit and not one of which I would insult the hon. gentleman to suppose that he believes himself, but he gave them with a view to furnish arguments to the friends of Canada in the United States who desire to see this treaty adopted and ratified there, and who will be told for the first time from the Parliament of Canada that the interests of Canada have been sacrificed by the treaty which this House is asked to adopt. I do not remember, Sir, any more ludicrous feature in this debate than the hon. gentleman's censure on the speech of the hon. Minister of Finance in vindicating the Treaty of 1871. What did the hon. gentleman say? He said it was exceedingly patriotic of the hon. Finance Minister in 1871 to defend the treaty, to show that British subjects acquired advantageous concessions under that treaty, which were probably equal to those which had been given to the citizens of the United States, thereby, said the hon. gentleman, jeopardizing all our chances of getting a large money award when we went to the arbitration at Halifax; and the hon. gentleman still thinks that he made a great point on that question; and he has the courage to ridicule and condemn the hon. Minister of Finance for having defended the Treaty of 1871 in this House. That treaty, recognised as it is now from one end of the country to the other as having been a most beneficial and salutary arrangement of this question, and one that we desired to continue on even more liberal terms than we made in 1871, was bitterly opposed by that hon. gentleman's companions, who actually divided this House on the question whether it should be ratified or not; and the hon. Minister of Finance, in defending the Treaty of 1871 on the floor of this House, by every argument he could address to the House, was speaking not only for the life of his Government but for the life of that treaty itself, which these hon. gentlemen have many times condemned us up and down the country for not having solicited the United States to renew after it had expired. Now, Sir, I want to make one comment, before I go into the hon. gentleman's argument, upon a statement which he put into the mouth of the hon. Minister of Finance, and which was as different from the statement the hon. Minister made as night is from day. The hon. Minister of Finance, referring to the arguments and contentions which had been put forward by my colleague, the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries and myself with regard to the interpretation of the Treaty of 1818 and with regard to the rights of Canada under that treaty, and referring to what had been adopted eventually as a settlement of the whole question of the treaty, admitted that he had not been able to carry out our full expectations. Who expected that he would? Who ever sat down to make a bargain expecting that he and his adversary would agree to the extreme points they both had made, or expecting to stand by all the arguments that both had put forward? What kind of a treaty would it have been if the strongest contentions of the United States and the strongest contentions of Canada had been struggled for to the bitter end? The hon. Minister of Finance would have come to Canada with no treaty at all, but with that state of hostility which the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) professes to deplore, bitterly intensified and every prospect of solving this question, which was producing so much irritation between the two countries, set at rest forever. The hon. Minister of Finance stated frankly that there were concessions on both sides—that he did not profess that by this Treaty we were carrying out our contentions to the fullest extent; and yet the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) half an hour afterwards cited the hon. gentleman again and again as having used these words, that he was not able to support the policy of the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. Now, I ask hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House whether that was a fair quotation of the language of the hon. Minister of Finance; I ask any man within these walls if he thinks the hon. member for Queen's, Prince Edward Island, believes it was. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman has done me to the honor to refer two or three times to an expression which I made use of in a debate which casually arose not very long ago; and I must ask the indulgence of the House, notwithstanding the rule, in referring to it for a single moment to correct the hon. gentleman's memory. The hon. gentleman has cited me three times, twice to-night and once a little while ago, as having said that if a certain policy were adopted, a policy which was subsequently adopted it would be a betrayal of the interests of Canada. Now, as that subject is germane to the one under discussion, I may perhaps, without further apology be allowed to state what I did say on that occasion, what I adhere to to-night, and what is not in the least degree inconsistent with the action the Government subsequently took. There was a discussion between the hon. member for Queen's and myself across the floor as to the true interpretation of a clause of the Act relating to the duties of customs. He and I differed as to whether the clause was compulsory and obligatory on the Government, or whether it was merely optional. The statement I made was not that to put green fruits, seeds, bushes, and plants on the free list would be a betrayal of the interests of Canada, but it was this, that the clause was optional, that it vested a discretion in us, and that for us to admit that it did not vest a discretion in us, but bound us to submit to the dictation of another power, friendly or unfriendly, would be a betrayal of the interests of Canada. Now, the hon. gentleman so far misunderstood the quotation, which he has repeated on no less than three occasions, that he referred to it as an evidence that the hon. Finance Minister could, by attending a single day to his duties, sit on the "boys" of the Cabinet, as he called them, and deliberately reverse a policy which we had pledged ourselves so much as to say that the adoption of another policy would be a betrayal of the interests of Canada. The House will see from what I did say on that occasion, and what I adhere to now, that there is not the slightest difference of opinion between any member of the Government and myself on that question, or between the opinion I then expressed and the action the Government subsequently took, nor the slightest difference between my opinion on that question then and my opinion on it to-night. Now, the hon. gentleman addressed the House at considerable length for the purpose of showing that in 1884 we should have taken the advice of our friends of the Opposition, and especially that of the hon. gentleman himself; and he went so far as to urge this House to believe that if we had adopted his advice in 1834 and in 1835, we should have obtained a very much better fishery treaty than we have to-night. Now, Sir, I have not been able, as I confess it would have been wise and cautious to do, after the way in which the hon. gentleman has quoted me, to follow him in the record; but I will take his own word. He told us that the motion he made on that occasion was that freedom of fishing and freedom of duties were desirable in the interests of Canada. He seems to think that a treaty on such terms would have been a much better treaty for Her Majesty's plenipotentiaries to send to Canada. For one I do not agree with him. I agree with the statement he made, and the statement the hon. Finance Minister made, that the inshore fisheries of Canada are the most valuable possession which she has to-day. I believe they are not only the most valuable possession she has to-day, but that their wealth is increasing every day that rolls by; and with the increased preservation which we can give to those fisheries, with the increase of population which is taking place on this continent, and with the depreciation of the fisheries along the shores of the United States every day we meet here and every night we rest in our beds, the great possessions of our country are becoming of greater value. But the hon. gentleman's proposition in 1884 was that this possession, which is of so priceless a character, this possession, the value of which after fifty years shall have rolled around it is impossible for the most sanguine to calculate, this possession the hon. gentleman was willing to throw open forever to the United States for one concession only, the entry of free fish into the United States. The policy which it has adopted to-day, the administration of the United States will recommend to Congress, not for the priceless benefits of the fisheries of Canada, but in consideration of the circumstances of their own country, and to reduce their surplus and to reduce their revenue. The hon. the Minister of Finance, it is true, has not come back to Canada to tell us that he has given away this inestimable property, our fisheries, for a mere tariff concession, which in all probability will be made in view of the domestic circumstances of the United States. But he is able to say to us: I have preserved unimpaired the inshore fisheries of Canada and obtained the assent of the United States to a different valuation of our fishing rights. I have obtained from them the valuation, not that the United States will demand, in return for the admission of our fish free of duty, free fishing on the coasts of Canada, but that free fish may fairly and honorably and properly be conceded by them for the right to tranship cargoes, and the right to go in shore to ship crews and to buy bait and supplies. If that concession on the part of the United States has originated in what the hon. gentleman says it has, the undervaluation by the Gloucester fishermen of the value of our inshore fisheries, so much the better for us. Whatever has led to that opinion, I should much prefer a treaty that proposes to give us, what we have every reason to expect to get in fair bargain with the United States, the concession of free fish for the transshipment of cargoes and the right to purchase bait and supplies to the treaty which the hon. gentleman would have had us make in 1884, when, for that same concession, we were to give up, not only the right to tranship cargoes and to purchase bait and supplies, but free fishing on the coasts of Canada. Now we are told that the Government policy of to-day is a policy of vacillation. Well, if the right hon. the First Minister deserves credit for having put off until to-morrow what could be as well and better done to-morrow, he deserves credit for having declined in 1884 to make the treaty which the hon. member for Queen's P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) invited him to make, and for having made the treaty which is upon the Table to-night. What was it that the President of the United States proposed, as the hon. gentleman read his words to-night, we should have? Why, the hon. gentleman pictured in the most allegorical language the president of 60,000,000 people stretching his hand over the border to grasp the hands of 5,000,000? Well, I may confess I am utterly unable to grapple with the hon. gentleman's metaphor, and I see, in the quotation he made, the proposition which the President of the United States then made was different from what is made now, and different in the interests of Canada. The under-valuation, which the hon. gentleman says was made of the inshore fisheries of Canada, was not in the mind of the President of the United States at all, and what the President suggested—not for Canada because he did not stretch his great hands across the border at all, but he sent a message to his own Congress, which was disregarded by his own Congress, and which was not an invitation to the Dominion at all—what the President suggested was this: that it would be a most desirable thing, in exchange for some small tariff concessions which they were going to make anyhow, if they could get access to the rich fishing fields of Canada. I am glad to say it is not too late for us and I hope it will never be too late for us to say that we set too high a price upon the inshore fisheries of Canada to barter them for any trivial trade concession, such as the mere concession of free fish to the United States. They may be overvalued by us and undervalued by the American fishermen; and if the Americans do not want our property, we will have the pleasure of keeping it to ourselves. Now, the hon. gentleman made a very singular statement with regard to what had produced the Retaliatory Bill as he called it; and his whole argument at first was that this wicked National Policy, in which he sees the germ of all the evils past, present and to come, has driven to exasperation 60,000,000 people, and almost forced them into a state of war. The hon. gentleman and his friends have told us time and again that the irritation produced by the National Policy was no greater than the lighting of a fly upon a wheel, that for 5,000,000 to undertake to coerce 60,000,000 was child's play, and yet the hon. gentleman told us to-night, in the most glowing terms, that the adoption of the National Policy by 5,000,000 had goaded these 60,000,000 into a state of war. He had not progressed very much further with his speech before he undertook to lay the blame on another quarter, and it was the uncivilised administration of the Treaty of 1818 and of the custom laws that had goaded these people into a state of war. Something had done it. It was sure to be our fault, and it did not much matter what particular act of ours was to blame. Now, I should like to contrast that violent statement, dictated by party feeling against the Government in power, with the calm statement made not long ago with regard to this question by Mr. Bayard, the Secretary of State, whom the hon. gentleman exalts, and deservedly so, as an eminent statesman. Speaking of the Retaliatory Act, the language of Mr. Bayard, addressed to those who desired to put that Act into force, and who desired that claims for damages should be made against the Government of Canada, was not that the Administration of the Treaty of 1818 by the Dominion of Canada had been uncivilised and had goaded the people into a state of war, but it was this: that the Dominion, having made a fair bargain in 1885 with the President of the United States, one result of which was intended to be the appointment of a commission to consider and settle this whole question, it was the fault of the Senate of the United States, and of the Senate alone, that this question had not received its solution, and that he could no longer lay the blame at the doors of our Government, or lay the blame and attach the responsibility at the doors of their own Government.

"More than one year ago I sought to protect our citizens engaged in fishing from results which might attend any possible misunderstanding between the Governments of Great Britain and the United States as to the measure of their mutual rights and privileges in the territorial waters of British North America. After the determination of the fishery articles of the Treaty of Washington, in June last, it seemed to me then, and seems to me now, very hard that differences of opinion between the two Governments should cause loss to honest citizens, whose line of obedience might be thus rendered vague and uncertain, and their property be brought into jeopardy. Influenced by this feeling, I procured a temporary arrangement which secured our fishermen full enjoyment of all Canadian fisheries, free from molestation, during a period which would permit discussion of a just international settlement of the whole fishery question; but other counsels prevailed, and my efforts further to protect fishermen from such trouble as you now suffer were unavailing."

Every one knows now that the other counsels which prevailed were not the counsels of my hon. friend beside me and myself. They were contrary to the policy of the Minister of Finance. They were not the counsels of the Government of the Dominion, but they were counsels which frustrated the arrangement entered into between the Government of Canada and the Government of the United States, in 1885, which to use Mr. Bayard's own expression, was intended to "permit the discussion of a just international settlement of the whole fishery question," but which the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I., to-night denounces as a vacillating policy, stringent one day and surrendering everything the next. Now, the hon. gentleman, as he went on, made this extraordinary statement, that it was not our construction of the Treaty of 1818, but its administration, that was complained of by the United States. Indeed, he so far forgot his brief as to state that the Treaty of 1818 was so plain that there could be no difference of opinion on the question. Let me say to the House, on the responsibility I must take, knowing that every document on this question is in the hands of the House, that it was upon the construction of the Treaty of 1818 that every struggle has been made between the two Governments for the last twenty-five years. The question always arose upon the administration of the law, of course, because if we do not administer the law nobody could be offended, and the construction of the treaty could not be called in question. But every time we took a step to administer the law, to keep fishermen out of our waters, to prevent them from buying bait and supplies, or to prevent their transshipping cargoes, or anything of that kind, the question came up whether we were justified in that by the true interpretation of the Treaty of 1818. The House must forgive me if I recapitulate some of the arguments, because, after some of the speeches we have heard, I must suppose that they have faded from the memory of some, that they have faded for an hour or two at all events. We would imagine that the treaty alluded to the mere question of fishing, and had nothing to do with the exclusion of United States fishermen, except when they came in for the purpose of fishing. Every kind of interpretation was put on that. It was contended that it must be interpreted in the light of the circumstances, and a flood of light has been thrown on the condition of trade and intercourse between the two countries in 1818. Then, we were told that the interpretation must bend to the change which has taken place since 1818 and to the modification of the commercial policy of Great Britain, especially in regard to the introduction of the bonded system, and that all the changes which from time to time are weaving these two nations together commercially must modify the interpretation of that Treaty of 1818. But I will not weary the House. I will ask the House to look at the letter of Mr. Phelps, the United States Minister in London, on which I had the honor to make a report to His Excellency. I need not read it to you, because you will remember that the hon. gentleman says: I agree with every statement and every argument contained in the report of the Minister of Justice, and yet that report, which the hon. gentleman says he concurs in from A to Z, was an argument on the interpretation of the Treaty of 1818, and on nothing else. The hon. gentleman has also stated to the House that it was most improper that the custom laws should have been enforced against United States fishing vessels, in order to aid in the carrying out of the Treaty of 1818. If you will remember that the hon. gentleman says he concurred with every word in my report, and if you think it worth while to turn up my report, you will find at least two chapters of it devoted to show not only that it is our right but our duty to enforce the customs laws in that respect. The hon. gentleman has said that the particular fault he finds with our administration of the law is that it was capricious, and he went so far, at one stage of his argument, as to call it an anti-civilised policy. I have only this to say, and I say it in the presence of gentlemen who have had more years of experience in the consideration of the question than I have had of life, that the records show that the administration of the Treaty of 1818 and of the Customs laws in connection with it has been steady and consistent from 1818 to 1887, with this exception, that for the last three or four years the treaty has been more leniently and carefully administered than it was in the earlier years of its existence. The hon. gentleman has evidently forgotten his history of the question, but I may be permitted to remind him that in the very year the treaty was adopted, vessels were seized and condemned for entering British American waters, and that year after year,—of course I except from the calculation the years during which the Reciprocity Treaty prevailed, and the Washington Treaty prevailed, and the licensing system prevailed at the instance of the Imperial Government, for those were periods when a different system of law was invoked—at any time when this question was governed by the Treaty of 1818, its administration was quite as severe and quite as exacting as it has been during the last three or four years, and even more so. The hon. gentleman said that we put, out of a pure jingo policy, the amendment of 1886 upon the Statute-book, by which it was provided that the mere entry of fishing vessels of the United States into Canadian waters was to result in the forfeiture of the vessel; and he said that, for 70 years, the treaty had been carried out and administered rigidly enough, and no such law had been required. It was not required, because what we put on the Statute-book in 1886 was simply what had been uniformly carried out from 1818 to 1886. It was always assumed, even in the courts of law, that the entering of an American fishing vessel in defiance of the treaty would result in the forfeiture of the vessel and the cargo, and we were only putting on the Statute-book in 1886 what had been the view of the law from the earliest times, with the exception that the seizures in earlier times were made by British gunboats and British vessels of war, and that lately they have been made by Canadian revenue cutters. Let me refer the hon. gentleman and those who agree with him as to its being a just matter of complaint that we have enforced the Customs laws against United States vessels, to a consideration of what the Customs laws of the United States are. They require that every vessel entering, whether voluntarily or by stress of weather, the waters of the United States, shall report within 24 hours, and a vessel is liable to a penalty of $400 if she attempts to depart from those waters without having reported at the Customs. It matters not whether she is a fishing vessel, it matters not whether she has been driven in before a gale, or whether she has been towed in, as an act of mercy, by salvors; she must be reported at the customs, and if she attempts to depart without reporting, she is liable to a penalty of $400. What will the House think after the criticisms which have been addressed to it with regard to the enforcement of the custom laws, when I tell them that by the decision of the Administration of the United States, within the last few years fishing vessels resorting to United States ports for supplies have been fined in heavy penalties because they had attempted to depart without reporting at the customs? Yet, notwithstanding that, the hon. gentleman declares that this policy which Canada undertook to adopt, enforcing the customs laws, which we have no power to mitigate, which are binding just as much upon us as they are upon the humblest man in this country, which it was our solemn duty to administer as long as Parliament choose to leave them upon the Statute-book—he declares that in the administration of those customs laws we were guilty of an anti-civilised policy, whilst the 60,000,000 of freemen to whom he refers were guilty of no such act at all in fining humble fishing smacks that attempted to depart without reporting at the customs, when they came in to purchase supplies. I do not make this contrast for the purpose of condemning that act. The necessity which exists in Canada for the enforcement of the customs laws, to prevent illicit trading by such vessels as were entitled to run into any quay or inlet upon our coast for shelter over night, and for provisions and supplies, for wood and water, the necessity for carrying out the revenue laws strictly with regard to these vessels, is as great in Canada as it is in the United States, and is as fully recognised in the United States in practice as it is in Canada to-day. But it suits the party purposes of a gentleman who wants to make an attack upon the Government, to say that this was an anti-civilised policy calculated to drive 60,000,000 of our neighbors into a state of warfare. Now, the hon. gentleman has declared that all the Americans have contended for has been fully conceded, that this treaty contains not one concession on the part of the United States, and that everything has been conceded on the part of Canada. I venture to disagree with him. I support this treaty, not because it contains no concessions on the part of Canada, but because it contains fair concessions on the part of Canada, and fair and liberal concessions on the part of the United States. Sir, nobody expected, when the Minister of Finance and his fellow plenipotentiaries went to Washington, that he was going to bring back any enormous concessions for the fishermen of Canada. Did any of our fishermen expect it? We were administering the laws strictly in their favor, we were keeping the inshore fisheries for them, we were preventing poaching, we were preventing illicit trading, we were carrying out the law as strictly as we could; and knowing that, they were resting their right upon the Treaty of 1818. It was a familiar expression among them—I allude to the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces—when they saw that they were protected in the enjoyment of their rights to the inshore fisheries, and that consequently they were able to compete on fair terms in the markets of the United States, in spite of the duty, the remark they made, time and again, became almost proverbial, that they wanted no better treaty than they had. The only necessity that existed for a treaty was the fact that our neighbors alongside of us were dissatisfied with the construction which we put upon the Treaty for 1818. They felt that they had a grievance, and it was most desirable, in the interest of harmony, and trade, and peace between the two countries, that this feeling should be at once and forever removed. If we have removed it by making concessions, which have not been injurious to the interests of the fishermen of Canada, I ask if any member of this House will say that the Government was wrong in doing so, or that Her Majesty's plenipotentiaries erred. No, Sir, I say that if we were able by sacrificing anything connected either with the administration of the law, or the construction of the law, which would not prejudice the rights or imperil the industries of the fishermen of Canada, we were bound to do it, in the interests of harmony between the two countries, and it was our duty to do it in view of our relations to the Empire of which we form a part. But will the House reflect upon this, that after the hon. gentleman had spoken for two hours, declaring every ten minutes that this was an entire surrender on the part of Canada, that it was a list of concessions on the part of Canada, he sat down without showing one single instance in which the humblest toiler of the sea would be injured in his pursuits by this treaty? Now, Sir, if this question has been removed from the list of irritating grievances which existed between the two countries, if the relations between the two countries have been put upon such fair footing that we have the assurance of the Administration of the United States, expressed on the floor of this House through the Finance Minister, that the time is rapidly approaching when trade concessions such as the fishermen desire with regard to free fish, will be granted to them, and that in the mean time, after having removed the grievances, we have done the fishermen no wrong, they will have no reason to be dissatisfied with the treaty, with the plenipotentiaries who negotiated it, or with the Parliament that will ratify it. Now, the hon. gentleman referred to a report which I had the honor to make to His Excellency upon this connection, in which I ventured to criticise the argument which had been addressed by Mr. Phelps to Her Majesty's Minister, in which I addressed myself to this argument: That our construction of the treaty was an unreasonable one, because it precluded American fishing vessels entering for trivial purposes, such as for a surgeon in case of sickness or injury, to post a letter, to buy a rope, &c.; and I endeavored to meet that by the argument that the treaty might as well be repealed if, upon every pretext, no matter how small and frivolous, one of these vessels had a right to enter our waters, notwithstanding the prohibition contained in the treaty, and that the prohibition contained in the treaty amounted to nothing, that it could be frittered away altogether by any master of a fishing smack pretending that he wanted to post a letter. In reference to this argument the hon. gentleman has declared that this treaty has conceded that which I said might as well result in the repeal of the prohibition contained in the Treaty of 1818. Now, what I was arguing against, as the House will remember, if it remembers the paper at all, was this: That for American fishing vessels that are pursuing their advocations along our coasts, to have the right to come in for any such purposes as those trivial purposes that were mentioned, would fritter away the prohibition of the treaty; and what is conceded in the treaty is not that they shall have the right to come in every time they want a physician, every time they want to post a letter, every time they want to buy a piece of rope, but that they shall have the right to come and purchase supplies when they are upon a homeward voyage, and when they have received a license to purchase the article, which they desire to purchase for the homeward voyage. And yet the hon. gentleman says: Compare the two things that have been conceded by this treaty, which I say might as well result in the repeal of the Treaty of 1818. But, Sir, what is the burden of all his complaint? After declaring that we had surrendered everything and got nothing in return, when the hon. gentleman sought to address himself to the one point that was worthy at all of his attention, if he wanted to discuss the merits of this question, namely, what concession we had given which was injurious to our people, he was compelled to say that the concession we made we ought to have made long ago. Then it comes to this, Sir, that the hon. gentleman, standing upon the floor of this House for nearly two hours in this debate, denounces this Government in unmeasured terms for having made a string of concessions which he thinks we ought to have made long ago. They are not, I admit, the concessions which the hon. gentleman would have made; they are not the concessions which the hon. gentleman rose in this House and asked us to make. No, Sir, the concessions he desired to have made were not those opposed to an anti-civilising policy, but they were for free fishing upon our coasts, these were what he wanted to throw into any negotiation which should be made with the United States. But if after 1835, when by what Mr. Bayard admits in the extract I have read to the House to be the generous action of the Canadian Government, we had thrown open our fisheries upon the promise of the President of the United States that he would recommend to Congress the appointment of a commission to settle this whole question, then the President in good faith made his recommendation to Congress, in terms as broad as promised, and when Congress spurned that recommendation, I should like to know what member of the House would have been able as long and as loudly as the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) to have denounced the Government and denounced my colleague in the Department of Marine and Fisheries if we had failed to enforce strictly the Treaty of 1818. Why, Sir, strict as it was and rigid as it was, I very much mistake my recollection if the hon. gentleman did not in the very short period during which he addressed the House upon the subject within the last year or two, denounce the protection we had given as not half strict enough and as a sham, and declare time and time again that he would hold the Government responsible for that sham protection we had. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman has only one fault to find with us after all, and that is that when we were met by the United States in a conciliatory spirit, when we found they were willing to make concessions and when asked to make concessions ourselves, having been willing to make what the hon. gentleman thinks we should have made long before—that when we were willing later to do so we should have stepped out of office and allowed him and his friends to come in. In this instance, give the hon. gentleman credit for entire candor. I believe the hon. gentleman was making a real objection which exists in his mind; but it did not occur to my hon. friend that if we had changed our minds and had been at last willing to make those concessions, which he thought we should have made long before, he, at least to be patriotic and consistent, should have supported us in making them. Now, the hon. gentleman is particular to ask why it was that no concession on the part of the United States was pointed out. Well, Sir, the Minister of Finance put the position very candidly before the House. Ever since this treaty has been negotiated it has certainly not been in the interest of Canada to declare that it was a great boon to this country. I do not assert to-night that it is a great boon to Canada, I assert simply my belief that it is a fair arrangement between two honorable nations sitting down to make a peaceful, honorable compromise of their rights; and I say the United States plenipotentiaries met us in the same spirit in which Her Majesty's plenipotentiaries met them, and they have made liberal and fair concessions, which I am not to boast of to-night, which we are not to exult over, which it would be folly to exult over, because they are simply concessions which any honorable negotiators would have made in view of the whole question. Does the hon. gentleman forget that the great strife between the Government of the United States and the Government of Great Britain on this question was three or four crucial points? Does he forget that our right to prohibit vessels from coming in to buy bait was challenged? Does he forget that it was denied that we had the right to prevent them coming and transshipping cargoes? Does he forget that it was denied that we had the right to prevent them from shipping crews? Does the hon. gentleman forget that these were the crucial points over which the whole controversy turned and that the result of the action of the Canadian Government, the energetic remonstrances of the Canadian Government and the exposition of the rights of Canada by my colleague who sits behind me was that when this matter and these reports were laid before the Crown officers of England we were so fully sustained that Her Majesty's principal Secretary of State for the Colonies advised us that there were no two opinions in England on the subject of our rights. In the treaty which the hon. gentleman has been denouncing as a disgraceful surrender there is no miserable carping and quibbling over our rights, there is no attempt to depart from the provisions contained in the Treaty of 1818, there is no miserable petifogging attempt to set aside that treaty, which, while it gave liberal terms to the United States fishermen, did not sacrifice the rights of the British American people, equally valuable as their right was, to retain the fisheries for their own use, and instead of denying those rights which I have stated, the right to purchase those articles, the right to tranship cargo and the right to ship a crew, it has been conceded that those rights are rights which are to be negotiated for and which are to be received on fair and equitable terms hereafter by the authorities of the United States. That surely is, if not a concession, at least an adjustment, on terms which are distinctly honorable to the people and the Government of Canada. Let me ask the hon. gentleman to consider whether the principles contained in the delimitation clause are not a fair concession on both sides. I meet his argument as to what our rights in regard to the headlands were by the statement that they were the doctrines which were found in the text books and in the despatches down to 25 years ago. I admit that it was not contended then that we were limited in our territorial waters as regards bays, to bays merely of the width of ten miles. But the hon. gentleman knows that for upwards of thirty years that prohibition has not been carried out; it has been distinctly asserted by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) as well as by his successors in that department that in every instance, while asserting that they preserve and reserve the right, they in practice fail to enforce it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Tell me why?

Mr. THOMPSON. I will tell the hon. gentleman why. When my colleague, the Minister of Finance, made the statement which I am doing but little more than repeating, for the purpose of my argument on that point, the hon. member for Northumberland seems to think that it was intended to cast some imputation on the hon. member in his administration of the Department. Such is not the case.

The reason why the hon. gentleman could not enforce the ten-mile limit was that Her Majesty's Government would not permit the Government of Canada to do so.

Mr. MITCHELL. Not denying our right, but State interests prevented them doing so.

Mr. THOMPSON. Declaring that they reserved the right and that it might be pressed at another time, but at that time refusing to allow it to be enforced. Why? The hon. gentleman says for State reasons. The principal cause was that to enforce that doctrine strictly, to the largest extent, would in all probability involve a collision between either Her Majesty's vessels and the fishing vessels of the United States or our revenue cutters and American fishing vessels. And when the British Government declined and perhaps wisely declined to enforce that doctrine to its fullest extent in the interest of peace and harmony. Of course neither the hon. gentleman himself nor any of his successors can venture to take the responsibility of enforcing seizures outside of the three-mile limit and therefore the statement did not impute blame upon the hon. gentleman nor did it in the least degree derogate from the strength of the argument. This right had never existed in practice as regards the protection of our fisheries for the last twenty-five years. Now, Sir, the hon. member for Queen's, P. E. I. (Mr. Davies) referred to a despatch to Mr. Everett in which an expression of words slightly favoring the English doctrine as the headland question.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) Mr. Webster, not Everett.

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes, Mr. Webster. The hon. gentleman cited that from memory to the House in words which I was careful to look after.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) I read the quotation.

Mr. THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman did read it and in making his argument upon it he cited it in these words: He said that Mr. Webster had admitted that to be the proper construction of the treaty. Now, what Mr. Webster says was that by a strict and rigid construction of this article that result might follow, but he declared in the concluding paragraph that the construction this put on the treaty is not conformable to the intention of the contracting parties.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon, I read that. The hon. gentleman will permit me to say that the quotation he now makes appears in the first part, that it did not coincide with the intention of the parties and that the intentions of the parties are not expressed as they are intended in that treaty.

Mr. THOMPSON. I shall not say whether the hon. gentleman read it or not. I do not pretend to remember that, but I am glad to know that those words, strongly qualifying the opinion, are in the despatch, and I am sure that after what I have said that if the hon. gentleman undertook to repeat it from memory again he would not use those words that Mr. Webster admitted, that that was the proper construction.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) Certainly I would.

Mr. THOMPSON. If the hon. gentleman says he would I shall not further attempt to argue with him. I said that with regard to this question of the headlands that it was one of the cases in which there was a fair concession upon both sides. We gave up the extreme English contention; correct as I believe it to be, acquiesced in as it is by some eminent American authorities, and we need not quarrel about what Mr. Webster said, for the doctrine is supported by abler jurists than he is, such as Chancellor Kent, Judge Storey and other men of that calibre. We need not quarrel about that. The question is how far the English doctrine was carried out in practice. When the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) was at the head of the Fishery Department he issued instructions and his instructions did not even go as far as the demand of the extreme limit nor was it necessary. There is no necessity in the protection of the fisheries of Canada that our cruisers should sail 30, 40, 50 and 60 miles out to sea molesting American vessels in places where mackerel are not caught or rarely caught at all. The hon. gentleman defines his restriction to bays not more than ten miles wide, and the reason of the contention of Canada even in that particular had subsequently to be modified, and we were instructed only to enforce that as to bays six miles wide. Now the result of this treaty is that the construction which Canada asked, the construction which Canada proposed to put upon that, the instructions which she desired to have issued but was not able to have issued under the administration of the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) is the construction adopted by the treaty, only they have been enlarged so as to give us bays which are a great deal more than ten miles wide. No one will contend, nor it would not be candid, nor would it be fair to say that we have triumphed over the American negotiators or administration.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No. I guess not.

Mr. THOMPSON. It was an arrangement perfectly fair and equitable to both sides and when the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) says: "No, I guess not," he wants the House to understand that if he had only the negotiation of this treaty he would have excluded the American fishing vessels from all bays of heaven knows how wide. Can the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), who is so wise on this subject, inform me which of the bays in Canada we ought have drawn the line across?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I will tell the hon. gentleman at the proper time.

Mr. THOMPSON. It is a very liberal concession, largely giving to Canada not only as to the closing of bays not more than ten miles wide, but as to the closing of the other enumerated bays. For that concession, we make a concession it is true of Bay St. George, but I should like the hon. gentleman to name at his own sweet will and proper time, in what respect it is that this is an unfair concession on the part of Canada or not a reasonable concession on the part of the United States.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I will tell the hon. gentleman to-morrow.

Mr. THOMPSON. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) after an hour and a half at least of a complaint against Her Majesty's plenipotentiaries for having made this long list of concessions and given up the headlands and giving up the bays and giving up everything else in Canada to the Americans, it was amusing to hear the hon. gentleman find fault with the plenipotentiaries for having reserved a bay in Prince Edward Island that we did not want at all. He declared that Egmont Bay never had an American fishing vessel in it and that it was preposterous to reserve it. After complaining that we had given up so much it was really a slight consolation to know that there is one thing we had reserved that we ought not have kept. Now, Sir, as regards the argument which the hon. gentleman made in reference to the Strait of Canso, I do not suppose it will be necessary for me to say very much on that point after the explanation on which the Minister of Finance has given. The delimitation which is stipulated for in the first treaty would have had the effect of closing the Strait of Canso. One may reasonably conjecture that Her Majesty's plenipotentiaries were faced by this that they might be asked by the United States—for by the delimitation that was proposed by Her Majesty's Government let me remind the

Mr. THOMPSON.

House as long ago as 1866 and repeated once or twice since in view of settling this headland question and removing it from controversy—they might be asked: Do you propose in that fishery delimitation to exclude our fishing vessels for the first time from the Strait of Canso? If Her Majesty's plenipotentiaries were faced with that question it would be reasonable they should insert in the face of the treaty a provision with that delimitation, that nothing else in the treaty should preclude American fishing vessels from entering the Strait of Canso. We have heard the hon. gentleman's opinion that that is a concession of a right for all time to come. I think it is not a concession of a right to American fishing vessels, but it is a reservation of whatever claim they may have, notwithstanding anything contained in this treaty. In respect to the Straits of Canso there are no words of grant, no words of concession at all, it is simply a reservation that that treaty shall affect that question and that is all it amounts to. But when the hon. gentleman puts it, not only that it is a concession of a right for all time to come to American fishing vessels but, to use his own words, to all American vessels—and I presume that it was an unintentional exaggeration—when he made that mistake, I felt inclined to ask him, referring back to the rigorous administration of this treaty in its earlier years, when it was much more rigorous than it is now, going back to the time when there was no Treaty of 1818, but when the war of 1812 was over, and when things were carried with such a high hand against the United States fishing vessels, that they were seized if they came within sixty miles of our coast, what day or hour was the Strait of Canso ever closed against American vessels? The Strait of Canso has always been, and I presume always will be, open to vessels of commerce and vessels of peace, and it is in the interest of Canada that it should be kept so; and while in that respect there is no concession made on the face of the treaty, but simply a declaration that the treaty shall not affect that subject, I should not for one be afraid to commit myself to the larger concession which the hon. gentleman thinks is involved in its being kept open for the passage of fishing vessels for all time to come. But that has not been asked or conceded, for the reason, I presume, that it would only be—to borrow for the moment and only for the moment, for I will give it back to him, the hon. gentleman's own phrase—a policy of anti-civilisation. The hon. gentleman has said that the freedom from reporting at customs, and the exemption from pilotage dues and harbor dues, are concessions. It is admitted they are; does he say they are unreasonable? No, he says those privileges ought to have been given up long ago; and I should have liked the hon. gentleman, after censuring the Government for its undue strictness in carrying out the law, to inform the House what amount of pilotage and harbor dues were collected in Canada under the Treaty of 1818, or under any other treaty or law, from United States fishing vessels during the last ten or fifteen years. Now, the hon. gentleman made a singular objection to one section of the treaty which provides that under certain circumstances and certain conditions American fishing vessels in distress may tranship their cargoes; and the hon. gentleman, although I dare say he had the words of the clause in his mind, and intended to state them correctly, unwittingly stated them very differently from what they were. The hon. gentleman stated that once a person got a license—

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I rise to a word of explanation. The hon. gentleman has three times misquoted me; but this time I wish to say I read the words from the Treaty distinctly from the beginning to end as they are.

Mr. THOMPSON. I have not at any time quoted the hon. gentleman.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes, you have three times, and you put a word in my mouth that I never used—anti-civilisation.

Mr. THOMPSON. I have not quoted the hon. gentleman at all; he interrupted me just as I was about to quote him. I do not understand why the hon. gentleman interrupted me, and claim that I was going to misquote him unless he was conscious that he had unwittingly made a mistake in quoting the clause.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman said so.

Mr. THOMPSON. I do not think so.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You distinctly said so.

Mr. THOMPSON. I do not think I did, but it is a matter of no consequence whether the hon. gentleman read the clause or not; that is not the point I was coming to, and the hon. gentleman rose altogether too soon. I was about to give him credit, perhaps, for having read the clause. I said that no doubt he had it distinctly in his mind and intended to state it fairly to the House, but unwittingly had not done so. The hon. gentleman says he read the clause to the House, and I will not contradict it; but the hon. gentleman did base an argument on it afterwards, in which he quoted and did not read the clause, and that is the quotation of which I complain. The quotation and the argument of which I complain is that the language of the treaty is such that if a United States fishing vessel meeting with so small a casualty as the loss, I think the hon. gentleman said of a rope yarn, came into our ports, it could tranship its cargo. I will admit that the hon. gentleman read the clause, because he said he did, although I do not remember it. Let me read it:

"Any United States fishing vessel entering the ports, bays and harbors of the eastern and north-eastern coasts of Canada under stress or weather or in consequence of any casualty, may unload, reload, tranship or sell (subject to Customs laws and regulations) all fish on board—"

Not when they have lost a rope yarn, not when they have only to post a letter, or want a physician, or meet with any trifling accident, such as the loss of a spar.

"—when such unloading, transhipment or sale is necessary as incidental to repairs."

I am sure the hon. gentleman in stating the argument on the question which he did, must have recollected the clause. Now, after this treaty is adopted as I hope it will be, there may be some misconception of the meaning of this clause, and fishermen using rope yarns coming into port and insisting that they have a right to tranship their cargoes, and citing the authority of the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. gentleman want me to state now? With his usual fair play he has stated that I said that if there was a loss of a rope yarn, the master of the ship would come within the section. In my statement I did not use the word "rope yarn" at all. I said "bowsprit," and an hon. gentleman sitting in front of me suggested "or a rope yarn," and I said "yes, or a rope yarn." He might contend that he was within the section, and he knew nobody who could control his contention, but that was a matter entirely for construction.

Mr. THOMPSON. If the hon. gentleman had made the statement before that he has made now, I would not have had so much to say on the subject.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) Exactly.

Mr. THOMPSON. I repeat exactly; but the only point in which I must modify what I have said is as to the word "rope yarn." It came from his colleague in front of him, and I thought it was from himself. "Bowsprit" will do me just as well; and I have no hesitation in saying to the House that the hon. gentleman's argument is correct, and that his correction is correct this far, that if an American fishing vessel having lost her bowsprit comes into our ports she has a right to tranship her cargo if transhipment is necessary as incidental to repairs. I shall not pretend to say the circumstances under which the loss of a bowsprit and the tearing away of a part of the vessel might, under those circumstances, justify the transhipment of a cargo. It is sufficient for me that, by the plain words of the treaty, which must be necessarily incidental to repairs, that the vessel has to unload her cargo, before she can have the right to tranship her cargo, and that from the way in which the hon. gentleman put it, at the suggestion of his colleague in front of him, a rope yarn was just as good as his own argument about the bowsprit. In the latter part of the section—I shall not say whether the hon. gentleman read the section or not, because I do not remember—but I do know that he contended that the United States fishing vessels should have the right to contend for the purchase of bait as well as supplies. But the hon. gentleman might have called our attention to the fact that the treaty says:

"Such supplies and provisions as are ordinarily sold to trading vessels."

And I do not think bait is an article so called in trading vessels.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think you were wrong in your quotation; you will have to read that again.

Mr. THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman has declared that nobody is to be a judge as to the cases of necessity. Let me ask the hon. gentleman how a treaty can possibly be framed unless it is possible for somebody to ask who is to decide. Surely, in the language of Mr. Bayard, we look forward to good faith on the part of the two Governments. The United States will certainly expect, and they have the right to expect, that in the administration of this treaty we will be fair and even generous; and that when a vessel really requires to unload a cargo, in order to repair, we shall not exercise any extremely nice discrimination against her as to the nature of her injuries; but when the hon. gentleman tells us that somebody else has to decide, I say it is always so with every treaty. Let me ask him in relation to the Treaty of 1818, which he admires so much, what tribunal was established to interpret its provisions, and whether we have not been quarelling over its interpretation for nearly half a century? I have only one remark more to make besides apologising to the House for the great length of their time I have taken. My last remark will be with reference to the hon. gentleman's statement that had we conceded all these points long ago we would have occupied a better position to-day. Well, I do not want to say anything boastful with respect to the protection of the fisheries, and with respect to the vigilance and care with which my colleague has administered his department in that regard; but I claim that great care, vigilance, caution and strictness are required even in the administration of the treaty and the custom laws, and have been observed, and necessarily so, for a number of years past. We have been dealing with a class of people who, in the pursuit of an innocent vocation, have little regard for the strict territorial rights of their neighbors, people who, in the pursuit of fishing have as little compunction about crossing an imaginary three-mile line as a sportsman has, in the pursuit of his game, in crossing his neighbor's property. Dealing with people like these, who come up to our shores frequently in large fleets, required, in order that the fisheries of Canada be protected, great vigilance and care on the part of the Government. If the Government had not protected the fisheries as they have, with vigilance and even strictness, instead of occupying the proud position we oc-copy to-day, we would have had no treaty on the Table, we would have no concessions to make, we would have received no concessions in return, our fishermen would not have fared as well as they have during the past few years, our fisheries would not have been as valuable as they are to day, and neither the United States nor any other country would have thought it worth their while to go through the solemnities of negotiating and making a treaty in regard to fisheries which the owners thought so little of that they did not care probably to administer the laws of their own country.

SECOND SESSION, SIXTH PARLIAMENT.—51 VIC.

Vol. XX.

Ottawa, Wednesday, April 11, 1888.

No. 32.

NOTICE TO MEMBERS.

Necessary corrections to Members' Speeches, for the bound edition, must be forwarded to the Debates Office within twenty-four hours after the printed copies of the speeches have been circulated, as after that time the contractors may print the copies for the bound edition without further delay.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 11th April, 1888.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 97) to amend the Act to incorporate the Board of Management of the Church and Manse Building Fund of the Presbyterian Church in Canada, for Manitoba and the North-West Territories.—(Mr. Daly.)

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Although I have given notice of motion of this as being a Government notice of motion, I would move, with the consent of the House, that the Government business should take precedence every Thursday, after Questions put by Members. I think I can appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite to assist the Government to carry this resolution. For the last three weeks we have been discussing a very important question, and the Government, in order to expedite the discussion and decision of that question, gave up all their days. I think, therefore, the next six Thursdays might be returned to us as a mere matter of honesty.

Mr. LAURIER. As the last three weeks' discussion has been far more profitable to the Opposition than the Government, we can afford, on that ground, to be generous, and I have no objection to the motion provided it does not apply to to-morrow.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Then you ought to give us next Monday.

Mr. LAURIER. We will not say anything about that now, but deal only with the Thursdays.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD moved that every Thursday after next Thursday the Government business take precedence, following Questions put by Members.

Motion agreed to.

REFUND OF HAY DUTIES BY THE UNITED STATES.

Mr LAVERGNE asked, Has any action been taken by the Government, or any members thereof, with the view of helping exporters of hay to the United States, to obtain the refund of the duty improperly levied on them by the Customs authorities of the United States; and if so, has any conclusion been reached?

Mr. THOMPSON. That matter is more particularly under the care of the Minister of Finance, but, in his absence, I may state that action has been taken by the Government and some of its members individually with respect to these claims. Representations were made by the Government officially to the Government of the United States with respect to them, and, when some members of the Government visited Washington in the early part of last winter, the Minister of Finance and myself had an interview with the Secretary of the Treasury, in which we endeavored to the best of our ability to press the reasonableness of these claims on the attention of Mr. Fairchild, but the result was that Mr. Fairchild stated that it was entirely out of the power of the Government of the United States, or any of its Departments, to give the relief applied for, principally because the claimants had not availed themselves of the remedies provided by the law of the United States, and had allowed the time to pass by during which they could obtain redress; and consequently, except by an Act of Congress, he could not give them relief. Consequently, recollecting the lapse of time and the number of cases of a like character which would be pressed upon them, he declined to give us any expectation that an application to Congress would be successful. At any rate, the conclusion is that the application must be made to the Congress of the United States by the individuals who have been aggrieved, for an appropriation.

ACCOMMODATION FOR IMMIGRANTS AT REGINA.

Mr. DAVIN asked, Whether the Government is aware that the accommodation for immigrants at Regina is insufficient?

Mr. CARLING. I am very glad indeed to know that a much larger number of immigrants are going into the North-West Territories this spring than anticipated; and as to the question of the hon. member for Assiniboia, I may say that I have caused some enquiries to be made in the matter referred to, and have taken such temporary steps as are likely to be sufficient for present necessities.

POSTMASTER AT ARKONA, LAMBTON COUNTY.

Mr. LISTER asked, Has George M. Everest resigned the postmastership at Arkona, in the County of Lambton, or has he been dismissed? If dismissed, what were the reasons for his dismissal? Were such reasons communicated to him before or since his dismissal? Has a successor been appointed? What is his name?

Mr. McLELAN. Everest has been removed from the postmastership of Arkona for the reason that he had established for some considerable time a business at Forest, to which he gave all his attention, attending there the entire week, as was reported by the inspector, and only visiting Arkona on Saturday night and staying over Sunday, leaving the management of the office in the hands of others, who, the inspector reported, did not discharge the duties very efficiently. Robert Davitt has been appointed in his place.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman has not answered the last part of the question, "Were such reasons communicated to him before or since his dismissal?"

Mr. McLELAN. They were communicated, I understand, before I took charge of the department. There was a complaint against him.

WINTER STEAM NAVIGATION BETWEEN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND AND NEW BRUNSWICK.

Mr. PERRY asked, Is the Government aware that Mr. C. F. Hannington, C.E., of the Central Railway, New Brunswick, is now in Prince Edward Island, with the view of ascertaining the practicability of keeping up winter steam navigation between West Point, P.E.I., and Richibucto, N.B.

Mr. FOSTER. So far as the Department of Marine and Fisheries is concerned, I have no knowledge of Mr. Hannington being engaged as intimated.

TIGNISH AND MIMINIGASH BREAKWATERS.

Mr. PERRY asked, Is it the intention of the Government to place a sum in the Supplementary Estimates to repair the Tignish and Miminigash Breakwaters?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am not in a position to answer the hon. gentleman now. I think he will have to wait until the Supplementary Estimates come down.

ALBERTON HARBOR, P.E.I.

Mr. PERRY asked, Is it the intention of the Government to continue, during the season of 1888, the blasting a rock with the view of deepening the harbor at Alberton, P.E.I.?

Sir HECTOR LANGENIN. I think the hon. gentleman will find the answer in the ordinary Estimates which are before the House.

MAILS BETWEEN FORT MACLEOD AND PINCHER CREEK, N.W.T.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, Whether there is a mail service between Fort Macleod and Pincher Creek, North-West Territory? Is it a daily mail, or what? What is the distance, and who has the contract for carrying the mail? What amount per month or year is paid for the service? Were tenders asked for? In what way, and when published? How many tenders were received? The name of each party tendering, and date of tender?

Mr. McLELAN. There is a mail service between Fort Macleod and Pincher Creek. It is weekly at present, but I have been making enquiries for the last month or two as to the advisability of making it semi-weekly, and perhaps in a short time we may issue advertisements calling for tenders. The distance is 32 miles. Mr. Ives has the contract for carrying the mails at a sum of $570 a year. Tenders were not asked for, but a temporary arrangement was made by the local inspector without tenders.

RICHARD MONCK.

Mr. LISTER asked, Is Richard Monck in the employ of the Government? If so, in what capacity, and at what salary?

Mr. CARLING. It is rather difficult to answer the question the hon. gentleman has asked, as there may be a number of Richard Moncks in the employ of the Government. If he would particularise the place, we might be able to answer him.

Mr. McLELAN.

Mr. LISTER. Of Chatham.

Mr. CARLING. Richard Monck, of Chatham, is not in the employ of the Government.

DISMISSAL OF DEBATES TRANSLATORS.

Mr. LAURIER. I now rise to bring up the question of privilege of which I gave notice a few days ago, in reference to the dismissal by you, Mr. Speaker, of some of the officers of the House. The last time it was brought up by me, it was understood that it would be taken up again after the close of the debate on reciprocity, and I think no more fitting opportunity will offer than this. I desire to bring this question before the House in order to test the action by which you have discharged what you considered to be your duty as Speaker of this House, in dismissing and depriving the House of the services of three of the officers whom the House had appointed for its convenience and service. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I regret exceedingly that I feel myself obliged, in the discharge of what I conceive to be my duty, as a member of this House, to bring this matter up. Certainly, I think it is the duty of everyone in this House to endeavor to support the Chair in any decision given by the Chair; but if one finds himself obliged conscientiously to differ from the view which the Chair may have taken, it is only right that an opportunity should at once be given to test the question, to see whether the Speaker, under the circumstances, properly or improperly exercised his duty. In this instance, I must say at once that, in my humble judgment, at least, it seems to me that you have taken an erroneous view of the duty with which you were charged in your position as Speaker. I regret it all the more, because it seems to me that the step which you felt it your duty to take was one of extreme hardship to the officers who were dismissed. The officers who were dismissed from the service of the House were Ernest Tremblay, Rémi Tremblay, and A. E. Poirier. All three were translators of the debates of this House. Mr. Ernest Tremblay was appointed by an order of this House, upon a report of the Debates Committee, in the year 1884; Mr. Rémi Tremblay was appointed in the same manner in the month of February, 1884, and Mr. A. E. Poirier—

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Eudore Poirier.

Mr. LAURIER. My hon. friend knows him better than I do, perhaps—Mr. Eudore Poirier was appointed in the same manner in the month of April, 1884. As to the competence of these men, I do not believe that a word of complaint can be uttered; I believe that it is the opinion of everybody that in the discharge of these duties they were most efficient officers of this House. In fact the complaint which was made against them is not in reference to their services as officers of this House, but the charge is that they went out of their proper sphere of action and grossly insulted some members of this House. The charge was brought forward by my hon. friend, the Secretary of State, in a letter dated the 22nd May, 1887. I will not read it all, but I will read the gist of the facts of which the hon. gentleman complains. After naming the officers, he says:

"These officials acted with indescribable violence at the last electoral campaign; both on the hustings and in the press wrote and spoke in regard to me, things so offensive and calumnious that I could neither speak to them nor salute them in this House, and I say sincerely that their presence within the precincts of this House is for me a nuisance which, it appears to me, no one has a right to subject a member of Parliament."

This charge is corroborated by my hon. friend for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives), so far as Mr. Rémi Tremblay is concerned. In a letter a few days later also addressed to you, Mr. Ives made a particular charge against Rémi Tremblay. He states in conclusion:

"His presence is distasteful to me, I cannot have any communication with him, and I ask that he be dismissed from the service of the House of Commons."

Upon receipt of these complaints, you, Sir, very properly referred them to the officers themselves for their answer. They sent you their answer, and you afterwards sent the whole correspondence to the chairman of the Debates Committee. The Debates Committee investigated the matter and came to the conclusion that it had better be left in your hands to be dealt with. They reported to the House, but that report never was taken up, it never was even moved in the House. It must be regretted that this report was not considered by the House, because then the whole matter could have been dealt with by the House upon its merits, and the House could have determined at once whether these gentlemen had been guilty of such an offence as warranted their dismissal. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to enter into the merits of the charges which are brought against these officers, except in so far as it may be necessary to the end of the motion which I have placed in your hands, and which simply challenges the jurisdiction which you thought proper to exercise in the matter. This, however, I must say, that the officers are accused of having taken an active part in the electoral campaign. They do not deny that; in their answer they affirm that they did, indeed, take an active part in the election, but they deny that they were guilty of the calumnious language with which they are charged. Now, I must say at once that it seems somewhat singular, and it is, I think, improper, that officers of this House should be allowed to engage actively in politics. I have no hesitation at all in making that statement, but if these gentlemen declare that they took an active part in the political campaign, they also declare that in doing so they had the sanction of this House. They state that the House had appointed the translators of the debates—I am not yet speaking of the other officers of the House, but of the translators only—should be allowed to take part, not only in political campaigns, but in active politics in all circumstances. This matter came up incidentally in 1884. At that time it was stated, without contradiction from any quarter, that the translators of the debates were permitted to be engaged in active journalism, and, therefore, to engage in politics. On that occasion the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who was a member of the Debates Committee, spoke. I must say that the matter came up upon the question of increasing the salaries of the translators, and the hon. member for Norfolk stated that he was opposed to an increase of salaries, because the translators were actively engaged as newspaper correspondents. He said:

"I felt myself that there was no justification for granting an advance to the translators, most of whom are here acting as newspaper correspondents, and would be here whether they held translators' situations or not."

So it was openly stated on the floor of the House, in 1884, that the translators of the debates, while being officers of this House, were at the same time actively engaged in political work, and writing for the newspapers with which they were connected. On the same occasion the Secretary of State also spoke as follows:—

"We are not to judge of the political qualifications of the reporters and translators of Hansard. We should not call up any unpleasant reminiscences of the past, when the question is a competent officer of the House. The only questions that we should consider in the choice of reporters and translators for Hansard are those of knowledge, ability and general qualification."

That was the understood doctrine. It was understood that the translators of the debates, as I shall show hereafter, are engaged for no other purpose but to translate the debates. As soon as the Session is over and they have completed their work, they are free, and it was admitted on that occasion that they could dispose of their time in any manner they chose to employ it, in politics or otherwise. However, I must say that the translators of the debates have largely availed themselves of this permission. The staff, at the opening of the present Session, was composed of eight members: Mr. Beaulieu, the chief; Messrs. Bouchard, Lasalle, Vanasse, Gélinas, E. Tremblay, R. Tremblay and Poirier, the latter three of whom have been dismissed. In regard to the Messrs. Beaulieu and Gélinas, I cannot say whether they are engaged in politics or not, as I have not the honor of their acquaintance. In regard to the other three, I know them very well, and every one of them is actively engaged in politics not only during the election, but from the commencement to the end of each year. Mr. Bouchard belongs to the staff of the Journal de Québec, an active ministerial organ published in Quebec, and he is chief editor of that journal, I am told. Mr. Lasalle is on the editorial staff of Le Monde, an active ministerial organ published in Montreal. Mr. Vanasse is engaged as editor of another ministerial organ published at Sorel, Le Sorelois. Not only did those gentlemen engage in politics as much as the three translators who have been dismissed, but they have been much more. Those three translators are only charged with having been engaged in politics during the election; the three other translators I have named are engaged in politics from day to day as active editors of newspapers. Moreover, they all actively engaged in politics. Mr. Vanasse took part in the same campaign in which the Messrs. Tremblay and Poirier engaged. I find that on a certain occasion in his own paper, Le Sorelois, he reported a meeting in which he had encountered Senator Guévremont, by whom he was attacked for trespassing beyond his duties in taking an active part in politics. But Mr. Vanasse reports in his own paper that at that meeting, held on 20th July, 1886, he had answered the Senator as follows:

"Mr. Vanasse repelled victoriously the disloyal attacks of which he had been the object. He explained that he did not, in any way, depend on the Government, that he had been appointed translator by a Committee of the House of Commons, consisting of Reformers and Conservatives, and that the Government could not deprive him of his position, having no control over the office, but that it could only be done by a vote of the House of Commons."

So that officer of the House declared what was the common opinion entertained at the time, that he was not an officer of the Government but an officer of the House, and that he was at liberty to engage in politics as he was engaged at that time. It seems to me under such circumstances to be beyond doubt that these officers were led to believe, and had every reason to believe, that they could do on the Liberal side of politics what other three translators could do on the Conservative side, and certainly if you are to apply an equal rule you must say that Messrs. Tremblay and Poirier were no more guilty of trespassing against the privileges of this House than were the three translators on the other side of politics who have been retained. But it will be said that, conceding that they could engage in politics, those translators who have been discharged have been guilty of abusive language, and this charge has been brought against them. It may probably be said that we do not find fault with their taking part in politics if they choose to do so, but they must use polite language. Well, Mr. Speaker, it was the House of Commons which gave the translators permission to engage in politics, but the House could scarcely be expected to see that they were never guilty of using abusive language. Hon. members must remember that the translators of the debates for three or four months of the year do nothing else but translate the debates of the House; they become saturated with abusive language, and to expect that they would act differently was to suppose they were different flesh and blood from ourselves. I will say this to hon. gentlemen opposite, and especially to the Secretary of State and the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives), who seems to have been rather thin skinned on the occasion in question, that if they find fault with the translators who engage in politics for having been guilty of abusive language, I call upon the man without offence to throw the first stone, and I do not expect it will come from the other side at all events, and perhaps not from this side. Such being the case, when that is the only charge that was brought against them, these facts must be taken into consideration in dealing with the question. The moment you permit a man, whether he be an officer of the House or a member of Parliament, to take part in politics, you may take it as a logical consequence of the permission given that they will commit abuses in the heat of discussion. If you do not want the officers of the House to use abusive language towards members of Parliament, we must prevent them from engaging in politics, and I think this is the only reasonable course to be pursued. I think it was a most unfortunate course on the part of the House to allow any of its officers to engage actively in politics, either on the hustings or in the columns of newspapers. Coming as you do, Mr. Speaker, from the Province of Quebec, and being, I presume, a diligent reader of the ministerial press, you are aware that the offence with which the translators are charged is not confined to them, and if we were to scan the columns of the newspapers edited by Messrs. Bouchard, Vanasse and Lasalle, we would find just as much abuse in their columns as could be found in the columns embodied in the complaint of the Secretary of State.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Bouchard has not been on the Journal de Québec for a year.

Mr. LAURIER. Well, he is on Le Canada, published in the city of Ottawa, and my hon. friend cannot undertake to say the reverse. At all events, I can say that at the present moment I am led to understand that Bouchard is an active officer of Le Canada. He was at that time on the Journal de Québec and had been for several years there up to last year. Now, Mr. Speaker, if the report had come before the House, my hon. friend from Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver) was prepared with an amendment which would have met the justice of the case. My hon. friend was prepared with an amendment stating that the practice which had prevailed of allowing officers of this House to interfere in politics was not a judicious practice, and that it should be put an end to. This would have at once defined the position and shown that the officers of the House were not expected to interfere at all in politics. I think that position would have been a sound one, and a warning would have been given to those officers which would have amply met the justice of the case. Instead of that, Mr. Speaker, the committee made a report and referred the matter to you. If the report had been adopted by the House, of course the matter would have been at an end, and you would have been perfectly justified in exercising your discretion, but I must say this further, that since you came to the conclusion, whether with authority or without authority, to dismiss those officers, it would have been on your part, a simple act of mercy and justice to dismiss them at once and to inform them at once that their services would not have been required. Instead of that you waited until the 25th of February, that is to say, two days after the opening of the Session, when each of those gentlemen received the following letter:—

"Sir,—The Speaker of the House of Commons has instructed me to tell you that your services as translator of the debates of this House will not be required during the ensuing Session.

"I have the honor to be, Sir,

"A. MACMAHON,

"Secretary."

As I said a moment ago, I think it would have been an act of mercy, since you made your mind up to dismiss them, to dismiss them immediately after the last Session of Parliament, so that these men might do something else for a living. To my own knowledge, Sir, one or two of those men had no other means of livelihood than the office they occupied in this House. It was, it seems to me, a harsh measure at the opening of the Session, when they had come here to discharge their ordinary duties, to dismiss them in this manner. I do not want now to enter into the merits of the case. The question which I bring before the House is as to whether or not, as Speaker of this House, you have the power which you thought you had, to dismiss them. I understand, as I said already, and this point will not be contradicted, that you could not have acted upon the report of the Debates Committee, since that report never was adopted. As I understand, you think you have the power which you have exercised under section 16, chapter 13 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, that is the Act referring to the House of Commons and which is as follows:—

"If any complaint or representation is at any time made to the Speaker for the time being of the misconduct or unfitness of any clerk, officer, messenger, or other person attendant on the House of Commons, the Speaker may cause an enquiry to be made into the conduct or fitness of such person; and if thereupon it appears to the Speaker that such person has been guilty of misconduct, or is unfit to hold his situation, the Speaker may, if such clerk, officer, messenger, or other person has been appointed by the Crown, suspend him and report such suspension to the Governor General, and if he has not been appointed by the Crown, the Speaker may suspend or remove such person."

I apprehend that is the section on which you think you had the right. All I have to say with regard to this question is simply this, that the officers of this House who are therein contemplated are not the translators of the debates. The translators of the debates do not come within the purview of this Act. The officers here contemplated are the officers appointed for the services of this House by yourself, and all the officers for the regular service of the House are either appointed by the Crown or by yourself, Mr. Speaker. I conceive it to be in that way. But as far as my knowledge goes, the Clerk of the House is the only officer who is appointed by the Crown. All the other officers, the assistant clerk for instance, are appointed by Mr. Speaker. In England the officers are appointed by the Crown, but this was not always so. It is only since 1856 they are appointed by the Crown, and previous to that they were appointed by the Clerk of the House. In 1856 a Bill was brought in specially with a view of taking that power from the Clerk of the House in the British House of Commons and vesting it in the Crown. Mr. Wilson, who had charge of the Bill in the House of Commons, said:

"He would now move for leave to bring in a Bill to regulate certain offices of the House of Commons. The object of the proposed Bill was: First, to vest in the Crown for the future the appointment of the Assistant and Second Assistant Clerk at the table, instead of having the appointment of those officers vested in the First Clerk, as at present; and secondly, to repeal that clause of the Act which provided that the salary of the Second Assistant Clerk should be charged on the Consolidated Fund."

So that the power was taken by the Crown to appoint those officers who previously had been appointed by the Clerk. I think the power of appointing officers of this House should also have belonged properly to the Clerk, but by a series of measures coming in succession one after the other, all those appointments have been vested in the Speaker, and rule 102 of the House expressly lays it down:

"Before filling any vacancy in the service of the House by the Speaker, enquiry shall be made touching the necessity for the continuance of such office."

So that the Speaker is expressly assured that the power of appointing officers of this House is completely vested in him. I understand very well that under such circumstances the power to appoint is vested in the Speaker, and that the Speaker is responsible to the House of the proper discharge of their duties by those officers. If you have any reason to believe that one of those officers, you yourself have appointed, does not properly discharge his duty, I apprehend that under such circumstances, and no one will contradict it, that you have the power of removal. The power of appointing always implies the power of removal, but the power of removal cannot be exercised until there is the power to appoint. That is the point I wish to come to. I submit to the House that you have no authority to remove those officers, because they are not officers appointed by yourself. They are officers appointed by the House of Commons for its special convenience. The House has only one officer appointed by the Crown—that is the Clerk, and the officers should be appointed by the Clerk, I think, when we consider the propriety of the case, because he is primarily responsible for the discharge of the business of this House. We have allowed a different practice to prevail, and transferred from the Clerk to the Speaker the power to appoint, and, therefore those officers appointed by the Speaker he has power to remove. As to the Clerk for instance, the Speaker has no power of removal. In the year 1874 we organised a new service for the House, that is to say, the translation of the debates. And we provided certain rules which have always guided us since that time, and which, in my opinion, are of such a nature as to put the question beyond a doubt that these officers are directly amenable to no other authority than the authority of the House, without the interference of the Speaker. In 1874 the House adopted the following resolution:—

"That a Select Standing Committee of not more than five members shall be appointed next Session, and each Session thereafter, to make rules and regulations, and manage generally all matters connected with the reporting and publishing of the Hansard."

That is the standing rule, under which the debates of this House have always been taken and translated. In the Session of 1883 the House adopted the following resolution:—

"Resolved, That the contract system for the translation of the official report of the Debates of this House be done away with after this Session, and that four Translators be appointed permanently, to be under the control of the Committee, one to be chief, * * * none of whom shall be employed in any other manner by the House except in connection with the Debates."

These words are pregnant of meaning; the officers to be appointed are to be kept under the control of the Debates Committee of the House, and they are to discharge certain duties and no other duties; they are to be employed in the translating of the debates and nothing else. Now, no one will pretend that these officers are in the same category as the officers you yourself, Sir, choose to appoint. If you appoint an officer, according to the Act, you have the power of removal and suspension; you can take him from one office and put him in another; the officers at the Table of the House you can take from the Table and place in another position; but would it be pretended that you have power to take a translator of the debates, appointed by this House, and give him another position? Evidently no, because the rule expressly says that he shall be employed as a translator of the debates and in no other manner. It seems to me that the point is clear beyond a doubt that the translators belong to a new category of officers, and that they do not come within the precincts of the Act under which you have presumed to act. Let me call attention to clause 17 of that Act:

"The Clerk of the House of Commons shall subscribe and take before the Speaker the oath of allegiance, and all other officers, clerks and messengers of the House of Commons shall subscribe and take before the Clerk of the House of Commons; and the Clerk of the House of Commons shall keep a register of all such oaths."

Now, this is an oath which is required of all officers appointed by you, but this oath is not required from the translators.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. What of that?

Mr. LAURIER. Therefore these translators are not subject to this Act, and if they are not, the Speaker had no authority in the matter.

Mr. DESJARDINS. Can the hon. gentleman tell me if the official reporters are bound to take the oath of allegiance?

Mr. LAURIER. The official reporters stand in a completely different position from the official translators, because the reporters have been made permanent officers of the House and they cannot engage in any other work; their services are at the disposal of the Government after the Session, and their appointment expressly says so; but the translators are appointed to translate the debates and nothing else, and no one knows better than the hon. gentleman, who is chairman of the Debates Committee, that it was always understood that during a part of the Session they could engage in any other work they chose to engage in. Therefore there is no parallel between the two classes of officers. I think I have given a good answer to the Prime Minister that since these officers are not obliged to take the oath of allegiance, they do not come within the precincts of this Act. Your power, Mr. Speaker, is a statutory power, and if you have power to remove these officers under the Act, they should also take the oath of allegiance; but if they are not bound to take the oath of allegiance, they do not come within the precincts of the Act for one thing, and they would not come within its precincts for another thing. These reasons, in my judgment at least, make it clear that in acting as you have done, you have trespassed beyond the duties assigned to you by the House. I have endeavored to discuss this question without any acrimony; I have put it simply on the ground that the Speaker has exceeded his powers, and therefore I beg to move:

That in the Session of 1874 this House adopted certain resolutions, providing for the reporting of the Debates of this House, and that it was amongst other things, enacted:

1. "That a Select Standing Committee of not more than (5) five members shall be appointed next Session, and each Session thereafter, to make rules and regulations and manage generally all matters connected with the reporting and publishing of the Hansard."

2. That the said Committee, under the authority of the said resolutions, has been regularly appointed ever since, at the beginning of every Session.

3. That the said Committee, with the sanction of the House for all its proceedings, in every instance, has managed generally all matters connected with the reporting and publishing of the Debates.

4. That on the 5th April, 1883, the said Committee reported to this House as follows:—

"Resolved, That the contract system for the translation of the official report of the Debates of this House be done away with after this Session, and that (4) four Translators be appointed permanently, to be under the control of the Committee, one to be chief at a salary of $1,000, and (3) three at salaries of $800 each, none of whom shall be employed in any other manner by the House except in connection with the Debates," and that the report was concurred in by this House.

5. That on the 27th April, during the same Session, the said committee made the following report:

(1.) "That in accordance with the terms and conditions of their second report (to wit, the above report) the following gentlemen be appointed Translators of the official reports of the Debates of this House, viz.:—A. Gélinas, as Chief Translator, and N. H. Beaulieu, J. B. Vanasse and Ernest Tremblay, as Assistant Translators."

6. That on the 8th February, 1884, the Committee reported "the appointment of Rémi Tremblay, at a salary of $800, as Translator from the French language into the English, and from the English language into the French, as may be necessary," and that the said report was concurred in by this House.

7. That on the 1st April, during the same Session, the said Committee made the following report:—

(1.) "That Mr. A. E. Poirier be appointed as an additional Translator, and that his appointment date from the commencement of next Session."

(2.) "That, commencing with next Session, the salaries of the Translators be as follows:—

"A. Gélinas, Chief Translator, $1,200; N. H. Beaulieu, Assistant Translator; E. Tremblay, Assistant Translator; R. Tremblay, Assistant Translator; J. B. Vanasse, Assistant Translator; J. Bouchard, Assistant Translator; J. Lasalle, Assistant Translator; A. E. Poirier, Assistant Translator, $1,000 each; and that in addition to the work of translation, the Chief Translator be required to make the Index," and that the said report was concurred in by this House.

8. That at the beginning of the present Session, to wit, on the 23rd February last, Mr. Speaker dismissed the said Rémi Tremblay, E. Tremblay and A. E. Poirier from their offices of Translators of the Debates of this House.

9. Resolved, That while professing great respect for the view which Mr. Speaker has taken of his authority in the premises, this House emphatically records its opinion that the publishing and translating of the Debates, and of everything connected therewith, belong exclusively to the House itself, and that the same is to be exclusively exercised, with the sanction of the House in every instance, through the said Committee; and that under the circumstances the action of Mr. Speaker is an invasion of the undoubted rights and privileges of this House, and is therefore not binding.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I am sure my hon. friend will not charge me with improperly imputing motives to him when I say that his remarks have convinced me that friendship can carry a man very far. Were it not for that feeling, I am sure my hon. friend would, if he did not regret, at all events would not care about having put on record the opinions he has just expressed concerning the discipline and dignity of the House and the dignity of the hon. members of this House. I do not wish to enter at all into the merits of this question. I am one of those who complained to you, Mr. Speaker, of the improper conduct of certain officers of this House, and I asked for their dismissal. I did not do so from any feeling of revenge or spite, because I hardly know two of the gentlemen in question, and the third has given me no reason at all to entertain any resentment or desire for revenge against him. But there is one thing for which I have an immense amount of regard, and that is the dignity of this House, and my own. My opinion is that this House should be regulated, as regards its interior economy, on a different principle from any other House where good company meets, and where discipline, obedience, and a proper sense of respect and decency are required of those in its service. For these reasons I have asked you, Sir, to dismiss these three officers. I shall not repeat the expressions which have been used on the hustings and in the press by those gentlemen. That would be entering into the discussion of a matter to which it is always unpleasant to refer, and I may dispense with doing so, because these gentlemen have not denied that they have said and done what has been reported of them, but have tried to cover themselves under the privilege which my hon. friend has been endeavouring to explain to the House. I am sure the hon. gentleman will gain nothing by his motion. I am sure the expression of opinion has been too often given in this House, on both sides, in cases connected with parties in the service of this House, to allow the principle to prevail that if the conduct with which these officers are reproached is one that deserves punishment, that the punishment should not be dealt out, Mr. Speaker, by you. As the motion is one questioning your jurisdiction, Sir, I shall restrict myself within the limits of that question. My hon. friend has said that it was hardship these three men were not dismissed last Session or at the end of last Session, so as not to force them to come here again at the beginning of this Session, and lose their time as they have been losing it. I must for a moment allude to that. I may say you have been guilty, Sir, indeed of believing that these three men would have the decency to understand their position, and have self-respect enough, after the report which was made by the Committee of Hansard last Session, to stay at home this Session, more especially as they stated on the hustings they were ready to do so, and were ready to pay for what they called their patriotism. They stated frequently on the hustings and in the press that they were jeopardizing their position, and exposing themselves to lose the bread they were earning at the hands of this House, but that nevertheless they were ready to make that sacrifice on the altar of their country. Their altar has been very much diminished since they made those declarations in public. You, Sir, presumed perhaps too much in thinking those men would feel it was due to their self-respect to remain at home, and you had to dismiss them at the beginning of the Session. I may say again that the presence of these men parading the corridors has been a cause of annoyance both to myself and to other hon.

members of this House, and not only have they been parading the corridors, but they have been exhibiting their sparring qualities besides, because one of them was guilty of committing an assault in the translators' office a day or two ago. These men belong to the press; they know, as my hon. friend says they do, the procedure of the House, and they should know that when there is a debate in the House regarding one of its members, that member has the decency to absent himself during the debate. But while the debate with regard to dismissing them was taking place, these gentlemen had not the decency to absent themselves from the House. It is a strange theory expounded by my hon. friend to say that by statute the action of this House must be regulated according to certain rules. But, according to the statute, you, Mr. Speaker, and the Clerk of this House have entrusted to your care the discipline of the officers of this House; and in cases of misconduct on the part of officers appointed by the Crown, you have the right to suspend them, and in other cases you have the right to dismiss them for misconduct. There is no distinction made, and although my hon. friend has thought proper to make one there can be none. According to his argument, those gentlemen engaged as translators of the Hansard would have the privilege which members of this House have not. You have the right to punish members of this House, but, according to the hon. gentleman, you have not the right to punish those translators. More than that, the committee, under whose control my hon. friend pretends those officers were, declared that it was for you, Mr. Speaker, to deal with them. The committee has declared it has no control over the translators, except as regards the work of translation, and that as to their behaviour in or out of the House, that is a matter with which the Speaker of the House must deal. My hon. friend's argument is a very singular one. Because he says, these men are employed only during the Session, outside of the Session they have a right to be as abusive, impertinent and scandalous towards members of this House as they choose. Does the hon. gentleman pretend that a civil servant, whose duty is to attend his office from 9 o'clock to 4.30 in the evening, may, when his work is over, insult or strike a member of the House, and yet that we can have no right to dismiss him? Does the hon. gentleman pretend that once a civil servant has done his duty during office hours, he has the right to be a blackguard after office hours? That contention will not hold water. The statute says that some of the officers can be suspended by you, and that you and the Clerk of the House have the control of the other officers and may dismiss or punish them. You have done it, and you have done it rightly, and I am sure that in doing it you have done a thing that every member of this House will say you were right in doing. I do not think that the Speaker should make any distinction between parties, and I have no hesitation in saying that, if any translator or any other official had met the hon. gentleman on the hustings and had said that he was a thief, a liar, a traitor, the slave of dangerous sects, and so on, and if the hon. gentleman was complaining of it, I would be the first to rise and say: Dismiss that man. Whether the member attacked had the name of Laurier or Chapleau, it would make no difference, and my hon. friends have neither the right to deny or to suspect what I say, and I say it with that deliberation and that frankness which I have when I make such declarations. I do not think I have anything to add on this question. As I stated, we are a Legislative Assembly, and we cannot as a Legislative Assembly take upon ourselves to conduct here the discipline of the officers of the House. That is done by a delegation, which is given by all the precedents, by all the traditions, and by something better than traditions, by good sense and reason, to the chief officer of this House, to the president of this House, to the man who, sitting in the chair, is obliged to take care not only of the officers outside of the House, but of the members themselves during the sitting; and I say that under the circumstances you have acted rightly. You may have acted late, but you have acted rightly in rendering the decision which you have rendered. There can be no long argument upon this. I think it imposes itself upon the mind and upon the sense of every hon. member that, having in your hands the conduct of the discipline of all officers of the House, you have done the only thing which the Constitution and common sense give you the right to do, in dismissing these men for an offence which is not denied by anybody to be worthy of the punishment you have inflicted in dismissing them. I do not want to look at this from any point of sentiment on my part, but I would not remain in this House while one of the servants of the House was here who would consider he had the right to blackguard me and to act in the most indecent manner with me either in this House or outside of it, and you would have a perfect right to say on my demand to any such officer, if you are guilty of that, you are dismissed.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the question which is now under the attention of the House is one of very great importance, and one that the House ought to approach in a judicial spirit. If we are disposed to lay down a rule with regard to conduct of the officers of this House, it is important that the rule should be applied with the utmost fairness and that we should not have one measure of justice for those who happen to be Liberal in their sentiments, and another and a different one for those who belong to the party which has the majority in the House. In the consideration of this question, we have first to consider the nature of the offence, whether it is one that should be brought under the attention of the House at all, and, if so, who or what is the proper party to deal with the offence. In the first place, until the House is prepared to adopt a general rule which it is disposed to apply with perfect impartiality to all those who are engaged as translators, it was as much open, in my opinion, to those parties to engage in political warfare as it was open to those who still remain members of that board of translators. Then, I think it is also obvious that you, Mr. Speaker, had no power to deal with those parties; that if these parties committed any offence which made it proper to dismiss them from the service of this House, a motion should be made by the hon. gentleman or by some other member who thought he had good ground of complaint, in the House, and the dismissal should have come from the House and not from you. It is clear that these translators do not fall within the class of officers placed under your control. They are outside of the officers provided for by the statute. They are appointed by the House of its own motion and of its own inherent authority, and are supposed to remain in the service of the House until they are removed by a resolution of the House. It does not matter what men may say outside of the House. What is said outside of the House is not a matter of privilege that an hon. gentleman can bring before the House, unless it be something said with reference to his conduct as a member of the House. I think that was very clearly laid down when a certain member of the House of Commons in England complained of observations which had been made by another member, Dr. Kenealy, who said:

"Do you think a man would make a good representative who has put a false witness into the box who would give false testimony?"

That was brought to the attention of the House, and Mr. Gladstone said it was not a question with which the House had any right to deal, but it was a question, if any wrong had been committed, which was to be dealt with by the courts. The same view was taken by Mr. Lowe, who said:

"There is no occasion for interference by the House. It is a matter of slander, and the hon. gentleman has his remedy before the ordinary tribunals of the country."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Kenealy was not a servant of the House.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman says that Dr. Kenealy was a member of the House. I say it does not matter. If the hon. gentleman has any wrong done him, if he has any charge made against him, it is not for the House to anticipate that and say whether it is well or ill-founded. It is for the hon. gentleman to vindicate himself before the ordinary tribunals of the country in the same way as any other party. Mr. Disraeli, speaking on the same subject, went further, and pointed out that the observation applied to the servants of the House as well as to its members:

"It is no part of the business of the House to make such a question a question of privilege. A personal attack must be made in the House and against a member in his capacity as member to justify the House in dealing with the matter at all."

I want to know whether the First Minister takes exception to that rule, and, when these gentlemen dealt with this hon. gentleman, when, not only was he not a member of the House, but when there was no House at all, upon the platform, whether he thinks he has a right to come here and complain of their conduct and snuff them out for saying what several of the hon. gentleman's supporters have said of him. I have in my hand several observations made in reference to the hon. gentleman, not by the translators, but by the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins), who said things of the hon. gentleman and of the First Minister quite as severe as anything said by these translators who were dismissed from office, either with regard to the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) or the hon. the Secretary of State. I want to know why the Secretary of State has not brought this up as a matter of privilege, and proposed to the House that the hon. gentleman, having made charges which were atrocious slanders against the First Minister, is unworthy of a seat in this House. I say that he has just as good a right to propose that motion and with just as much propriety, as any observations which the hon. gentleman has made. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman complains "meeting these men in the corridors," he says, "is offensive to me." Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman has to meet them in the street; are they offensive there? Have they not as good a right to come here as any other citizens of the country? Is the hon. gentleman going to have some extra-judicial tribunal created to try imaginary offences against his sentiments and feelings for which the ordinary law of the country makes no provision? Well, Sir, let me say that the First Minister has put in the Library here a librarian. Did he never say anything offensive to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House? Why, Sir, I remember that from the time I went on the press in 1882, until that gentleman retired from the chief editorial staff of the Mail, there were but two or three newspapers of the daily Mail that were published, that did not contain a personal attack on myself. There was scarcely a paper that did not contain attacks upon almost every hon. gentleman on this side of the House who has been for any time in Parliament. Did the hon. gentleman consult our feelings? Did he consider whether this party whom he appointed Librarian was or was not agreeable to us? Was that the view the hon. gentleman laid down? Are those hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House of finer intellectual and moral fibre, of finer sensibilities, than hon. members on this side of the House? Are they the only parties who have any sentiments or feelings that are to be taken into consideration? We remember what the Senator in Uncle Tom's Cabin is represented as saying of the colored population, "We know that they are not much to be considered in the matter; they are not constituted as we are; they have not the sentiments and feelings which we have, and of course you cannot reason from them to us." And I suppose the hon. gentleman thinks that he cannot reason from the Tory side of the House to the Liberal side, and that what is absolutely necessary to protect the dignity, and the freedom, and the rights of the hon. gentlemen on that side, are wholly inapplicable to hon. gentlemen on this side. That is the position taken by the hon. gentleman, and that is the position taken by his colleague the Secretary of State. Now, Sir, let me read for the edification of the First Minister and the Secretary of State, some observations that have been made by those translators who remain—there are five of them. Have they been less considerate of the feelings of hon. gentlemen on that side of the House than those whom the First Minister and the Secretary of State have called upon you arbitrarily and unconstitutionally to dismiss? I say, Sir, that we find that the whole eight must go, upon the rule laid down by the Secretary of State. Now, let me call attention to some observations which were made in the organ of the Secretary of State, in the Presse of November 24, 1885.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I deny the right of the hon. gentleman to say that the Presse was my organ. It has not been, and is not.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec East). Is not now?

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman denies that it is his organ. At all events, the observations which I am about to read are worthy of the translators who are still under the ægis of the hon. gentleman's protection.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. That paper was the violent adversary of the Government at that time.

Mr. MILLS. It says:

"We hope Sir John does not impersonate the English-speaking people, because it would be very sad for them if it were so. Our English-speaking countrymen would be in a pitiable state if they had no other representative besides this moral ruin."

This moral ruin, the hon. gentleman who leads the Government, and those hon. gentlemen on that side. It says:

"For a long time back we have been suffering in silence, in consequence of the tyranny of an old infatuated chief who considers the country as his own property, and who leads us according to his caprices, without ever taking any notice of our desires and of our feelings."

Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman does not seem to have been as sensitive as his colleague, and he is not prepared to measure out to the translators that remain and are now friendly to the Administration, that vengeance, that punishment, which he proposes to measure out to those who were known to belong to the Liberal party. Then it further says:

"We want no more of the old schemer whom we have for a long time considered as a statesman, but who juggles with men and measures as a conjuror juggles with nutmegs."

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I tell the hon. gentleman that that paper was then a most violent adversary of the Government, and the extracts which he reads are merely a copy of the speeches of some hon. members on the other side of the House. I tell him that paper was not and is not my organ, and he has no right to say so. He is not in order in saying so, and he is not a gentleman if he does.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman's language shows that he is in very much the same position as these translators. The hon. gentleman's notion of what is gentlemanly, after all, does not exactly accord with the notions of hon. gentlemen on this side of this House. I am inclined to think that if he would practice a little more courtesy, he would have a little better ground to complain of the want of courtesy of those whom he is pursuing with his vengeance, and upon whom he is making Mr. Speaker the instrument for the purpose of wreaking that impotent vengeance which has characterised his conduct in this matter. Then, Sir, on the 26th November, 1885, Mr.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

Desjardins is reported in the Presse as having said, among other things—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is wandering a little from the scope of the resolution as it appears, and as it was explained by the hon. mover. I think we must—

Mr. MILLS. I am merely saying, Mr. Speaker—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Chair, chair.

Mr. MILLS. I am speaking to the point of order. I am saying that the hon. gentleman's own supporters have used, of himself and his colleagues, language which he complains of in the translators; and if I can show that these hon. gentleman are accepting that support and are cordially with those writers, I think I am showing that they have no case against these translators.

Mr. SPEAKER. The scope of the resolution, as I understand it, applies to jurisdiction. The question is, whether jurisdiction rests in the House or with the Speaker. It is so stated in the resolution, and was so explained, as I understood it, by the hon. mover. I feel it my duty to make a gentle suggestion in the way of checking a debate which will become, if continued, quite discursive, and might be offensive if it involved recrimination.

Mr. MILLS. I do not so understand the resolution as you have it. I understand there are before the House two questions in this resolution, and I ask the liberty to state them. I understand that one proposition is that these gentlemen have committed no offence, therefore they ought not to be removed by anybody. I understand the second proposition is that if they had committed any offence, the Speaker is not the proper party to deal with them. Now, Sir, I think I am at liberty to discuss both those propositions.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I rise to a point of order. The course which the hon. gentleman is about to take is one which is clearly out of order, is irrelevant, and has no reference to this motion. The motion is that the Speaker has exceeded his jurisdiction in dismissing the three men. The hon. gentleman holds that the Speaker did exceed his jurisdiction, that he had no right to act as he did act, that his discretion was improperly exercised, because members of Parliament and others, not employees of the House, had used strong language towards others. It is certainly quite irregular, just the same as if a charge was brought against a man for stating that a certain man was a thief and he replied that he did so because other men had called him a thief. It is certainly quite out of order.

Mr. MULOCK. The Secretary of State in the commencement of his speech declared that he took the position he did out of regard to his own dignity and the dignity of this House, and he proceeded, if I understood what he said and if I understand the English language, to denounce the translators, because of their conduct during a certain campaign. Did anyone call the Secretary of State to order then? Did the Speaker call the Secretary of State to order?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. If the Secretary of State was justified in going beyond the mere question of jurisdiction to the real merits of the case, then surely some one on this side of the House is entitled to answer the remarks of the Secretary of State.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The hon. gentleman either did not listen or did not understand what I said. I stated most pointedly, and the House will not have forgotten it, that I would not repeat even a single expression used because I wished to remain within the merits of the case, and I proceeded to say that Mr. Speaker acted wisely. The hon. gentleman said in his argument that the Speaker had exceeded his privilege in assuming powers that belonged to the House. I refrained from dealing with the question beyond mentioning the conduct of the officers during the last few days. It is unfair for the hon. gentleman to say that I stated the whole case and discussed the whole question; I did not do so, but I restrained myself within the limits.

Mr. MULOCK. I should like to ask the Secretary of State if he did not in, the course of his argument, contend that it was necessary for him to take this particular course in order to show his regard for his own dignity and the dignity of this House? Then did he not make an innuendo against the conduct of those gentlemen? It was not the action of the Speaker of which he was complaining, it was not his action that he was denouncing. The point in his argument in support of the course taken with regard to the conduct of the translators was that he was justified in taking a certain course. He made a certain charge, which it is proposed that we on this side of the House shall not answer.

Mr. LAURIER. There is much more in the language of the Secretary of State when he replied to me than he now admits. What was the upshot of his argument? He passed rather lightly over the question of law. He did not say the Speaker had acted rightly in dismissing the officers; he justified the action of the Speaker on its merits, and he said once or twice that the Speaker had done right. What was the gist of his charge? It was that they were blackguards and he would not submit to the infamy of having to meet blackguards in this House. What does this involve? The hon. gentleman is showing that this House is full of blackguards. If the hon. gentleman had confined himself to the mere question of law, I could have understood it. My hon. friend would not then have the privilege now of going into anything outside; but I appeal to the sense of fairness of the House that the Secretary of State having failed to confine himself to the question of jurisdiction, but having entered into the merits of the case and said that he took action because he would not submit to meeting blackguards here, we have a right to reply and discuss the whole question.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I was about to make an observation on the question of order. The whole speech of the Secretary of State was in justification, not of the legal conduct of the Speaker, but of the merits of the case and the right of the Speaker to dismiss men who had acted so improperly. I was undertaking to show, in the first place, that a number of members of Parliament supporting the Government and on terms of friendship with them had made similar statements, and, in the second place, to show that the five remaining translators used exactly as offensive language as did those whom the hon. gentleman proposed to dismiss. I want to know, and I have a right to know, whether this House is to have one rule of conduct and one measure of punishment for one class of officers, and a different measure for those who are of a different way of political thinking? I think that is perfectly germane to the discussion. This whole case is before the House on the resolution, and I submit, if you undertake to confine the discussion simply to the proposition whether the Speaker has the legal power to dismiss those officers without reference to the propriety of his conduct, a gross injustice will be done by such a ruling. It would be a rule to stifle debate in this House.

Mr. CASEY. A word in regard to the point of order. The Secretary of State said he did not bring before the House the whole case connected with the conduct of the translators. The hon. gentleman did bring it before the House and it is here in printed form on the desk of every member. The whole question of the conduct of the translators, the language used by them and the complaints made by the Secretary of State and by his very sensitive friend, the member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives), is before every hon. member. The whole case is fully before the House, and if, as it appeared, the case in regard to its merits and its details, has been brought before the House by the Secretary himself, he is the very last man who has a right to complain when we propose to enter into the merits of the case. I think, after the discussion and after calling your attention, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to the fact that the whole case is before the House, the very language used as a ground for dismissing them, you will find it your duty to rule that it is as much open to us to discuss the merits of the case, as it was to the Secretary of State.

Mr. DAVIES. Before the point of order is passed upon I desire to call attention to the fact that in addition to the complaints of the Secretary of State having been laid before the House, the reasons which influenced the Speaker in coming to his conclusion have also been presented to the House by the Speaker himself. The papers are now before us, and this is a discussion on the papers and the reasons which influenced the Speaker in his actions. Those papers will be found as an appendix to the Votes and Proceedings, and they commence with a letter by the Secretary of State, in which he charges that those translators were using language which I need not repeat, language offensive to himself and to his dignity and to his honor, and for having used that language he wishes them to be dismissed by the proper authority. The Speaker calls the attention of the translators to the charges, and we have the reply. We have also a letter from the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) making complaint against those translators, complaining in regard to certain language used by them on the hustings, and finally we have the following conclusion of the Speaker:

"HOUSE OF COMMONS, SPEAKER'S CHAMBERS, 22nd February, 1888.

"At a meeting of the Commissioners of the Board of Internal Economy of the House of Commons, called for this day at three, were present:—

"The Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald, G.C.B.;

"Hon. Sir Hector Langevin;

"Hon. J. C. Costigan, and

"The Hon. the Speaker of the House of Commons, Chairman.

"The consideration of the Board is called to the complaints made during last Session by the Hon. Mr. Chapleau, member for Terrebonne, and Mr. Ives, member for Richmond and Wolfe, against Messrs. A. E. Poirier, E. Tremblay and R. Tremblay, the three employed by this Honorable House as translators of the debates. The latter are charged of having, before and during the last general elections used in public prints and on the hustings, towards the former and their friends, very offensive language, and to have made themselves obnoxious by their meddling actively in politics. The letters of Messrs. Chapleau and Ives, and the answers to the same by Messrs. Poirier and Tremblay having been read,

"This Committee have come to the conclusion that it is not in the public interest that the said A. E. Poirier, Ernest Tremblay and Rémi Tremblay should continue to be employed on the staff of the Hansard, and urge the Honorable Mr. Speaker to notify these three persons that their employment is at an end.

"And the Committee adjourned to the call of the Speaker.

"J. ALDRIC OUMET, Speaker.

"A true copy.

"J. ALDRIC OUMET, Speaker."

So that the Speaker has acted upon the complaint made by the hon. the Secretary of State, and that complaint consists simply of the fact that those gentlemen have used expressions at public meetings which he considers to be offensive to himself and to his dignity. He may be right or he may be wrong, but how can we come to a conclusion without discussing it and seeing whether the language which those gentlemen used ought to justify the Speaker in acting as he did. The matter must be discussed in this House or else we must vote blindly on the complaint made by the Secretary of State. There are two points before the House. One, the power of the Speaker under any circumstances to dismiss, and that is a purely legal proposition—the other is assuming he has the power—and the Secretary of State goes entirely on that supposition—whether he has exercised it properly. My hon. friend is at present engaged in a discussion of that question and he is showing that some associates in the Government, or, I believe, in this House, with whom the Secretary of State is at present in the most cordial relations, have used the same language towards him, the same language which is given as a reason for the dismissal of those men; and the Secretary of State is not obliged to cut in the corridors men who used similar language towards him as those men who have been dismissed. We have the statement of those facts before us and those complaints which have been made. The Speaker has acted on those complaints and has taken action because of language which my hon. friend is proving was used by other members of this House towards the Secretary of State. I think the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) is in order and is treating on a matter germane to the subject.

Mr. THOMPSON. It is quite true, as my hon. friend has said, that the whole record is on the Table of the House, of the complaints, charges and the language which has been made the subject of the resolution. But the question is not what appears in the Votes and Proceedings of this House, but what is contained in the resolution which the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition has thought proper to invite the attention of the House to. This resolution is not a resolution containing the two propositions: first, that the Speaker has no authority, and secondly, if he has authority it is not a proper case for its exercise. Let me call the attention of the House to what this resolution is:

"That while professing great respect for the view which Mr. Speaker has taken of his authority in the premises, this House emphatically records its opinion that the publishing and translating of the debates, and of everything connected therewith, belong exclusively to the House itself, and that the same is to be exclusively exercised, with the sanction of the House in every instance, through the said committee; and that under the circumstances the action of Mr. Speaker is an invasion of the undoubted rights and privileges of this House, and is therefore not binding."

Now I submit that while it is true, as the hon. member has said, that on those documents another resolution might have been propounded which would, therefore, have opened up a very much wider discussion, the one point which the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) has invited us to consider, is whether the Speaker had authority or not.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Let me just say this, I intend to close my speech with an amendment.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes, and I will read it to you:

And that in the opinion of this House the language used was not more violent than that used by the other translators.

I am going on to show that I have a right to move that amendment, and to show it is true.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not think the hon. gentleman has a right to move that amendment, but when the amendment is brought before the House we will discuss that. The point of order was raised by myself. The question is: Are these men employees in the service of this House in such a degree as to be under the supervision of the Speaker, and whether the Speaker has the authority to dismiss those men as being employees of this House? The hon. gentleman endeavored to show that these men were justified—while being employees and being servants of this House, because other people, who are not servants of this House, but who are members of this House, and other persons connected with the press, who are not servants of this House, have used violent language against the same individual as those employees of the House did. The two cases are not parallel at all, and the argument is not relevant. It may be true that a member of this Parliament has used strong language against another member of this Parliament, but that must be between themselves. It may be true that a newspaper has maligned, or at all events attacked, any member of this House, or the whole House; but that is another question. The simple question here is this: Whether these persons, being employees, are subject to the supervision of the Speaker, and, if so, had the Speaker authority to dismiss them? The fact that other people not under this authority possibly used violent language, is no justification for those servants of the House using such language. You, Sir, were quite correct, in my opinion, and you would have been wanting in your duty if you did not stop the hon. gentleman in the line of argument that he told us he was going to pursue.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I think this much is quite clear, that the remarks made by my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) were directly invited by the language used by the hon. the Secretary of State; and it has always been our custom here when an hon. gentleman opens up a subject, as the Secretary of State did, to allow the gentleman who replies to him equal latitude. If there is any offender in the matter I submit that the Secretary of State was the original offender, and not my hon. friend. Now, Sir, it is perfectly well known to everybody in this House that this debate having commenced, the language used by the other translators in the press is perfectly sure to be introduced. Everyone knows that that will be the case, and the hon. the First Minister knows it very well.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is a different point.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I speak of the practice and not of the strict rule, and I say it will be utterly impossible to keep that question out of the debate, and therefore it appears to me that there is very little use in spending the time of this House on a point of this kind, especially when, as I say, it was a gentleman on the other side first provoked this discussion, because he undoubtedly did make use of reflections upon those translators. Among other things the Secretary of State asked us "if an employee in his department who did his work well for seven or eight hours was after that time to meet him in common society and insult him, would he be obliged to put up with it?" He has brought the whole question into the arena himself, and that led to the language of my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills).

Mr. EDGAR. The point of order was not raised under the motion of the hon. the leader of the Opposition. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has stated in his place in the House that before he sat down he intended to move an amendment which opened up the merits of the question. I submit you cannot ignore the statement of the hon. member, that he proposed to put himself fully and thoroughly in order before he closed his speech which is going on still; for this is merely an intervening discussion. I am not proposing to argue technically how far he can go on the original motion, but when the hon. member stands up in this House and says he proposes to move an amendment that will put him in order, it is the practice of Parliament to accept that statement, and when he goes further and tells the House and the Speaker absolutely the language of that motion which he proposed to move in amendment, I think that ought to settle the question.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman ought to remember that you, Mr. Speaker, called the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) to order, because he proposed to quote language used by members of Parliament against other members of Parliament. The hon. gentleman was about to quote the language of one member of this House against other members of this House, and the fact that the hon. gentleman has made a motion with reference to the other translators has no reference to the line of argument of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. First Minister did not, I think, follow very closely what I was saying. The hon. Secretary of State declared that these men were blackguards, and he gave his reasons for saying so. I say that the language which has made these men unfit to be in the corridors of this House was matched by language equally violent used against the Government by hon. members of this House whom the hon. gentleman did not dare to characterise as blackguards, and whom he every day meets on grounds of friendship.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I have no reason to change the opinion which I formerly expressed. The issue before the House is a very restricted one, which by no means opens up the whole question that might have been opened up on the information before the House. But I conceived, and I think properly conceived, that it was not the intention of the mover to open up every question that might be opened up, for he stated in the most distinct words, if I rightly understood him, although I was not at the moment in the Chair, that his intention was to confine his remarks strictly to the bald question which was before the House. My attention was not called to any aspect of the debate that might have been questioned; but I will simply say that unless it is the wish of the hon. members to open up this broad question in its every aspect, I think they would do well to sustain the Chair in endeavoring to restrict it as nearly as possible to the lines laid down by the observations of the mover of the resolution and also by the exact phraseology of the resolution.

Mr. LAURIER. While bowing to your ruling, I wish to make this one remark. In opening this discussion I endeavored to avoid everything in the shape of crimination. I wished to confine it to the question of the authority of the Speaker, and nothing else. No one can pretend that the Secretary of State confined himself to that question, because he went on to say that the Speaker was right, that he wanted to vindicate his character, and so forth.

Mr. IVES. I rise to a point of order. This is a discussion of the Speaker's ruling, and is clearly out of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. LAURIER. Under such circumstances I presume that the range of the question was enlarged by the hon. Secretary of State. But I bow to your ruling.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The hon. gentleman forgets one thing. I said that I was the complainant, and I said I was bound to make the complaint for such and such reasons. I quite admit that I went outside of the argument, but I said that due consideration must be given to the person who made the complaint. I said I would not discuss the merits of the decision, but I stated in ending my remarks that the Speaker having the right of discipline of his officers, had rightly done what he had done. I admit that I was not within the argument in saying that, and if I had been called to order I would have said that I only made the remark because I was the complainant in this case.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). When the hon. gentleman addressed the House, and he did it without any interruption from the Chair, he said that the language used by these translators was calumnious language, such as no member of this House had a right to be subjected to—language which he would have been quite ready to resent if it had been used against any other member as against the hon. gentleman himself. That was the rule laid down by the hon. gentleman. I undertook to show that the Speaker was not the proper party to deal with these officers, that they did not fall within the class of officers placed under the control of the Speaker by the statute, and further, that if the House thought the conduct of these officers was improper and such as ought to be taken notice of, the House itself ought to lay down some rule which should apply not merely to these parties, but to all other offenders equally as to them. Now, Sir, I have already informed you that I intended to make a motion, and I shall do that, because it is of the first consequence that neither the Secretary of State nor any other hon. gentleman on that side, simply because they are in a majority, should single out those who are personally offensive to them, and pass by those who have been equally offensive to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. Sir, the hon. gentleman knows that these parties are under the law of the land; they are entitled to the protection of the law; and the hon. Secretary of State has called upon the Speaker, and the Speaker, in my judgment, has improperly yielded to the importunities of the Secretary of State, and subjected these parties to punishment which their colleagues on the translating staff have not been subjected to, although equally offenders with themselves. It is perfectly obvious to every one who has observed the discussions in the press that all those engaged as translators arrayed themselves for a time against the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches. Those who belong to the party of the hon. gentlemen and whose offence consisted merely of a temporary aberration from the support of the Government are passed by and are retained in the service; and although they have violently attacked in the press hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, and subjected them to unfair criticism, they are nevertheless retained in the public service, while those honestly opposed to hon. gentlemen opposite are singled out for vengeance. It is quite enough for the hon. Secretary of State and the hon. gentlemen who sit on the Treasury benches to use the power they possess for the purpose of punishing those in their immediate service whom they control; but I submit that they have no right to come into this House and subject the officers of this House, who are as much officers of hon. gentlemen in Opposition as they are of those who sit on the Treasury benches, to punishment because they are not political allies of these hon. gentlemen. If these men had calumniated or vilified any hon. gentleman who sits on this side of the House, their conduct would not only have been condoned, but in all probability they would have been rewarded. We have a right to think that, Sir, because when a gentleman who was sworn to discharge his duties honestly, neglected his oath of office and failed to gazette those who were returned to Parliament in accordance with the law, he was promoted and rewarded for his infamy with an addition to his salary, while those men who are honest in their convictions are singled out by the Secretary of State for his vengeance and the vengeance of the Government. Now, Sir, when I look at what some of these gentlemen have said in the public press who are still retained in the public service, I can see that subsequent repentance goes a long way with the Secretary of State and the Minister of Militia. One of these translators that are retained has said:

"It is a contest with Orangeism which we must undertake, and it behooves us to find the means of defeating this, the lowest of all clans."

Another has said:

"The Orange monster did not want to miss the mark this time. Like the serpent which crawls in the shade, it has hidden itself under the guise of justice to ensure the attainment of its purpose."

The same person says at a later period:

"A. P. Caron, the Queen's—
I shall not fill the blank."

"and a Canadian renegade, Sir John, the accursed traitor to his friends and faithful to the Orangemen, Chapleau the public thief, brother to the hangman who hanged Riel."

Now, these are the expressions used by the organs of these gentlemen, who the hon. gentleman thinks, are fit associates, who, he thinks, may be retained in the public service, while those gentlemen who have written and spoken courteously are dismissed from the public service because they belonged to this side of the House. Does the hon. gentleman suppose for one moment that he can make anyone believe that he is actuated by those high considerations of public justice which he has been mentioned in his speech? Does he suppose that anyone will believe he wishes to act fairly with regard to the officers of this House, when he retained those who used these expressions and dismissed those who used expressions much more courteous, much less violent than those I have read to the House? The hon. gentleman, as I have said, think it is beneath the dignity of the House to retain such parties in the service; he considers it beneath his dignity to permit them to be retained, if it is possible to secure their removal. If that be his opinion, why does he not extend the proposition for punishment a little further? Why does he retain the other five, after he has dismissed those three, or ask the Speaker to do so, illegally and improperly? Does the hon. gentleman suppose such conduct can be misunderstood? Sir, I am ready, at any moment, to say that those who are engaged in the permanent service of the House shall cease to be connected with the political parties on one side or the other, but I deny altogether the right of the hon. gentleman to decide that no Reformer shall be a translator, but that every Conservative, no matter how vile and abusive, no matter how calumnious he may be in his expressions, shall be retained in the service. Against such a proposition I enter my protest, and when the hon. gentleman comes down with a motion to put the translators on a proper footing in this respect, I will be prepared to support it; but I am not prepared to allow the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches to single out those of one political party and subject them to persecution and punishment, while those of the other political party are allowed to go free. I have said that, in my opinion, the hon. gentleman has applied to the wrong party for the punishment of these gentlemen. The statute, which the leader of the Opposition read, refers to two classes of officers which the Speaker controls. Those translators are officers outside of that statute altogether. They are officers appointed for a special purpose, and placed, not under the control of the Speaker or of the Crown, but under the control of this House, and if the hon. gentleman had any complaint to make against them, that complaint should have been made in this House, and a motion should have been made for the removal of those officers.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. No.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I say yes. The whole policy of their appointment, the resolution with regard to them, everything shows they are not under the control of the Speaker, and were not intended to be under his control. That being the case, I am prepared to support the motion of the hon. leader of the Opposition, but I would in addition move in amendment that the following words be added:

"And that, even if Mr. Speaker had jurisdiction in this matter, his action was not warranted by the circumstances of the case, and that, in the opinion of this House, the language used by these translators was not more violent than that used by other translators who have not been dismissed."

Mr. IVES. It would seem to me that the motion of the hon. gentleman, who has just resumed his seat, is in the nature of a motion of want of confidence in the hon. gentleman who moved the original motion. The hon. the leader of the Opposition preferred, and, I think, wisely preferred, that the discussion should be restrained within the limits of the legal question as to the jurisdiction of the Speaker. The hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition evidently had carefully read the report which has been laid upon the Table of the House, and he thought, no doubt, so far as the French translators are concerned, that discretion would be the better part of valor, and that it was not wise to invite a general discussion. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has thought better of it, and has opened up the whole question. I do not propose, however, to refer at any very great length to the facts of this case, as they are sufficiently disclosed by the report which has been printed and is in the hands of all hon. members. I shall, however, make a slight reference to the conduct of one of those gentlemen, namely, Mr. Rémi Tremblay. I propose for a few moments to direct your attention to the law and to a few precedents which we find in the journals on this subject. The hon. gentleman from Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) read the statute which the Speaker took as his warranty for his action in this matter, and it seems to me that the words of the statute plainly cover the case. They are as follows:—

"If any complaint or representation is at any time made to the Speaker for the time being of the misconduct or unfitness of any clerk, officer or messenger, or other person, attendant of the House of Commons, the Speaker may cause an enquiry to be made into the conduct or fitness of such person; and if thereupon it appears to the Speaker such person has been guilty of misconduct or is unfit to hold his situation, the Speaker may, if such clerk, officer, messenger or other person has been appointed by the Crown, suspend him and report such suspension to the Governor General, and if he has not been appointed by the Crown, the Speaker may suspend or remove such person."

I ask you, how could language be more general than that: "Any clerk, officer or messenger or other person attendant on the House of Commons." One would certainly presume that if there had been any intention to make a distinction between officers appointed by the Speaker and officers appointed by the Crown and officers appointed by the Committee of the House, that distinction would have been expressed in the statute. I find that Mr. Bourinot, the able and learned clerk of this House, had evidently formed the opinion that this clause in the statute, 31 Vic., cap. 27, sec. 9, applied to a case like this. Because, in the valuable work upon "Parliamentary Procedure and Practice," at page 174 we find this:

"Under the Act providing for the internal economy of the House, the Speaker may, after enquiry, suspend or remove any clerk, officer or messenger who has not been appointed by the Crown; but, in the case of an officer so appointed, he may suspend him and report the fact to the Governor General."

Then we find a note referring us to 31 Vic., chap. 27, sec. 9, which is the very article of the Revised Statutes which I have read. Then, on page 193, continuing the same subject, Mr. Bourinot gives us a case which occurred in 1873, where the Speaker dismissed an officer of the House, Mr. Elie Tassé.

"In 1873, Mr. Elie Tassé, one of the translators in the service of the House—"

Precisely the same sort of officer as the three gentlemen whose cases are now being discussed.

"was brought to the Bar and examined as to his connection with an article in the Courier d'Outaouais, reflecting on certain members. He admitted he was the writer, and subsequently the Speaker informed the House that Mr. Tassé was dismissed."

Mr. LAURIER. He was appointed by the Speaker himself.

Mr. IVES. He was not appointed by the Speaker. This was in 1873.

Mr. LAURIER. He was appointed by the Speaker.

Mr. IVES. He was appointed by the Speaker of that date.

"In the same Session the House resolved that an article in the St. John Freeman, of which Mr. Anglin, a member, was editor, was a libel on the House and certain members thereof; but no ulterior proceedings were taken as in the O'Connell case of 1838."

Now, on turning to the Journals of 1873, I find that Mr. Tassé, a translator, was called before the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. A translator?

Mr. IVES. Yes, precisely the same office as this, and, on the notion of the Hon. Mr. Dorion, of Napierville, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Holton, it was "Ordered, that paragraphs 9 and 11 of an article in the newspaper Courrier d'Outaouais, published at Ottawa, on the 4th day of April instant, and headed 'La masque est levé,' be now read by the clerk of the House; and the said paragraphs were read, as follow."

And reference is made to a Mr. Tremblay, who was a member of the House, and Mr. Prévost, who was also a member of the House, and, on the motion of the Hon. Mr. Dorion, seconded by Mr. Mackenzie, it was:

"Ordered, that the Sergeant-at-Arms having reported that Elie Tassé, of the city of Ottawa, was not to be found within the precincts of the House, Mr. Speaker do issue his warrant, summoning the said Elie Tassé to appear at the Bar of this House at half-past seven o'clock p.m. this day."

"The Order of the House of this day for the attendance at the Bar of this House of Elie Tassé being read, the Sergeant-at-Arms reported that, in obedience to the Order of the House, Mr. Tassé was in attendance."

Mr. Tassé was then examined. He said he was not the proprietor of the newspaper, but he admitted that he was the responsible editor, although he did not admit that he wrote those articles, and as a matter of fact I believe he did not write them, but the fact was proved that he was the responsible editor of the paper. Mr. Tassé was then directed to withdraw. Now, in this case you have a translator, precisely the same officer as those whose case we are considering, performing the same functions to the House in 1873 that these gentlemen performed to the House in 1887, called before the Bar of the House, brought within the jurisdiction of the House, the House itself establishing the fact upon which the Speaker and not the House subsequently acted, and yet, having this translator before them who was performing exactly the same duties and occupying the same position that these men did, the House did not dismiss this man, but simply established the fact, and the Speaker dismissed him. Now, I find, in the 2nd volume of the Hansard of 1878, that a discussion occurred in Committee of Supply on the item Miscellaneous Printing, where it was stated that a certain extra clerk in the employment of the House had been guilty of writing an article abusing a member of the House. Several gentlemen spoke with reference to the matter, Mr. Mackenzie said:

"That the Committee (that is the Internal Economy Committee) had nothing to do with the employment of these persons, except to fill up any vacancies that might occur. This was entirely under the control of Mr. Speaker and the clerk of the House. He understood that the Auditor went over all the items of payment."

And Mr. Cartwright said:

"That a sessional clerk had, over his own signature, reflected in a letter on a member of the House, and he was informed that the moment that this fact was brought under the notice of Mr. Speaker, he at once dismissed the offending official."

Mr. McDougall of South Renfrew said he thought this was an extremely proper course to take under such circumstances. I find also that in 1876, and this is rather to the point as to the fitness of these men and the propriety of their dismissal, an engagement was made by the chairman of the Debates Committee with a Mr. DeCelles, who is now one of the joint librarians of the House, and was then one of the editors of a newspaper in the Province of Quebec, and employed him to take charge of the translation of the Debates of the House. Mr. DeCelles came to Ottawa to perform the duties of that office, and to his surprise there was a good deal of disturbance created by the hon. gentlemen who then sat on this side of the House. They thought it was not proper that Mr. DeCelles who was a Bleu should have this office, and the point was raised in the House, and Mr. Young who I think was the chairman of the Debates Committee at that time, said, speaking in answer to Mr. Kirkpatrick:

"I will tell the hon. gentleman. The gentleman in question is an active writer, employed on the staff of a leading French paper, while the feeling existing between political parties in the Province of Quebec is very bitter, and certain members felt that it would not be fair that the translation of the debates of this House should be entrusted to a gentleman who is in such bitter opposition to them. That is the only reason."

That was the only reason why that arrangement was not carried out. As I said in rising, the statute is perfectly general in its terms, and I think the onus of proof would be upon the hon. gentlemen opposite who assert it, when they claim that these translators do not fall within that meaning of the clause of the statute. We find the statute to be general in its terms, we find no provision for the dismissal of these translators or any other translators by the committee. We find that the committee in this case reported they had no authority to act, and we find Mr. Speaker basing his action upon the general and plain terms of the statute, and he acts in accordance with precedents which you find in the Journals of the House, in accordance with the uniform line of precedents; and therefore I say that so far as the legal position is concerned, the motion of the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition cannot prevail. The Speaker clearly acted within his legal right in taking the course that he did. Now, we come to the other point. The hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition says that a different rule should be applied to translators than that which is applied to other public servants. Well, I cannot see the distinction. These men are paid a salary for the whole time. They are paid, certainly, all they can get in any other walk or avocation of life. They are at the call of the Chairman of the Debates Committee at any time, and if called upon would be obliged to come here and devote their time and service to the country. Their whole time is paid for, and whether it is or not, they certainly do not fall under any other rule in their conduct from that which prevails with regard to other civil servants. Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman says that these men ought to be executed, because other translators had entertained the idea that they had a right to abuse a member of Parliament and to say things that they would not be permitted to say if they were other public servants than translators. Sir, it is no argument in favor of these men because others have done wrong, because others have transgressed decency, propriety and law—it is no reason why the Speaker should be condemned for having acted on this statute when he was satisfied that these men had transgressed decency, propriety and law. Why, Sir, if others have done it, they have not been complained of; and the Speaker, under this section of the Act, is not authorised to act except complaint is made. I might fairly add, if this section of the statute referred only to appointees of the Speaker himself, why should it require that in all cases a representation should be made to him by some other person. If the Speaker knows that a civil servant has been guilty of misconduct, surely he might dismiss him without any complaint of any one, but the general terms of the statute, and the fact that representation has to be made in order to bring about an inquiry, establish conclusively, to my mind, that it covers the case of these translators. But hon. gentlemen say that the other five translators have been just as guilty as these three. Have hon. gentlemen opposite taken the responsibility of making any complaint against anyone of these other five? Have they any right to say, until they do so, that the Speaker would not act impartially with reference to any complaint that might be made? Have they any right to say that the Secretary of State, or any other gentleman on this side of the House, who has a responsibility in such matters, would urge the House to take any action upon the question of the Speaker's conduct in this matter, in any other sense from that which they have taken in this case?

Until a complaint is made, until a representation is made, until the matter is called to the attention of the Speaker, until the Speaker is called upon to act, or until hon. gentlemen on this side refuse to sustain the Speaker because he proposes to dismiss a Conservative translator, the arguments of the hon. gentleman have no weight. The hon. gentleman, who last spoke, had a great deal to say about the other translators having been guilty of the same offence, and how did the hon. gentleman prove it? He proved it, not by reading anything that these other translators had written or had said, not by stating anything that these other translators had written or said, but by reading, or he was supposed to read, from La Presse, with which not one single translator in the House, so far as I know, had any connection. La Presse was not a Government organ, was not the organ of the Secretary of State, but it was most violent in its abuse of the Government, also was Le Monde. If the other translators had written the articles of which the hon. gentleman read extracts, that might be a reason why we should be found fault with on this side of the House for not representing their case to the Speaker, because certainly if they were the authors of articles such as that from which extracts were read, they would deserve dismissal. I say there is nothing in the statement of the hon. gentleman, there is nothing in the context of what he read that would lead us to suppose that the translators who are mentioned in this motion, had anything to do with these articles from which he read extracts. Now, the principle is perfectly clear, so far as ordinary civil servants are concerned. I myself, have heard on the floor of this House, an agreement between the leader on this side and the leader on that side, that civil servants deserve dismissal if they took an active part in political discussion; I heard it agreed between Mr. Blake and the right hon. gentleman who leads the House, not more than two or three years ago, I think immediately after the last general election, that all civil servants had a perfect right to vote for either party, or either candidate, freely and without being interfered with, but when they went further than that, when they took it upon themselves actually to canvass, actively to assist in furthering the election of one candidate against another, they were endangering their position, and that if the Government saw fit to dismiss them they would be perfectly justified in doing so. That was Mr. Blake's statement of his view of the position of civil servants, and in that view the leader of the Government concurred. Now, Mr. Speaker, these translators, at least so far as Rémi Tremblay is concerned, went much further than that. In the contest in Richmond and Wolfe, Mr. Rémi Tremblay was one of the delegates to the original convention to choose a candidate to oppose me, and for weeks, and I may say with safety for months, before the polling day, he was actively engaged, not only in his own municipality, but in various parts of the county, holding and addressing meetings, canvassing, and using his influence in organizing an opposition. Why, only to give you an idea of how far his interference in the election went, I may say, that on one occasion, shortly before polling day, he called a meeting at a certain place; I went there with a local member and another friend, thinking that I was going to have the meeting to myself, that I was going to have an opportunity of addressing my friends and my constituents generally; but I found Rémi Tremblay there. He was alone, but Rémi Tremblay was fully equal to the occasion. He presented himself as the representative of my opponent, and he claimed not only the right to speak at my meeting, but to occupy as much time as I and my two friends occupied, he to speak turn and turn about with the three speakers on my side. It so happened that the particular parish where we were at the time was more or less benighted, more or less devoted to the politics of hon. gentlemen opposite, and I thought it wise to concede the point to the translator of the House, Rémi Tremblay. The result was that I was allowed fifteen minutes, Rémi Tremblay took fifteen minutes, the local member was allowed fifteen minutes, and Rémi Tremblay followed in another fifteen minutes; then my other friend spoke, and Rémi Tremblay spoke again, and as a matter of great favor to me I was allowed five minutes to close my own meeting.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Did you object to the arrangement then?

Mr. IVES. I can only say I had the pleasure of hearing Rémi Tremblay in these three speeches, and I have moderately stated his language in the complaint I have placed in the hands of Mr. Speaker. There was one thing that particularly struck me upon that occasion in what Rémi Tremblay said. He told the people that Sir Hector Langevin, Hon. Mr. Chapleau and Sir Adolphe Caron were traitors, that they had sold their compatriots, that they had abandoned their religion, and that they had deserted their countrymen for the sake of the salaries they derived as Ministers of the Crown. He said: "Now, look at me; I am a translator, I am employed by this Government, and I will be dismissed for the action I am now taking; but, so warmly do I feel upon this Riel question, so anxious am I to prevent Orangemen from controlling this country, that I am throwing away my position, my bread and butter—and he told us how many children he had and how dependent they were upon him—and it is only my patriotism which impels me to take this course." I thought it was too bad to deprive Rémi Tremblay of the goal to which he had aspired, and if he has aspired to the honors of martyrdom he ought to have them, and I may say I told him I would complain to the Speaker. I think I was justified in taking that course. Rémi Tremblay was an elector in the county; he had a perfect right to vote, and I would not have found any fault if he had made lots of Rouges, in fact he did so—he is a good electioneer and is not to be despised as an opponent: he did well and made me lots of trouble. I would not have found fault if he had confined himself to his own parish, but he held meetings throughout the constituency and took a prominent part and used the language to which I have referred, and I thought I was justified in complaining. If any of the other translators have transgressed, the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Casey), who seems to be somewhat excited at the present moment, has only to make complaint, and I believe the Speaker, as the judicial officer of this House, will act fairly and justly in the matter. I have no doubt he would, but it is not proper that we should condemn the Speaker for acting under the plain words of the statute on a case that came within those terms, on the ground that other people have offended in the same direction.

Mr. MULOCK. I think it is to be deplored that in a case like this, where one of the prosecutors is the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives), he should have so little regard for the proprieties of this House as to endeavor to clinch the judgment which he says he has secured against a person who is absent from this House. I think the circumstances ought to have suggested to the hon. member that at all events he should have pursued the dignified course of being neutral, and have allowed the House to exercise its own independent judgment. Instead of doing so he comes forward to-day as a witness making allegations of fact, I will not say controvertible or not, but making allegations for the purpose of prejudicing the case or justifying what has been done, claiming an opportunity of making ex parte statements to the prejudice of the accused. Is that the generous, the just, the honorable, the gentlemanly course that ought to characterise any hon. gentleman in this House? The hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) says that the leader of the Government and the leader of the Opposition at one time laid down a policy on this question, that they came to an agreement across the floor that all civil servants who took part in elections did so at the peril of dismissal, and I think he went further—I am not going to say he did if he did not—and said they would earn for themselves dismissal. I think if the leader of the Opposition admitted such a proposition during the last three years, it was the duty of the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe to have read the identical words of the leader of the Opposition before he made a statement of that kind. However that may be, my own impression about the position of the civil servant is this: I do not approve of a civil servant taking an active part in politics. I do not approve of the language used in this particular case, such language as I see in the record in the Votes and Proceedings—I do not think any reasonable person will approve of that course, but I hold that there is a great difference to be drawn between the case of a civil servant whose whole time is given to the Government and that of a person employed temporarily who receives only a partial remuneration, not sufficient to enable him to live except by making exertions outside. When owing to the limited employment obtained here a person is compelled to seek employment outside, you thereby relegate him to the full status of an ordinary citizen, untrammelled by his temporary or partial employment in this House. I do not propose at this moment to take up the point of law, but to touch on a point referred to by the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives). He says in his complaint against Rémi Tremblay—and all my remarks will apply to Rémi Tremblay—that his employment in this House is distasteful to the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe. When did the hon. gentleman come to that conclusion? If I take the evidence supplied by himself I come to the conclusion that it was on 30th May, 1887. The acts complained of took place at the general election in 1887. They were all over on 22nd February, 1887, and for three months, from 22nd February to 30th May, there was not one word of complaint by the hon. gentleman. During the last days of the Session he made complaint, then too late to have the matter laid before the House, to the Speaker privately, and he made complaint at such a late date that any man would assume that if during the three months the hon. gentleman was not offended it was rather late on 30th May to find out and state for the first time that his royal highness has been offended by what took place some months before. What is the hon. gentleman's position? His colleague in the Local House is Mr. Picard. I hold in my hand a letter written by Mr. Picard in which he asks Mr. Tremblay to take the very course he did take, in which he asked him to aid by voice, vote and conduct, public and private, to turn out the present Ministry and all their supporters. Mr. Picard, by this document which I hold in my hand, a public document—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read it.

Mr. MULOCK. I have not time to read it; but the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe must have known as a public man that Mr. Picard not only invited but declared before Heaven that it was the duty of Rémi Tremblay to take the course he did, and he aided and abetted in the election of Mr. Picard, and Mr. Picard aided and abetted in the election of the member for Richmond and Wolfe. The hon. gentleman is certainly of a very forgiving and christian character. He was indignant at first. After the battle was over and the possible contestation in the court was over he became very fierce, he found he had been insulted some months before and he suddenly changed his views. His principles changed, and if I might paraphrase

"A merciful Providence fashioned him holler,
On purpose he might his principles swaller,"

Mr. Picard speaking to those who were getting up a meeting at Weedon to offer up prayers for the repose of the soul of Louis Riel, says:

"I would have been truly happy to find myself with you and particularly on that day to express my opinion before the people of Weedon who always supported me so loyally, and to show them once more that their representative in the Local House does not fear to blame his leaders when they do wrong, and to even repudiate them when they commit too serious faults. I consider, gentlemen, that the crime of the execution of Louis Riel should be interpreted by all true French Canadians as being an outrage and a humiliation thrown in their face by the Government of Sir John. It is for this reason that the whole of the French Canadian people should rise as one man in a union of heart and action to prove by means of the press and public demonstrations that they resented the injury and the outrage done them by the execution of Riel."

Mr. IVES. Let me ask if that letter was addressed to Tremblay, and if it is in French or in English?

Mr. MULOCK. This letter is in English, it is a translation by Mr. Picard to the electors of Richmond and Wolfe.

Mr. IVES. I understood you to say it is addressed to Rémi Tremblay.

Mr. MULOCK. It is addressed to Rémi Tremblay, but does not the hon. gentleman understand that he is one of the French Canadian people? Is the hon. gentleman so obtuse that he does not understand the status of the French Canadian people, he who is offended by Rémi Tremblay opposing him and who endorses the action of Picard and invites him to promote his election. I say under those circumstances, no man in his senses would have attached any importance whatever to the utterances of any person who would say that the conduct of Mr. Tremblay was offensive to him and his presence in this House distasteful. I will not discuss the question any longer than simply to make those observations. With reference to the legal point, I have no right to touch upon it. If this matter had been stated candidly and impartially, if the member for Richmond and Wolfe had stated: I endorsed Mr. Tremblay's action at one time, now I go back on it, then he would have made a full and candid statement. He did not do so and now he takes the opportunity of an unmanly manner by asking for the dismissal of a man whose conduct he previously endorsed.

It being six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

DISMISSAL OF FRENCH TRANSLATORS.

House resumed the debate on proposed motion of Mr. Laurier.

Mr. MULOCK. Before recess, I called the attention of the House to the conduct of the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) in order to show that, in my judgment there was no sincerity in his assertion that he felt in any way aggrieved by the conduct of, at least, one of the translators. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will give you the published record which ought to have been known by the hon. member, being a statement of one of the witnesses on whom he relies on this case, namely Mr. Picard, his colleague in the Local Legislature. One of the papers filed by the hon. gentleman with the Speaker, is a statutory declaration by Mr. Picard whom the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe adopts as his witness in this case. The hon. member objects to the utterances of Mr. Tremblay and he takes his place on the platform beside Mr. Picard, he promotes the election of Mr. Picard, and Mr. Picard promotes the election of the present member for Richmond and Wolfe in this House. Now what are the principles of Mr. Picard and those of the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives)? The letter I was quoting before the House rose is as follows:

"To the organisers of the religious and patriotic demonstration at Weedon on the occasion of the requiem services for the repose of the soul of Louis Riel:

"GENTLEMEN,—I regret exceedingly to find myself on account of sickness in the impossibility to be at Weedon to assist at the requiem services which you are having celebrated for the repose of Riel who died a martyr for having loved too much his fellow-countrymen, the Half-breeds of the North-West, and who had labored constitutionally to aid them to obtain the redress of grave injustices which the several Governments at Ottawa since 1884 had allowed to be committed against them."

Those were the views of Mr. Picard, those were the views that the present member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) endorsed, and they were the views expressed by the translator whose conduct is complained of by the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe. The writer goes on to say:

"In any case, if I am not with you in person, tell the friends who sympathise with the cause of Riel (I am sure all the people of Weedon are unanimous) that I will be with them in heart and spirit. I would have been truly happy to find myself with you, and particularly on that day, to express my opinion before the people of Weedon who always supported me so loyally, and to show them once more that their representative in the Local House does not fear to blame his leaders when they do wrong and to even repudiate them when they commit too serious faults. I consider, gentlemen, that the crime of the execution of Louis Riel should be interpreted by all true hearted French Canadians as being an outrage and a humiliation thrown in their face by the Government of Sir John.

Those were the sentiments the present member endorsed when he wanted to get the votes of the people of Richmond and Wolfe. Those were sentiments repudiated by him when he got installed in his seat. The writer goes on to say:

"It is for this reason that the whole French Canadian people should rise as one man in a union of heart and action to prove by means of the press and public demonstration that they resented the injury and the outrage done them by the execution of Riel."

How is this to be done? This invitation points out the way. The present complainant knows about this invitation. It is to be done as follows:

Mr. MULOCK.

"To succeed effectually in this great National movement, let us be energetic, but also, let us be moderate and prudent, and above all, let us be persevering in following the idea which gave birth to this patriotic movement.

"Let Liberals and Conservatives join together to form in a frank and honest manner a great National party."

What for? To secure the defeat of the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe? Yes.

"To overthrow the Government of Sir John Macdonald."

The hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) actually invites to the platform a gentleman to support him whose policy and object in life was to overthrow the Government of Sir John Macdonald.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. A very laudable purpose.

Mr. MULOCK. There are different ways of accomplishing a laudable purpose. In this particular case you will observe the gentleman who was asking the support of another gentleman to defeat the Cabinet, afterwards objected to the principles involved. He goes on to say:

"I conclude by wishing you success and by telling you that if we French Canadians are united, that if we work all together hand in hand, we shall soon rise from the painful position in which we are placed to-day because we shall certainly have to aid us the help and alliance of all good English citizens."

Including of course the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives). No doubt he presented his case in that way.

"Of all those who desire as we do, to see peace, concord and harmony, reign between the divers races which compose this Dominion; the latter are yet numerous enough to make us hope for a decided triumph before long. That is my hope."

These were the sentiments which Mr. Picard endorsed, and they do not appear to be such as to prevent the present complainant taking his place on the platform beside him, and the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives), took advantage of Mr. Picard's influence, vote and support; and yet after the contest is all over this hon. gentleman finds out some months afterwards that his dignity has been offended. Let us take the utterance of the hon. member to-day. Where does he draw a line as to what a person under those circumstances can do? He says he finds no fault with his constituent, Rémi Tremblay, for speaking in his own parish. This gentleman I suppose was a resident of one of the parishes in that riding. He says he would not have been offended if Mr. Tremblay had confined his operations to the parish in which he was a voter, but when he goes beyond that line Mr. Tremblay deserves to be thrown on a heartless world with a position. Will the hon. gentleman explain how it would be perfectly proper and consistent for Mr. Tremblay to use all his influence to obtain a certain result inside of certain geographical boundaries, and not to do it on the other side of the boundaries so as to defeat the election of the present complainant? I fail to see the consistency, and therefore I take it that the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) is not sincere in his complaint.

Mr. IVES. If you are going to take that statement I desire you to quote it correctly. I said that although I did not approve of his taking any part in the election further than voting, yet I would not have taken any action against him if he had confined himself to his own parish.

Mr. MULOCK. That is what I say. It would not have offended the hon. member if Mr. Tremblay had confined himself to one township, but it happened that he went to some other township. Does not that prove want of sincerity on the part of the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives)? Does it not prove that the Speaker, having heard the admission made by the hon. gentleman, should attach no importance to the statement made in the letter of the present member that the presence of Rémi-

Tremblay was distasteful to him by reason of Mr. Tremblay's conduct during the election? I think this discussion has resolved itself into one point. It appears to me that the Government are at the bottom of this transaction. It cannot happen except through the influence of the Government, and it is part and parcel of a certain policy, which I believe is the only settled policy the Administration has, and that is to remove from office by force every man who will not vote for them, to crush all who cannot crush them. We know that the Government's railway policy was fixed until it was changed, but it has been changed a good many times. They have had a fixed policy of loyalty, they were not going to discriminate, but they did; they had a fixed policy in regard to the tariff and were not going to have reciprocity, but last night I understand the First Minister said he had offered unrestricted reciprocity.

Mr. SPROULE. Question.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) is always calling question. I only wish that the great naturalist, Mr. Darwin, had lived long enough to settle his theory about the missing link. I do not intend to go into the policy of the Government except on this one point of dismissals and I see the hand of the Government at the bottom of this, the same as we see the hand of the Government at the bottom of the dismissal of those three Irishmen in Montreal the other day. I am not going to discuss why they were dismissed. Everybody knows why they were dismissed. They had made themselves distasteful not by speaking but by simply exercising their right to vote. Those three Irishmen simply voted against the Government and they were dismissed, and here we have this time dismissed Frenchmen. What are those hon. gentlemen doing now? They were at once declaiming against a war of race and creed but they have adopted a different policy. They are now declaring a war of race and creed against representatives of two of the large elements in this country. I thought that every true Canadian welcomed to Canada a man of any nationality if he became a good citizen and helped to promote the welfare of the country. I thought the shamrock was entitled to a place here in Canada, I thought it was entitled to take root here and grow. I thought that the fleur de lis was entitled to a place in the Canadian nationality, but hon. gentlemen now for some reason and on account of some influences behind appear to have laid down as their policy what I may put in one sentence: "No Irish need apply." No man shall have a position in this Administration unless he bends the knee to Baliol, and unless he submits to be a faithful servant and follower of the Administration here. Now, if that be the policy let it be known, let it be declared, let us know exactly where we stand and let it be a part of their fixed policy, but do not adopt such a sham as is presented in this case by the member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives), declaring that as it happened his super-sensitiveness in spite of his better nature, has compelled him to express four months after the offence, that he has been deeply wounded in his feelings by a person who at that time was a free and independent elector and it must be remembered that the member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) was only a private citizen then, too. Under those circumstances I deplore the action of the Administration, for they are responsible for it and they will be held responsible for it. The member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) I presume, has dug his own grave by this little transaction, the same as the member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) has dug his grave by this arrangement with regard to his own constituents. But whether those gentlemen have dug their own political graves or not the merits of the complaint made by the member for Richmond and Wolfe do not, in my opinion, justify the action of Mr. Speaker. Do not mistake me as for one moment endorsing the utterances of the gentlemen in question. I have read, and I have read with regret some of the extracts from their speeches, but in view of the circumstances prevailing at the time, in view of the inflamed state of the public mind at that time, in view of the action of leading members of this House at that time, and in view of the necessity of forgetting if you can a blot on the history of Canada, of forgetting all those sad circumstances of 1885, it would have been wiser in the public interest and more generous on the part of the strong to the weak that this matter had been allowed to pass by in silence. Being of this opinion, I disapprove of the action of the Speaker, I condemn the Administration for it, and as to the member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) I think he has made a grave mistake, and one which he will regret.

M. LANGELEIER (Montmorency): M. l'Orateur, ceux qui, de ce côté-ci de la Chambre ont parlé avant moi, ont traité la question de privilège qui s'élève en ce moment, et je crois pouvoir dire qu'ils l'ont traitée d'une manière victorieuse et qu'ils ont démontré à la satisfaction de cette Chambre, que l'Orateur avait certainement outrepassé les pouvoirs qui lui sont conférés par les règles de cette Chambre lorsqu'il a démis les messieurs dont nous avons à nous occuper dans le moment.

Je crois que l'honorable secrétaire d'Etat sera le premier à regretter la démarche qu'il a faite dans cette circonstance. Tout le monde sait que depuis plusieurs années, il a pris une part très active aux luttes politiques de ce pays; tout le monde sait, surtout dans la province de Québec, qu'il a parcouru presque tous les comtés et qu'il a porté des coups très forts et qu'il en a reçus de vigoureux à son tour.

Eh bien, M. l'Orateur, je crois que l'honorable Secrétaire d'Etat n'a pas toujours entretenu des sentiments semblables à ceux qu'il a exprimés aujourd'hui; il n'a pas toujours eu l'épiderme aussi sensible qu'il a bien voulu nous le laisser croire dans la présente circonstance. Pour établir ces faits je me permettrai de citer quelques lignes du discours prononcé par l'honorable Secrétaire d'Etat lui-même dans cette Chambre, le 12 avril 1884. Voici ce qu'il disait à propos des injures qu'il recevait:—

Je n'ai jamais espéré l'approbation générale; dans les mêlées aussi nombreuses qu'ardentes dont notre province a été le théâtre, il fallait recevoir autant de coups que l'on en donnait. J'ai eu ma part de blessures mais les seules, qui m'aient fait souffrir sont celles qui venaient de mes propres amis. J'ai eu cette mauvaise fortune d'être attaqué dans mon propre camp; j'ai gémi de cette division et j'en gémissais encore. Mais je le déclare ici, malgré ces attaques, malgré ces légitimes impatiences qu'elles ont soulevées, il ne m'est pas laissé de place pour l'aigreur et le ressentiment. N'ayant jamais agi par passion, je puis parler sans amertume, et c'est avec le désir et l'espoir d'amener ceux qui me combattent à des sentiments plus justes à mon égard que je suis entré plus minutieusement dans les détails de cette politique de chemin de fer dont on s'est servi pour me battre en brèche.

Je crois que si l'honorable Secrétaire d'Etat eût mis en pratique, dans cette circonstance, les principes qu'il a posés en 1884 dans le discours que je viens de citer, il aurait agi beaucoup plus sagement qu'il ne l'a fait.

Je n'ai pas l'intention de traiter la question au point de vue constitutionnel, et je me bornerai à dire quelques mots sur le mérite même de la question. Je prétends que même en admettant que messieurs Tremblay et Poirier auraient pris part aux luttes électorales, qu'ils se seraient occupés de politique, ils n'auraient fait qu'user d'un droit qui leur était reconnu par cette Chambre et par l'honorable Secrétaire d'Etat lui-même, comme j'aurai occasion de le démontrer dans un instant. Mais avant d'en arriver là, je crois qu'il est bon de résumer en quelques mots les accusations qui sont portées contre messieurs Tremblay et Poirier par l'honorable Secrétaire d'Etat et par l'honorable député de Richmond et Wolfe (M. Ives). Elles peuvent se résumer comme suit:—

Que messieurs Tremblay et Poirier, ont fait avec une violence inqualifiable la dernière campagne électorale tant sur les hustings que dans la presse;

Que M. Ernest Tremblay, dans une brochure adressée au Secrétaire d'Etat aurait écrit sur le compte de celui-ci des choses tellement offensantes et calomnieuses qu'il ne saurait ni lui parler, ni le saluer dans la Chambre; et, il ajoute: je suis sincère en disant que sa présence dans l'enceinte de cette Chambre est pour moi une nuisance à laquelle il me semble qu'on n'a pas le droit de soumettre un député.

Voilà les accusations qui sont portées contre les trois messieurs dont nous sommes à faire le procès. Pour bien comprendre cette question, je crois qu'il est important de se rendre compte de quelle façon ces officiers sont nommés. On sait qu'ils sont nommés par un comité spécial de cette Chambre qui est chargé particulièrement de voir à ce que les débats soient fidèlement rapportés et bien traduits. Et pour montrer combien on est jaloux des privilèges accordés à ce comité; pour montrer combien on en comprend l'importance, je citerai quelques-unes des paroles dont s'est servi l'an dernier l'honorable M. Blake, lorsqu'on a voulu faire des changements dans le comité. Voici ce qu'il disait:

Il n'est, je crois, aucun comité où la connaissance parfaite des devoirs du personnel permanent, de la besogne en général, soit plus importante que le comité des Débats; et pour ma part, autant que j'ai droit au choix des membres de ce comité, je soutiens que ceux des membres qui ont agi d'une manière satisfaisante par le passé ne doivent pas être retirés de ce comité.

Eh bien, si on était d'opinion à cette époque qu'il est important de ne pas changer les membres de ce comité, parce que, d'après l'expérience qu'ils ont acquise dans le passé, ils sont plus en position que qui que ce soit de voir à ce que les débats soient rapportés fidèlement et à ce qu'ils soient traduits aussi fidèlement, je crois qu'il est important aussi de ne pas changer, sans des raisons sérieuses, sans des causes graves, les traducteurs des Débats, comme on veut le faire maintenant, j'oserais le dire, pour de simples caprices.

La grande objection que l'on fait, c'est que ces messieurs se seraient occupés de politique. Eh bien! M. l'Orateur, oui ils se sont occupés de politique. Mais comme je l'ai dit il y a un instant, ils avaient le droit de le faire. Et même s'ils n'avaient pas le droit de le faire, ceux qui sont les plus coupables sont ceux qui ont déclaré dans cette Chambre que lorsqu'ils recevaient cette position, les traducteurs des Débats n'étaient pas empêchés de prendre part aux luttes politiques, d'écrire dans les journaux, enfin d'exercer tous les droits qu'ils possèdent comme citoyens. Je me permettrai de citer des extraits des discours qui ont été prononcés alors en Chambre par quelques députés, et notamment par l'honorable Secrétaire d'Etat. En 1884, M. Bergin disait ce qui suit:

"We felt it was not the duty of the committee to inquire into a man's politics, but into his qualifications, and that politics had nothing whatever to do with a man's qualifications as a servant of this House."

L'honorable Secrétaire d'Etat lui-même disait dans le même temps:

"We are not to judge of the political qualifications of the reporters and translators of Hansard. We should not call up any unpleasant reminiscences of the past, when the question is a competent officer of the House. The only questions that we should consider in the choice of reporters and translators for Hansard, are those of knowledge, ability and general qualification."

L'honorable député de Norfolk-Nord (M. Charlton) s'exprimait comme suit, lorsqu'il était question d'augmenter la rémunération accordée aux traducteurs. On donnait pour raison que leur salaire ne devait pas être augmenté, par le fait, qu'en dehors des sessions ils pouvaient s'occuper de journalisme et prendre part aux luttes politiques. Voici les paroles de l'honorable député de Norfolk-Nord (M. Charlton):

"I felt myself that there was no justification for granting an advance to the translators, most of whom are here acting as newspaper correspondents and would be here whether they held translators' situations or not."

Voilà donc quelle était la position prise par plusieurs députés de cette Chambre. Nous avons la déclaration de l'honorable Secrétaire d'Etat lui-même qui dit que lorsqu'on nomme des traducteurs, on ne doit pas rechercher quelles sont leurs opinions politiques, mais qu'on doit tout simplement examiner s'ils sont qualifiés à remplir la position. Or, sur ce point, personne ne contestera les qualifications des trois messieurs dont j'ai mentionné les noms. Personne ne contestera que messieurs Tremblay et Poirier sont des traducteurs modèles, et qu'ils faisaient leur besogne avec une rapidité extraordinaire. Déjà, dans une couple de circonstances depuis le commencement de la session, des députés se sont plaints que la traduction était très arriérée. Eh bien! l'an dernier, il est facile de le voir en comparant les dates, la traduction, se faisait très rapidement et n'était pas en arrière comme elle l'est maintenant. Je fais ces observations pour démontrer que sous le rapport des qualifications, personne n'a accusé ces messieurs, et personne ne les accuse de ne pas avoir rempli fidèlement leur devoir. Le seul reproche qu'on leur fait, c'est de s'être occupés de politique.

J'ai dit que quelques-uns des députés de cette Chambre ont posé le principe que ces traducteurs avaient le droit de prendre part aux luttes politiques et d'exercer leurs droits de citoyens. J'ajouterai que non-seulement les députés de cette Chambre, mais la presse conservatrice, la presse qui est chargée d'un bout de l'année à l'autre de chanter les louanges du gouvernement, s'est chargée d'établir le principe qui, il me semble, devrait guider la majorité de cette Chambre et l'empêcher de commettre l'injustice qu'on va l'appeler à sanctionner.

Si on regarde dans les journaux qu'y voit-on? Prenons par exemple La Minerve du 15 juillet 1884, et l'honorable secrétaire d'Etat (M. Chapleau) qui renie La Presse comme son organe, assurément ne voudra pas renier La Minerve. Voici ce que disait La Minerve à cette date:

"La position de traducteur des Débats n'empêche aucun des membres de ce bureau de se mêler de politique et d'écrire dans les journaux en dehors des sessions."

Le 21 juillet 1886, Le Monde, l'organe de l'honorable ministre des Travaux Publics, disait:

Quant à la question de droit, La Minerve l'a décidée elle-même.

Et Le Monde cite de La Minerve les paroles ci-dessus en les approuvant et en les invoquant même contre un entre-filet glissé dans La Minerve et contraire à cette prétention. Le Monde ajoute:

Nous répétons donc que notre confrère a été induit en erreur sur ce point, ou que des gens mal intentionnés ont profité de l'absence des rédacteurs réguliers du journal pour insérer cette note erronée.

Répondant également à La Minerve, La Presse du 20 juillet 1886 disait:

La Minerve a donc mauvaise grâce de reprocher aux traducteurs des Débats d'exercer un droit qui leur a été reconnu par la Chambre.

Maintenant, M. Vanasse, le rédacteur du Sorelois, si je ne me trompe pas, et qui est aussi un des traducteurs des Débats de cette Chambre écrivait dans son journal, à la date du 20 juillet 1886, ce qui suit:

M. Vanasse repoussa victorieusement les attaques déloyales dont il avait été l'objet. Il expliqua qu'il ne dépendait aucunement du gouvernement, qu'il avait été nommé traducteur par un comité de la Chambre des Communes, composé de libéraux et de conservateurs et que le gouvernement ne pouvait le destituer, n'ayant rien à voir dans le bureau, mais qu'il fallait pour cela un vote de la Chambre des Communes.

On voit par ce que je viens de lire, que ce traducteur, M. Vanasse, s'est chargé de tracer quels étaient les pouvoirs de l'Orateur; il déclare positivement qu'il n'est pas au pouvoir de l'Orateur de démettre les traducteurs, mais que ce privilège n'appartient qu'à la Chambre. Le même journal poursuit:

M. Vanasse a parlé une deuxième fois, puis M. Ernest Tremblay, de Saint-Hyacinthe—pas celui qui a pris part à l'assemblée tenue en cette ville samedi dernier—a porté la parole dans l'intérêt de la cause libérale.

Si nous n'approuvons pas toujours les opinions politiques de M. Tremblay, il est une chose cependant que nous approuvons chez lui et que nous nous faisons un plaisir et un devoir de constater: c'est sa manière courtoise de faire la discussion. Le langage poli dont s'est servi hier M. Tremblay contrastait en effet singulièrement avec les paroles saugrenues, les expressions triviales et grossières du jeune démagogue Lemieux, et l'auditoire a prouvé qu'il savait parfaitement faire la distinction entre un homme bien élevé et un polisson.

Voilà, M. l'Orateur, en quels termes l'un des collègues de M. Tremblay l'apprécie. Voilà en quels termes un journal conservateur, le Sorelois, apprécie M. Tremblay. On voit de suite quelle différence il y a entre l'appréciation donnée par le Sorelois, et la façon dont l'honorable secrétaire d'Etat a traité M. Tremblay aujourd'hui, lorsqu'il s'est servi de l'expression de blackguard devant la Chambre.

Maintenant, M. l'Orateur, s'il faut absolument que les traducteurs qui prennent part aux luttes politiques soient mis à la porte, il ne doit pas y avoir deux poids et deux mesures.

Ce qui est juste pour MM. Tremblay et Poirier doit l'être également pour les autres. Eh bien ! nous constatons que parmi les traducteurs, se trouve un M. Lassalle, et on m'informe que ce monsieur est le secrétaire de l'association conservatrice de Montréal. Ce monsieur a pris la peine de traverser le fleuve et de se rendre dans le comté de Chambly pour faire la lutte contre mon ami, le député actuel de ce comté (M. Préfontaine). Eh bien ! si c'est un grand crime pour MM. Tremblay et Poirier d'être allés faire la lutte contre le député de Richmond et Wolfe et contre l'honorable secrétaire d'Etat, dans Terrebonne, est-ce que le crime n'est pas aussi grand pour M. Lassalle qui est allé faire la lutte dans le comté de Chambly ?

Maintenant M. Vanasse dirige, comme je l'ai dit il y a un instant, le Sorelois. Eh bien ! dans les dernières élections générales il a fait toute la campagne contre le candidat du parti national, M. le Dr Ladouceur.

Passons au cas de M. Beaulieu. Ce monsieur, le chef du bureau des traducteurs, a été pendant plusieurs années, rédacteur de la Minerve. Pendant les dernières élections générales, qu'est-il arrivé ? on avait cherché en vain, dans le comté de Saint-Jean, un candidat qui voulait bien s'immoler sur l'autel de la patrie contre l'honorable M. Marchand, on a finalement trouvé M. Philippe Pelletier, avocat, de Montréal. Eh bien ! M. Beaulieu, pour lui donner un peu de poids, l'a pris en société, afin de pouvoir dire que M. Pelletier avait des intérêts dans la ville de Saint-Jean. Si j'ai mentionné ces faits, ce n'est pas pour faire un reproche à ces messieurs, et prétendre qu'ils n'avaient pas droit de prendre part aux luttes politiques ; au contraire, ils avaient ce droit, lequel a été reconnu par la presse et par la plupart des députés de cette Chambre appartenant aux deux partis politiques. Mais j'arrive au cas de M. Poirier. Le cas de M. Poirier diffère considérablement de celui de MM. Tremblay, qui ont écrit l'un une pièce de poésie, et l'autre une brochure politique. Quant à M. Poirier je ne connais que l'accusation portée contre lui par l'honorable secrétaire d'Etat. Il n'est accusé que d'avoir parlé dans les assemblées politiques et d'avoir insulté l'honorable secrétaire d'Etat.

Eh bien ! devons-nous le juger sans l'entendre ? M. Poirier nie formellement l'accusation qui a été portée contre lui. Il y a d'un côté l'affirmation de l'honorable secrétaire d'Etat,—pour qui j'ai tout le respect possible,—mais d'un autre côté, il y a la dénégation aussi formelle, aussi emphatique de M. Poirier, en qui j'ai également confiance. Voici du reste sa lettre en réponse à l'Orateur de cette Chambre :

Si je croyais vous être agréable, M. l'Orateur, en vous donnant des explications détaillées en réponse à cette lettre, je m'empresserais de vous les donner ; mais à quoi bon ? je relève du comité spécial de la Chambre désigné sous le nom de "Comité des Débats" et je suis en état de démontrer à ce comité—s'il me fait l'honneur de m'appeler devant lui—que je n'ai rien fait qui le justifierait de demander ma destitution à la Chambre.

Voici, toutefois, ce que je puis répondre à l'honorable Secrétaire d'Etat : Je me suis occupé de politique durant la vacance qui s'est écoulée depuis la dernière session, et j'ai pris la parole dans un certain nombre d'assemblées publiques ; mais en faisant cela, j'ai exercé un droit reconnu aux membres de notre bureau par les principaux organes français du gouvernement ; un droit que plusieurs membres de cette Chambre et du Sénat m'ont invité à exercer ; un droit que mes collègues conservateurs du Hansard ont exercé comme moi ; un droit que l'honorable Secrétaire d'Etat lui-même a paru reconnaître jusqu'à ces derniers temps, puisqu'il a attendu jusqu'au 22 mai 1887, pour se plaindre de moi et qu'il n'a pas tenu compte de ma participation aux luttes qui ont précédé la vacance qui s'est écoulée depuis la dernière session.

Comme on le voit, nous sommes en présence d'une affirmation et d'une dénégation. Eh bien ! je le demande, puisque la Chambre se constitue aujourd'hui en tribunal, puisque la Chambre est appelée à juger ce monsieur, va-t-elle le faire sans l'entendre ? Voici M. Poirier qui dit que les accusations portées contre lui sont fausses et mensongères, et il demande à être entendu devant le comité des Débats. Est-ce qu'on peut refuser cet acte de simple justice ? Est-ce qu'il y a un seul député qui oserait rendre son jugement sans entendre la partie intéressée ?

J'ai entendu cet après-midi l'honorable secrétaire d'Etat dire : Il est vrai que je suis sorti de la question constitutionnelle, il est vrai que je suis entré dans le mérite de la question, mais, ajoutait-il, je suis le demandeur. Eh bien ! s'il y a un demandeur, il y a aussi des défendeurs ; s'il y a un accusateur, il y a aussi des accusés. S'il lui est permis de venir sur le parquet de cette Chambre porter des accusations contre ces trois messieurs ; s'il lui est permis de leur dire des injures, comme il l'a fait cet après-midi, il me semble qu'en justice on doit permettre à ces jeunes gens de se défendre ; on doit entendre leur défense en regard des accusations qui sont portées contre eux.

On a fait allusion cet après-midi au cas de M. Elie Tassé. Ce cas n'est pas du tout analogue à celui-ci. D'abord, M. Tassé n'était pas un employé de la Chambre ; il était simplement à l'emploi du gouvernement, et les injures dont on se plaignait et qui ont été publiées dans la Minerve, ont été écrites pendant le cours de la session, c'est-à-dire pendant que M. Tassé était payé pour donner tout son temps aux travaux de la Chambre. M. Tassé a pris sur lui d'écrire dans les journaux et d'insulter certains députés qui étaient ici à remplir leurs devoirs parlementaires. Il est donc bien facile de voir que le cas de M. Tassé n'a absolument rien de semblable à celui qui nous occupe dans le moment.

M. l'Orateur, on a fait beaucoup de bruit à propos de cette brochure de M. Tremblay. Le grand crime de M. Ernest Tremblay, est d'avoir écrit une brochure, qui, paraît-il a extrêmement déplu à l'honorable secrétaire d'Etat. Eh bien ! Quel est celui qui a provoqué cet écrit ? C'est l'honorable secrétaire d'Etat lui-même. On se rappelle qu'à la suite de l'exécution de Riel, une commotion considérable a eu lieu dans la province de Québec ; on se rappelle que tout le monde était passablement excité ; on se souvient qu'un grand nombre de députés qui siègent dans cette Chambre partageaient à cette époque les opinions que nous partageons encore aujourd'hui. On se rappelle que lors de la formation du parti national, il y a des figures que nous voyons aujourd'hui dans cette Chambre et qui ont maintenant abdiqué le parti national qui étaient contre l'exécution de Riel. Mais du moment que Riel a été dépendu, ils se sont trouvés déliés et ils sont revenus au gouvernement.

M. l'Orateur, cette brochure a été écrite tout simplement en réponse à un manifeste de l'honorable Secrétaire d'Etat adressé aux électeurs du comté de Terrebonne, manifeste qui a été publié dans les journaux et qui a été soumis à la discussion. M. Tremblay, exerçant ses droits de citoyen et de journaliste, a pris sur lui de commenter le manifeste de l'honorable Secrétaire d'Etat aux électeurs du comté de Terrebonne. Et si les députés de cette Chambre veulent prendre la peine de parcourir cette brochure, ils constateront qu'elle a été écrite avec beaucoup de loyauté pour l'honorable Secrétaire d'Etat. On y discute certains passages du manifeste de l'honorable ministre, et tous les passages qui sont discutés sont cités ; je crois que je pourrais mettre au défi de trouver dans tout ce qui est tombé de la plume de M. Tremblay, des expressions qui soient injurieuses à l'adresse de l'honorable secrétaire d'Etat. Ce qu'il y a de plus violent dans cette brochure ce sont précisément les écrits des hommes qui aujourd'hui donnent leur appui au gouvernement; ce sont les discours qui ont été prononcés par les hommes qui donnent aujourd'hui leur support au gouvernement. Ce sont, par exemple, les discours prononcés par l'honorable député d'Hochelaga (M. Desjardins) qui a dit dans le comté de Lévis, je crois, que sir John avait commencé sa carrière à la lueur de l'incendie du parlement à Montréal et qu'il allait la finir sur l'échafaud de Régina. Ce sont les paroles et les écrits de l'honorable député de Yamaska (M. Vanasse). C'est la lettre de l'honorable député de Jacques-Cartier (M. Girouard); cette fameuse lettre qu'il a adressée au parti national. Malheureusement, il ne se rappelait pas l'autre jour, dans le comté de L'Assomption, d'avoir écrit cette lettre. Nous avons dû la lui mettre sous le nez pour rafraîchir sa mémoire défectueuse.

Si on me le permet, M. l'Orateur, je citerai quelques passages de cette brochure pour démontrer quel langage on y tient. C'est un langage énergique, mais en même temps, c'est un langage poli et parfaitement parlementaire. Or, si on démontre que ce langage serait admis dans cette Chambre, je ne vois pas comment en dehors de cette Chambre on pourrait s'en plaindre, comment on pourrait dire à M. Tremblay: Vous avez dit des choses épouvantables contre moi, et votre présence dans cette Chambre est devenue intolérable. Voici ce que dit M. Tremblay à la page 5 de sa brochure; ceci est emprunté à un journal conservateur:

Mais ce n'est pas un homme ce Chapleau, disent-ils maintenant, c'est un chacal, c'est une hyène, car il n'y a que ces bêtes fauves qui déterrent les cadavres pour en repaître leur voracité. Voilà les exagérations de langage auxquelles vous avez contraint vos adulateurs; voilà les excès de parole que j'hésite à vous transcrire ici parce que je suis ennemi de toute violence.

On voit que M. Tremblay trouve lui-même que ce langage était un peu exagéré.

Et n'allez pas croire que c'est par un artifice de rhétorique que je vous transmets cette expression des sentiments soulevés contre vous. C'est dans les rangs des vôtres qu'on vous reproche d'avoir recommencé le procès d'un homme qui a subi la peine de la sentence portée contre lui et à qui on ne peut plus demander, selon la formule, s'il a quelque chose à dire avant que la loi ait son cours. Car, dit Monseigneur Taché, dans un écrit qu'il vient de livrer à la publicité, "pourquoi joue-t-on le rôle si inique de recommencer le procès de l'infortuné, exécuté devant le public, en invoquant les témoignages des Révérends Pères André et Fourmond, qui, mis sous serment à la cour, ont rendu un témoignage dont la conclusion naturelle n'était certainement pas l'échafaud? On va jusqu'à torturer l'âme si généreusement aimante de Monseigneur Grandin, en lui prêtant un rôle indigne de sa position et de son cœur. Et tout cela, on a l'audace de le dire, pour faire prévaloir la vérité.

Ce langage est sévère, mais qui en fait usage? C'est Mgr Taché.

A la page 7, M. Tremblay ajoute:

Vous avez remarqué, je l'espère, que ce n'est pas moi qui parle ici, mais que ce sont les sentiments mêmes de vos suivants, maintenant séparés de vous, que je signale à votre appréciation.

Comme on le voit, dans chaque circonstance, M. Tremblay prend la peine de signaler à l'honorable Secrétaire d'Etat que le langage qu'il lui tient,—langage sévère et blessant pour lui—que ce langage n'est pas de lui, mais qu'il vient de bouches qui jadis chantaient ses louanges.

A la page 12, après avoir fait des citations des journaux conservateurs, il dit:

"Ce spécimen des dispositions actuelles de vos amis doit suffire à vous démontrer que les exigences despotiques de l'esprit de parti n'ont plus de prise sur ceux que l'exécution de l'apôtre des revendications mettaient à réveiller de leur ataraxie et qu'ils condamnent la politique générale du gouvernement sans se soucier plus que cela de l'approbation antérieure qu'ils lui ont donnée.

Je vais prendre maintenant la liberté d'examiner votre manifeste point par point et de le soumettre à l'épreuve de mes commentaires. Mais il convient, avant de commencer, de vous rappeler que la pendaison de Riel a été appelée dans tous les assemblées publiques et par la quasi totalité des journaux de notre province, un meurtre politique, un assassinat juridique, un crime horrible de la perpétration duquel le gouvernement de sir John A. Macdonald, tel que composé lors de l'exécution, doit être tenu constitutionnellement responsable. MM. Trudel, Desjardins, Beaubien, Girouard, Vanasse, Armand, Bellerose, Bergeron, tous sénateurs et députés conservateurs, ont été de cet avis et ont déclaré avoir été odieusement trompés par vous et par vos collègues. MM. Amyot, Tarte, Garneau, Faucher de St-Maurice et autres sommités du parti ministériel ont fait des déclarations analogues."

A la page 18 de la même brochure, on lit ce qui suit:

Monsieur Girouard, député conservateur de Jacques-Cartier, a dit: Le gouvernement nous a odieusement trompés.... Je le déclare hautement, je ne veux plus soutenir le gouvernement.

On voit que l'honorable député de Jacques-Cartier (M. Girouard) a changé d'opinion depuis ce temps-là:

..... ce n'est pas parce qu'il est canadien-français que M. Girouard retire sa confiance au ministère; c'est parce que, dans son appréciation, le ministère est un odieux trompeur. L'honorable sénateur Trudel, dont la répugnance pour toute idée de révolte est bien connue, approuve ce qui vient d'être dit. M. Laflamme, ancien ministre de la justice, donne son adhésion à ce mouvement. M. Desjardins, député conservateur d'Hochelaga, dit: Les ministres nous ont tenus dans une déception continuelle. Ce n'est pas des ministres anglais qu'il parle; c'est de vous et de vos deux collègues français dans le cabinet. Et il a terminé en s'écriant: Que la carrière de sir John qui a commencé en 1849, au reflet de l'incendie du parlement à Montréal, aille finir derrière le gibet de Riel!

Voilà les paroles les plus dures qui se trouvent dans cette brochure.

Maintenant, dans une assemblée tenue dans le comté de Lévis, à Bienville, en 1887, M. Tarte, l'écrivain distingué, le rédacteur du Canadien, tenait ce langage:

En 1837, nous avons eu pour nous des Anglais et des Français de France. En restant dans la constitution nous aurons pour nous la majorité des Anglais bien pensants. Nous avons déjà pour nous les Irlandais qui ont aussi le cœur et le sang chauds. Mais nous ne sommes plus avec les tories. Et je vais vous citer des faits incontestables qui nous donnent mille fois raison de nous séparer d'eux. En 1869, sir John, un homme éminent certes, mais aussi fourbe qu'il est éminent, fit venir de Rome Monseigneur Taché, pourquoi? Pour tromper les Métis, au risque de ruiner ce prélat parmi les catholiques. Un autre fait historique est que les Métis sous sir John ont été traités en parias.....

Un autre trait de sir John, c'est sa lettre à son fils, dans laquelle, lui, l'un des conseillers de Sa Majesté la Reine d'Angleterre, il faisait appel aux volontaires de Winnipeg et d'Ontario pour écraser les Canadiens français.

Et quels sont les commentaires que fait M. Tremblay?

Ils le tiennent pour fourbe parce qu'il est fourbe, et c'est cette fourberie et non sa nationalité qui lui mérite ces manifestations hostiles.

Je citerai de plus de cette brochure les paroles de l'honorable député de Montréal-Est (M. Coursol). Les voici:—

Nous avons pris cette résolution, messieurs, parce que l'honneur et la justice nous l'imposent. Nous n'avons pas demandé la commutation de la peine de Riel seulement parce qu'il était français, mais parce qu'il ne méritait pas la mort, parce qu'on n'exécute plus un condamné politique dans aucun pays du monde. Voilà la faute impardonnable de sir John A. Macdonald, la raison qui nous l'a fait abandonner.....

Nous ne cherchons pas une guerre de race; nous ne réclamons qu'une chose: respect à notre race comme elle respecte les autres races; justice égale pour tout le monde sur la terre du Canada..... Ceux qui ont demandé la tête de Riel devront bientôt courber la leur devant l'attitude et la protestation indignée de tout ce qu'il y a d'honorable non-seulement chez les Canadiens-français, mais chez tous les citoyens de la Confédération à quelque origine qu'ils appartiennent.

Je citerai encore les paroles d'un homme dont les principes ne font pas de doute pour personne. C'est l'honorable M. Malhiot, l'ancien leader de la Chambre, à Québec.

J'ai toujours suivi le drapeau conservateur, messieurs; mais aujourd'hui je n'hésite pas à dénoncer les hommes responsables du crime contre lequel nous protestons; je n'hésite pas à m'unir au mouvement qui se fait pour renverser le gouvernement des bourreaux de Riel; c'est ce que nous avons à faire en ce moment; quand nous l'aurons exécuté ce gouvernement, il sera temps de voir quels matériaux devront entrer dans la nouvelle organisation; nous verrons quelles alliances meilleures que celles du passé nous devons faire avec les partis dans la province d'Ontario.

Trop longtemps la province de Québec a servi de marche-pied à ceux que nous avons eus pour alliés dans les autres provinces. Il semble être temps de chercher de nouvelles alliances.

Maintenant on trouve dans le pamphlet incriminé les résolutions qui ont été adoptées au Champ-de-Mars, à une assemblée à laquelle assistaient un grand nombre de députés et de sénateurs conservateurs. La première et la deuxième résolutions se lisent comme suit:

Résolu :

1. Qu'en faisant ainsi exécuter Louis Riel, le 16 novembre courant, le gouvernement de sir John A. Macdonald a commis un acte d'inhumanité et de cruauté indigne d'une nation civilisée, et a mérité la condamnation de tous les amis du droit et de la justice, sans distinction de race ou de religion ;

2. Que le consentement donné par sir Hector Langevin, sir Adolphe P. Caron et l'honorable Joseph A. Chapleau, à cette odieuse exécution, constitue une trahison nationale et mérite spécialement la réprobation de tous les citoyens de cette province ;

Eh bien ! voilà les expressions les plus fortes qu'on trouve dans ce pamphlet. Elles ne sont pas de M. Tremblay, elles sont tombées de la plume de journalistes conservateurs ou de la bouche d'orateurs également conservateurs.

On vient de voir l'opinion exprimée par certains députés de cette Chambre sur cette question. Voyons maintenant ce qu'a dit La Minerve, journal reconnu comme un vieil organe conservateur, le lendemain de l'exécution de Riel :

Si profonde est la répulsion qu'inspire l'idée seule de l'exécution de Riel, que jusqu'au dernier moment, hier, on espérait encore une commutation de la terrible sentence. C'en est fait des espérances de toute une race et de la pureté immaculée de notre blason national.

Il n'a pu s'écouler 20 ans sans que le grand livre de la Confédération canadienne fût maculé d'une tache de sang. C'est avoir perdu bien jeune sa beauté virginale ! Aussi rien d'étonnant que la population soit émue jusqu'à se porter à des manifestations bruyantes même de sa colère.

L'ère des supplications est passée. L'ère des récriminations ne saurait nous convenir ; celle des déterminations inflexibles suivies de résultats pratiques peut seule nous satisfaire. La journée d'hier va fournir les éléments d'une page nouvelle de notre histoire.

Le même journal écrivait, le jour même de l'exécution :

Nous n'apprenons rien en disant qu'il se rendra des comptes à la prochaine session. Et nous le jugerons lui (sir John) comme les autres.

Si c'est, comme nous le croyons, le parti orangiste qui a présidé à l'acte impolitique de ce jour, il y aura un règlement définitif entre ce parti et le nôtre, hormis que l'arrêté de compte date d'aujourd'hui même, ce que nous serions loin de regretter. Si le gouvernement a eu la main forcée par cette coterie maussade qui vit exclusivement de haine, il en subira les conséquences.

Passons maintenant à ce que disait un honorable député de cette Chambre, le député d'Yamaska, M. Vanasse :

Je proteste contre l'exécution de Louis Riel. Je ne veux plus supporter le gouvernement qui ne mérite plus la confiance des hommes bien pensants. Sir John emportera dans la tombe le déshonneur qui s'attache à son nom. Quant à moi, je suis prêt à remettre mon mandat si mes électeurs n'approuvent pas ma conduite.

L'honorable député n'a pas, que je sache, remis son mandat. Il n'a pas été chercher l'approbation de ses électeurs ; mais au contraire, — ses votes sont là pour le constater — il s'est rangé sous l'étendard du gouvernement, et je crois qu'il peut être compté comme un des plus fidèles amis, un des plus vaillants appuis du gouvernement.

Et le Quotidien, journal publié à Lévis ; l'organe, j'oserais dire, de mon honorable ami le député de Lévis (M. Guay), disait :

La voix de l'humanité n'a pas été entendue. Le droit et la force triomphent, c'est vrai ; mais la justice a les mains couvertes de sang.

Et si aujourd'hui nous n'avons plus le motif de sauver la vie de l'infortuné Riel, nous avons celui de venger sa mémoire et de sauver l'intégrité de l'honneur national.

Le Nord, journal publié à St-Jérôme, s'exprimait dans les mêmes termes, et finissait en disant :

Nous dénonçons le gouvernement Macdonald et demandons sa déchéance.

Un autre journal conservateur, l'organe de l'honorable ministre des Travaux Publics, écrivait ce qui suit :

Nous écrivions hier :

C'est pour la Puissance du Canada un jour de deuil que celui où elle voit se dresser un échafaud politique.

Nous aurions pu ajouter que, pour la province de Québec surtout, cette date du 16 novembre était une date funèbre.

En effet, à Montréal, à Québec, dans tous les centres populeux, la nouvelle de l'exécution a été accueillie par une explosion de pitié et de colère. Il est clair que la province de Québec attendait une mesure de clémence. Son attente a été trompée, et voilà pourquoi elle s'agite.

Le Journal de Québec disait à son tour :

Le drame de Régina a posé un problème difficile à résoudre ; mais qui n'est pas au-dessus de la sagesse humaine.

Et cet autre journal, Le Nouvelliste, qui était dans le temps l'organe de l'honorable ministre de la Milice (Sir A. P. Caron), ajoutait ce qui suit :

Mais la rage du tigre orangiste restait inassouvie !

Maintenant elle est satisfaite.

L'élément français et catholique a payé son tribut à la haine des sectaires.

" Ajoutons que le parti conservateur de la province de Québec a reçu la récompense de l'alliance politique qui a permis à cette minorité, méprisée dans sa propre province, de partager avec lui l'honneur du " pouvoir. "

Notre députation a le sentiment du patriotisme et de l'honneur national. Elle a la confiance du peuple. Qu'elle se concerte avec sagesse et agisse avec prudence, et elle peut compter sur l'appui de la Province dans tout ce qu'elle fera pour maintenir son prestige " et lui assurer des alliances " profitables.

" Car il est inutile de se le cacher, l'orangisme qui a toujours été un " élément désorganisateur dans le parti conservateur, a creusé un abîme " entre nous. "

Eh bien ! je crois avoir cité suffisamment d'extraits de cette brochure, pour montrer que le langage incriminé, celui dont on se plaint si amèrement aujourd'hui, n'a pas été tenu par son auteur ; mais qu'au contraire, il n'a fait que citer ou rééditer les paroles des conservateurs, pour les commenter. Je le demande en toute franchise, est-ce que ce n'était pas le droit de M. Tremblay, comme citoyen, de discuter le manifeste de l'honorable secrétaire d'Etat ; manifeste qui était public, puisqu'il avait été publié dans les journaux ? Est-ce que ce n'était pas son droit de l'interpréter à sa manière, et de citer les paroles et les écrits d'hommes qui avant l'exécution de Riel avaient appuyé le gouvernement, et qui depuis sont revenus encore se placer sous son égide paternel ?

Il est un autre point qui devra frapper les députés de cette Chambre. Puisque nous sommes prêts à passer sentence sur ces messieurs ; puisque la majorité est probablement disposée à les expulser sans les entendre, je rappellerai à l'honorable secrétaire d'Etat qu'il manque de justice envers eux. L'honorable secrétaire d'Etat, lorsqu'il est appelé à rendre compte de sa conduite à ses électeurs du comté de Terrebonne, se plaint dans son manifeste de ce qu'on le condamne sans l'entendre. Voici entre autres choses ce qu'il dit :

Autant je respecte le sentiment national qui produit le mouvement actuel, autant je déplore la cause de ce soulèvement, autant je gémis sur les tristes conséquences qui peuvent en résulter. La meilleure preuve que la cause est mauvaise, c'est qu'un esprit d'injustice semble la dominer. On soupçonne, on accuse, on condamne d'anciens et fidèles serviteurs du pays sans les entendre, avant même qu'ils n'aient parlé.

Puisque l'honorable Secrétaire d'Etat se plaignait dans cette circonstance qu'on voulait le condamner sans l'entendre ; puisqu'il trouvait que c'était une injustice ; comment se fait-il qu'aujourd'hui, changeant de front, il vient devant la Chambre, demander qu'on condamne ces trois jeunes gens, qui n'ont pas même l'occasion de se faire entendre ? Il veut les condamner sans qu'ils aient la chance de se faire entendre devant le comité des Débats, ou devant la Chambre. Il devrait, ce me semble, se montrer plus généreux, plus magnanime, et faire l'application du principe dont il réclamait le bénéfice pour lui-même, lorsqu'il était mis en accusation devant ses électeurs.

Maintenant il y a une chose qui est frappante, c'est que cette brochure a été écrite en décembre 1885, et que ce n'est réellement qu'à cette session, en 1888, que ces deux messieurs se sentent insultés. Ceci me rappelle l'histoire d'un Allemand qui avait été au théâtre et qui avait assisté à une comédie très amusante. Au bout de trois semaines, il était à table avec sa femme à dîner, et tout à coup il éclate de rire. Sa femme lui demande ce qu'il a à rire. Il lui répond : Je pense à cette comédie que j'ai entendue il y a trois semaines. C'était si drôle que je ne puis m'empêcher de rire. Ces messieurs sont pires que l'Allemand ; cela leur a pris trois ans avant de découvrir qu'ils avaient été insultés dans leur honneur et de venir se plaindre devant cette Chambre.

M. l'Orateur, il est un fait qu'il est bon de signaler. L'honorable Secrétaire d'Etat et l'honorable député de Richmond et Wolfe (M. Ives) disent : nous avons été insultés comme députés. Je nie cela. A l'époque où cette brochure a été écrite, ils n'étaient pas députés ; ils n'étaient que de simples citoyens qui retournaient devant leurs électeurs pour se faire réélire, et par conséquent, M. Tremblay avait droit de discuter les questions publiques comme le faisaient tous les citoyens, au point de vue de son parti. On ne peut donc invoquer cette raison. Et quand ces messieurs viennent nous dire : nous étions des députés, je réponds : vous n'étiez pas des députés à cette époque-là ; vous n'étiez que des citoyens qui sollicitiez la confiance publique, et vous étiez exposés, comme tous ceux qui recherchent la confiance publique, à voir votre politique critiquée. Et qu'est-ce qu'il y avait de plus juste que de critiquer le programme même de l'honorable Secrétaire d'Etat ?

Maintenant, depuis que la prétendue offense a été commise, il y a eu dissolution du parlement, et il y a eu une session l'année dernière. Cependant, ces messieurs n'avaient pas encore senti qu'ils avaient été insultés. Mais à la session de 1888, probablement parce que de nouveaux aspirants se présentaient et désiraient prendre la place de nos trois amis, ils se sont aperçus qu'ils avaient été profondément blessés dans leur honneur et qu'il fallait jeter ces trois jeunes gens sur le pavé après leur avoir donné l'assurance dans le passé qu'ils pouvaient prendre part aux luttes politiques et écrire dans les journaux sans s'exposer à perdre leur position.

Voilà, M. l'Orateur, l'injustice criante que l'on menace de commettre au préjudice de ces trois personnes. L'honorable secrétaire d'Etat dit : J'ai été insulté dans mon honneur. Eh bien ! s'il a été insulté dans son honneur, deux recours lui étaient ouverts : il pouvait s'adresser aux tribunaux, ou porter sa plainte devant cette Chambre. Mais s'il voulait venir devant cette Chambre, il devait mettre en accusation régulière ces trois jeunes gens afin de leur permettre d'être entendus, et ne pas les condamner sans les entendre. Cependant la Chambre se rappelle que lorsque nous avons demandé la production des papiers concernant cette affaire, sans l'intervention de l'honorable ministre des travaux publics nous n'aurions pas pu les mettre devant la Chambre. Les documents étaient en français et la majorité anglaise de cette Chambre aurait été forcée de juger cette question sans pouvoir s'en rendre compte. C'est grâce à la magnanimité de l'honorable ministre des travaux publics que la majorité dans cette Chambre a été mise en mesure d'apprécier les faits et de pouvoir donner un vote avec connaissance de cause.

Si ces messieurs se sont rendus coupables d'injures aussi graves qu'on le prétend envers l'honorable Secrétaire d'Etat ils sont passibles de dommages-intérêts. Mais j'en appelle à mes honorables amis, qui sont deux avocats distingués, et je leur demande s'ils réclamaient des tribunaux des dommages pour ce qui est contenu dans cette brochure, s'ils recevraient un millier de piastres, le montant du salaire d'une année de ces messieurs ? Certainement non. Ce serait des dommages excessifs. Eh bien ! pourquoi cette Chambre qui est le plus haut tribunal du pays rendrait-elle un jugement qui serait contraire à celui qui serait rendu par les tribunaux du pays auxquels l'honorable Secrétaire d'Etat aurait dû s'adresser ?

Je terminerai ces quelques remarques en citant un article de la Minerve à propos d'une destitution, que l'honorable Secrétaire d'Etat ferait bien de méditer avant de persister davantage à demander la destitution de ces trois messieurs. Voici ce que disait la Minerve à la date du 23 mai 1863. L'article est intitulé " Une destitution est une tache. " Voici comment se lit cet article :—

Et pourtant sous le règne du ministère McDonald-Sicotte toute l'influence de M. Dorion a servi à inaugurer un large système de destitutions iniques, cruelles, révoltantes ! Des employés civils consciencieux, intègres, capables et sans reproches, ont été impitoyablement jetés sur le pavé, sans égard pour leurs familles réduites à la gêne, souvent à la misère, par suite de cette cruauté chez les hommes du pouvoir. " Ils comptaient sur la foi publique pour être maintenus dans leurs situations, " mais avec des ministres qui du commencement à la fin se sont moqués de la foi jurée, ont conspiré contre leurs propres paroles et leurs propres engagements, à quoi servent les notions ordinaires d'honneur et de morale ?

... " Vous avez beau faire vous resterez petit, très petit à côté des hommes du caractère moral de M. le Dr Meilleur que vous pouvez destituer, que vous pouvez réduire à la misère, quand un hasard infortuné vous donne le pouvoir, mais que vous ne réussirez jamais à rabaisser dans l'estime publique ! ! Une destitution est une tache, mais quand elle est faite injustement et tyranniquement, la tache s'imprime au front du ministre sans cœur et sans entrailles qui se sert de la force que donne l'autorité pour persécuter ses compatriotes !

Je crois que si l'honorable secrétaire d'Etat méditait cet article de la Minerve, il s'apercevrait qu'il a fait fausse route, et il retirerait conjointement avec l'honorable député de Richmond et Wolfe (M. Ives) les accusations qu'ils ont portées contre messieurs Tremblay et Poirier. J'espère que si la Chambre est déterminée à en venir à la conclusion que ces messieurs doivent être destitués, elle leur accordera au moins cette justice élémentaire, à laquelle tout le monde a droit, c'est-à-dire de pouvoir produire leur défense soit devant un comité de cette Chambre, soit ailleurs.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Speaker, the argument in regard to the original resolution before the House has been left largely in the hands of legal gentlemen, but it must not be forgotten that every member of Parliament is supposed to be as good a lawyer as another, especially in his experience of parliamentary practice. Now, Sir, as you are well aware, although I am not a lawyer, although I cannot claim to be a venerable individual, I am beginning to find myself rather a venerable member of the House. For that reason I have no hesitation in expressing my opinion on the point of parliamentary law that has been raised, and without going over all the arguments that have been adduced, it seems to me, Sir, clear that no individual can deal with the employés either on the reporting or the translating of the Debates, but that they are to be dealt with by the committee of this House appointed for that special purpose. It appears certainly that that committee did attempt last year, by a close vote, to transfer the responsibility in regard to the dismissal to the committee or to the Speaker or to the Committee on Internal Discipline ; but, Sir, they failed in doing so, because that having passed in the committee, neither the chairman nor anybody else would venture to move the adoption of that report to the House, and the report became consequently so much waste paper. Therefore the responsibility of the committee to the translators and the power to dismiss or appoint remains where it always has been in the hands of the committee, and when the committee attempted to deprive itself of that power or responsibility it was not successful. The committee and the committee alone remained responsible for all dealings with those employés. The consequence is that when the Speaker or anybody else pretends to have dismissed those translators that pretended dismissal is null and void. Those translators are officers of the House to-night as much as they were when first appointed according to my view of parliamentary law, and will remain so until they are dismissed by the House or the committee of the House appointed to deal with such questions. I believe that in a court of law those translators could collect their pay for the part of the session during which they have been here and have not got their salaries, and I believe if they went into the Exchequer Court they could collect their salaries until they are properly dismissed. I am sorry to find that not only the Speaker illegally and against the orders of the House pretended to dismiss those men, but at the same time he has appointed others in their places who are drawing the salaries which are due to the men whom he unfairly and improperly professed to strike off the roll. That is my view of the technical question. My hon. friend from Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) being a lawyer himself, has attempted to deal with this question of parliamentary law, but he has, as usual, only shown his complete ignorance of the subject. The hon. gentleman quoted to us a statute which gave the Speaker power after enquiry to dismiss any employé of the House. He forgot two things. He forgot that the statute was passed soon after Confederation, and long before there had been any Debates Committee, and long before there were any employés under the care of that committee. Therefore the wording of that statute cannot possibly refer to those employés. Above all, he forgot to tell us that the Speaker did not hold an enquiry before proceeding to dismiss those men on the ex parte statement of two supporters of the Government which appointed him, and he took upon himself, without enquiry or without giving the translators a chance to defend themselves, to exercise an illegal power by telling them that they were dismissed and preventing them from drawing salaries to which they are legally entitled at the present moment. The hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe is ignorant of the fact that the statute does not apply to these employés, and he forgot to tell you what he knew very well, that even if the statute did apply, the Speaker did not carry out its terms. That statute authorises him to hold an enquiry and afterwards to suspend; but he held no enquiry, and instead of suspending these officials he dismissed or professed to dismiss them. Then, the hon. member brought up the case of Mr. Tassé, who was a translator in 1873, and whose case he said was precisely similar to this one. Here again the hon. member for Texas—I beg his pardon, the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe—it was pure slip of the tongue—displayed his utter ignorance of the business of the House. He has confused Mr. Tassé, translator of official documents, parliamentary papers, bills, and so on, with the translators of the Debates. The two classes of men are perfectly distinct. Instead of the cases being precisely similar, they are as opposed to each other as any two cases can possibly be. Mr. Tassé, translator of parliamentary papers, was a permanent employé of the House, regularly appointed by the Speaker and dismissable by the Speaker. He was dismissed by the Speaker in pursuance of his undoubted right. But the three translators in question were translators of the Debates, not appointed by the Speaker, but by a special committee of this House, to whom the House has entrusted all its powers of appointing and dismissing translators of the Debates. I do not discuss the question whether Mr. Tassé was properly dismissed or not, as that does not apply to the present question. Then, the hon. gentleman discussed the case of an extra clerk, which is just the same as that of Mr. Tassé. Extra clerks are taken on by the Speaker's appointment, and are dismissed by him at any time with or without cause. There again there is no resemblance whatever to the case of these three translators of the Debates. Then, the hon. member found the case of Mr. DeCelles, who was a translator of the Debates in 1876, and he thought surely that his case must be parallel to the present case; but he forgot, if he ever knew it, which I greatly doubt, that previous to 1873, the translation of the Debates was done by contract, and that the translators at that time were not officials of this House in the sense they are now. Therefore that case is not at all parallel to the case before us. Now, the hon. member said that the quotations made by my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) were from La Presse, with which none of the translators were connected. There again he showed that he had not been listening to the speech of my hon. friend, for the quotations made by the hon. member for Bothwell were not made from La Presse chiefly, but the most damaging of those quotations were made from Le Monde, a paper of which Mr. Lasalle, one of the translators who is still retained on the staff, is the editor.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. He is not the editor, although he is a writer on a paper.

Mr. VANASSE. The extracts the hon. member read were not from Le Monde.

Mr. CASEY. I have some of them here, and they are from Le Monde. If the hon. Secretary of State says of his own personal knowledge that Mr. Lasalle is only a writer and not the editor of that paper, I accept the statement; but it is quite proper to assume, when Mr. Lasalle was known to be campaigning against the hon. Secretary of State at that time—

Mr. CHAPLEAU. No.

Mr. CASEY. Not against him individually, but against the Government of which he is a member—that those writings in the paper of which he wrote the campaigning parts, were from the pen of Mr. Lasalle. My hon. friends the hon. Secretary of State and the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe are certainly to be congratulated on the outcome of their action on this occasion. They appear to have sought two things—relief from some who troubled them, and public notoriety. They have obtained both. They have obtained a degree of notoriety which one of them at least, the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe, would probably never have attained under any other circumstances. They have obtained relief from trouble by getting rid of these gentlemen who are thorns in their sides, though it remains to be seen what the House and the law may have to say about the supposed dismissal. But I have to call attention to the fact that they do not unite in their treatment of the cases in all points. They unite in declaring themselves, by the action they have taken and the speeches they have made, the two members on that side of the House who have the thinnest skins, who most quickly and deeply feel anything that may be said or done against them, who are the most ready to resent against a helpless employé of this House something that may have been said against them in the heat of the political arena. I do not know any two hon. gentlemen on that side of the House who would have put themselves in the places of those hon. gentlemen, and I say it to the credit of the party. Does anyone suppose that the hon. Minister of Public Works, who is sitting beside the hon. Secretary of State, would have acted in this way if these translators had taken the same action, and used the same language against him in the heat of the campaign? He has been attacked time and again in much more violent language than that used by Messrs. Tremblay and Poirier, and have we ever heard of his asking for the dismissal of any of those who have attacked him? No. It is these two junior members of the House who have shown themselves so impatient. Although much the juniors of the hon. the Minister of Public Works, they have shown themselves much more forward, much more impatient of contradiction, much more inclined to wreak vengeance on those over whom they may think they have power. It is this young member of Parliament and this young member of the House who have taken advantage of their position to gratify personal spite in this way on these men. The right hon. the First Minister, the hon. the Minister of Public Works, or any of the other gentlemen who sit on the Treasury benches, would not be suspected by anybody on this side of taking such a course, and we would not have suspected it of these hon. gentlemen if they had not convicted themselves by the action they have taken. They have shown that they possess influence of a very peculiar and extraordinary kind with the Cabinet. What is the sum and substance of the reasons they give for asking the dismissal of the translators? They produce a number of utterances made by these translators on the hustings, but it is perfectly clear that these utterances, made during the campaign, were not more injurious than the utterances of Conservative employés who have been retained in their positions, and if hon. members who are now hand in glove with the Ministry. After settling out that these translators, whose political autonomy had never been hitherto questioned, had used the language which everybody else had used on the public platform, the hon. the Secretary of State says :

"I could neither speak to them nor consult them in this House, and I say sincerely that their presence in the precincts of the House is to me a nuisance, which no one has the right to subject a member of Parliament to."

And because the hon. the Secretary of State thinks their presence is a nuisance, he, in his high mightiness, the Great Mikado, the grand Lama, says the presence of these men—never mind their wives and families—is a nuisance to him and they must be dismissed. That is not enough. A still greater power appears on the scene in the person of the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe who says speaking of Mr. Rémi Tremblay :

"He is unfit for the position he occupies, his presence is distasteful to me, I cannot have any communication with him, and I ask that he be dismissed from the service of the House of Commons."

The presence of Mr. Tremblay was a nuisance to the Secretary of State and distasteful to the all-powerful member for Richmond and Wolfe. If it were parliamentary to use the phrase, I should say that such language on the part of any two members of this House in regard to any employés depending on their positions for the support of their families, was nothing short of scandalous. The hon. the Secretary of State defended this action on the ground that the dignity of the House required it, and he said he would take the same course if any other member of the House except himself had been attacked. He made a very grand speech and played his rôle very well, indeed; but when our unfortunate friend from Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) took the floor, he did what the Irishman did, he opened his mouth and put his foot in it, or rather he put both his feet in it, for he destroyed the whole case which the Secretary of State had so laboriously built up. The hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe told us plainly that it was not with him a question of the offended dignity of the House, it was not because Mr. Rémi Tremblay had said anything insulting to him, but it was because he had made too many Rouge votes in the county of Richmond and Wolfe. Had Mr. Tremblay confined himself to one parish, the hon. member said, I would not have minded it, but wherever I went he followed me, and he was making Rouge votes and abusing me everywhere. The whole case of the hon. the Secretary of State is thus given away. It was not a question of the dignity of the House, but a question of making Rouge votes. When we come to the question of the offensive language used, let me ask you to compare it with that used by present supporters of the Government in the course of the agitation that followed the execution of Louis Riel. One gentleman is reported by La Presse as having said in Montreal on the 26th November :

"The Ministers have proved that they are heartless. The conduct of one whose name is never mentioned has been shameful."

I am informed that "the one whose name is never mentioned" is the hon. the Minister of Militia.

"This being, whose name has been banished from the Canadian dialect, attended a banquet where Riel's head was a surprise dish offered to the guests."

That banquet, I believe, was the banquet at Winnipeg.

"Sir John made a great mistake if he thought the Province of Quebec would accept Riel's execution without a word of protest, and he will be dismissed from power as he deserves. These sentiments are engraved within our hearts, and it is the duty of all those who can act in a manly way to avenge the death of Riel by dismissing from power the men who have steeped their hand in the blood of the leader of the half-breeds."

MR. CASEY.

An hon. MEMBER. Oh, Oh.

Mr. CASEY. I hear hon. gentleman over there, and I think I could point him out. If I told him who the gentleman is who is reported by the Presse to have used that language, he would not speak to him any more. That gentleman is the hon. member for Hochelaga, at present a member of this House, and a warm supporter of the Government which he then attacked in such scathing terms. He is now, however, fit to associate with the Ministers and honored—I do not deny that he is justly honored—by them, but I say that while the Government are glad to have the support of that hon. gentleman, those other two gentlemen which happened to be on the opposite side of politics, and who have taken away more votes from the hon. the Secretary of State and from the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe than the hon. member for Hochelaga, have to be sacrificed. I claim that there is neither British fair play nor common sense nor justice in the whole transaction.

An hon. MEMBER. Cock-a-doodle-doo.

Mr. CASEY. As the old cock crows, the young cock learns. I hear a cock crowing on the benches, and I would advise that boy, for he must be a boy member, or he would know better, to observe the conduct, not only of those immediately in front of him, but of those in the front rows, and like them to listen quietly to what is said. My hon. friend from Montmorency (Mr. Langelier) read in French several interesting expressions of opinion made by different members of the House and others; one or two of which I beg leave to read also in English, because I am afraid that many of my fellow citizens from Ontario were not able to follow him in French. A despatch was sent to the Government on the 13th November, 1885, as follows:—

"Under the circumstances Riel's execution would be an act of cruelty of which we refuse to share the responsibility."

And that was signed not by any unfortunate translators, but by the following members of the House:—Messrs. C. J. Coursol, Alphonse Desjardins, D. Girouard, F. Vanasse, L. H. Massue, F. Dupont, A. L. Desaulniers, J. B. Daoust, J. G. H. Bergeron, J. W. Bain, P. B. Benoit, E. Guilbault, G. A. Gigault, G. Labrosse, L. L. L. Desaulniers, F. Dugas and H. Hurteau; in all seventeen, and this despatch was published in Le Monde on the 14th November, and Le Monde stated that despatches to the same effect were signed, by whom do you suppose? By Messrs. Ouimet, Fortin, McMillan, Taschereau, Landry and Lesage. If any one could say anything more severe in reference to the Government than that Riel's execution would be an act of cruelty, which was practically putting them in the position of murdering the man, I do not know what could be said. Some of these gentlemen have no doubt reconsidered their decision, and they had undoubtedly a right to reconsider it, but, if they are still treated as honorable men and upright members of Parliament after making such a declaration, why should these poor men who said the same thing and no more be treated as they have been? I think that the language used by these translators on the platform and in the press was just the same as that which was used by the French opponents of the Government at that time. They just took the tone of the campaign that was going on, and when they were accused of having used language of that kind, what did they do? Everyone of those gentlemen wrote to the Speaker and protested that, if they had been carried away by the heat of the campaign into using language which was improper or insulting, they wished to retract any offensive or insulting words they had used, and they asked for an investigation before the Speaker in order to clear their skirts. They denied that they had done so in the first place, but they said that, if they had in the heat of the campaign they were willing to retract and apologise. But the Speaker did not grant them what, under the statute, he was bound to grant them, an enquiry, which they were entitled to, not as an act of grace but as an act of right and of law. No, they were not granted that enquiry, but their heads came off at the demand of the great Mikado and the Grand Llama. I overlooked one extract in French which deserves to go on the pages of the Hansard in English as well. The hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins) at the same meeting to which I have referred, said, according to the report in one of his own papers:

"The Ministers have constantly deceived us"

And he concluded by saying:

"Let Sir John's career, which commenced under the ghastly light of the burning of the Parliament House at Montreal, come to an end behind Riel's gibbet. We must refuse our support to those who have sold us in the Federal Cabinet."

And so on. What could be stronger than that?

Mr. DESJARDINS. Did I say that?

Mr. CASEY. That was reported in a Montreal newspaper, and it has not been denied up to this day that the hon. gentleman used that language. When an hon. member of this House, who is still an honored supporter of the Premier, can say that the career of the right hon. gentleman commenced under the ghastly light of the burning of the Parliament House at Montreal, which is true enough but is not pleasant for him to hear, and when he can remain the friend, and the honored friend, of the Premier, why should we allow the personal spite of two members of this House—one a junior member of the House, the other a junior member of the Government—to be wreaked on three innocent individuals who did not say more, who did not say as much, and upon whose dismissal depends the support not only of themselves but of their wives and families? Everyone who was in Parliament at the time, and everyone who has read the documents which are before the House knows that perfect freedom of political action was allowed to all the gentlemen who were appointed on the Debates staff in 1883, especially to the translators. It was known that they were journalists, it was known that they would be here as special correspondents or editorial correspondents if they were not here as translators, and it was admitted on all hands, as is proved, that they retained their political liberty. The only proper accusation that could be brought against them would be that they exceeded the proper limits by attacks upon members of the Government who were members of this House. It has been proved that their remarks were below the standard of the remarks which were hurled against hon. Ministers by some of their present supporters during the campaign in Quebec and the agitation which followed the death of Riel. Therefore there could be no reason for their dismissal. A great point has been made as to their attacking members of Parliament, but it must be remembered that at that time the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) and the hon. the Secretary of State were not members of the House any more than the translators, or the reporters, or the pages on the floor of the House. They were simply citizens who were asking the electors to make them members of the House, and they had no more right to consideration than any other man who was asking for election. If the House were to be dissolved to-morrow, the hon. the Premier, except on account of his age and experience and his venerable appearance, would have no more right to ask for consideration than if he were the greenest farmer from a backwoods settlement. Neither the Premier nor the farmer would be a member of this House. In regard to the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives), who is not even a member of the Cabinet, the case is much stronger, and I think the depositions, which I hope everyone has read or will read if he has not read them already, which were put in by that hon. gentleman in support of his own case, show that the language which he complains of as insulting to himself was not as strong as that which was used against the Government by hon. members of this House with whom he feels himself honored to associate to-day. That is the whole case, and I think the House, if it acts upon considerations of justice, will see, in the words of the amendment, that these men should not have been dismissed, even if it were within the Speaker's jurisdiction to dismiss them, and further, that it was not within his jurisdiction to dismiss them at all. But I waive the technical point, and I think I am within the facts of the case when I say that, if he had the jurisdiction, the facts did not warrant his dismissing these men.

Mr. DAVIN. I do not know that I should have intruded upon this debate but for some remarks which were made by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock). That hon. gentleman indulged in some wit of the same kind as some others who have spoken on the same side have indulged in. I will only say this, that having listened attentively to this debate, my admiration for the logical power has been displayed on this side of the House, is only surpassed by the pleasure that I experienced at those witty sallies that we have been delighted with. It is evidently considered a triumph of humor on the part of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat to refer to my hon. friend from Richmond and Wolfe as the member for Texas, and then correct himself as though he had fallen into that lapsus inadvertently. And when the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) referred to my hon. friend the member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) because that hon. gentleman most properly said "question," when the hon. member was travelling as far away from the question as any hon. gentleman who has spoken on that side and that, Sir, is speaking as strongly as one can—when the hon. member for East Grey cried "question," the refined wit, the high culture of the hon. member for North York, found expression in the declarations "it was a pity Darwin was not here, because he would be aided in finding the missing link." Well, Sir, I apprehend that the features of the missing link would at once be moral as well as physical, I apprehend that the intellectual and moral features of the missing link would find this peculiarity, that they would have no power of co-ordinating facts. Sir, I have listened to hon. gentlemen after hon. gentlemen here to-night, and I am bound to say that had I not heard them speak on other occasions, and if I had not heard them talk over the tea table down in the supper room, at times when I saw some evidence that they are capable of reasoning, I should have thought Darwin need not go to the member for East Grey, but he might find all the moral features of the missing link amongst hon. gentlemen who have been speaking on the Opposition to-night. Why, Sir, when I heard the hon. gentleman from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) speak, I was amazed at his finding an analogy between the position of Dr. Kenealy, a member of the British House of Commons, and one of the gentlemen employed as translators in this House. But another hon. gentleman insists, in fact one hon. gentleman after another insists, that there is no analogy whatever between an ordinary sessional clerk and a translator though there are all sorts of analogies between the position of a member of the English House of Commons and one of the translators of this House. Sir, I fear that the brain of my hon. friend the member for Bothwell is a brain of defective analogies. My hon. friend is a learned man, he is a man of great industry, and his mind is stored with facts, but he is incapable of co-ordinating them, and the consequence is that he belongs to that race of statesmen who are very learned but who are always wrong. He is like a clock with an elaborate face to it, but that never tells the right time. I like to hear him, I like to look at him, but I will say this, that the genius of persuasion may have kissed his brow, but it was with frozen lips. Now, Sir, there are three questions before this House. The hon. leader of the Opposition, like a statesman, raised the question of the jurisdiction of the Speaker. I will not trouble the House with going over the ground that was so admirably gone over by my hon. friend for Richmond and Wolfe, but I do say that he and the learned Minister of Justice showed clearly that the Speaker has jurisdiction in this case. Then the hon. member for Bothwell comes in with an amendment and he casts doubt on the position taken by his leader; to use the admirable expression of the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe, he proposes a vote of want of confidence in his leader. He says that even if the Speaker have no jurisdiction, still, under the circumstances of the case, the Speaker should not have dismissed these gentlemen.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If he had jurisdiction.

Mr. DAVIN. Even if he have jurisdiction. I am obliged to my right hon. friend. That is not the only time he has corrected me; I am always satisfied to be corrected from that source. Mr. Speaker, he then, in a certain sense, proposed a vote of want of confidence in himself, and he goes on to say, as knowing that he had not taken a very secure position, that "in the opinion of this House the language used by those translators was not more violent than the language used by translators who have not been dismissed." Why, Sir, this is not a hasty utterance in debate, this is not a hasty expression, that the ebullient genius of my hon. friend might have led to; this is a carefully worded amendment, and what do we find? We find this hon. gentleman taking up this logical position that, because some other translators may have done wrong, therefore the translators whose wrong-doing has been brought to the attention of the Speaker, should go scott free. The hon. gentleman is a lawyer, and what would be thought of him, what would a judge think of him, if he were to defend a criminal at the bar by saying: "My Lord, I grant you that the case is very strong against this criminal, but there are at least half a dozen men just as bad who have never been arrested." As I say, Sir, it is part and parcel of the logic that has been manifested. Take this newspaper scrap business. The style with which they discuss these newspaper extracts! I have heard, Sir, of thunder and small beer, this is a case of thunder and big scissors. They come here with their newspaper scraps. What on earth does it matter to this House what the Minerve said? The hon. gentleman for Bothwell declared that he should approach this question in a judicial spirit—what does it matter to this House what one newspaper after another has said? The question we have to decide here, in the first place, is, has the Speaker jurisdiction? Then the other question has been raised, whether, if he has jurisdiction, he has properly exercised that jurisdiction. Now, Sir, about the accuracy of my hon. friend the member for Elgin (Mr. Casey). He brought that light, airy artillery of his wit and power on some hon. gentlemen opposite, and he spoke of the inaccuracy of the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman himself declares that the three translators appealed to the Speaker, that they wanted an enquiry before the Speaker. He said that with the documents in his hands. What is the fact? They never did anything of the kind. They wanted an enquiry before the Debates Committee, of which I happen to be a member, and when the question came before that committee we discussed it very fully, and what we decided was this: That while we were seized as regards any question of want of efficiency on the part of these men as translators, we had nothing whatever to do with their conduct apart from that; and we referred the matter back to the Speaker. And what does the Speaker do? The Speaker meets that committee of the House that has charge of the conduct of what might be called the government of the household here. They met, they discussed the conduct of those gentlemen, and they decided that it was not in the public interest they should be retained. What idea have hon. gentlemen of what should be done? Did they suppose that it is to be accepted for one moment that if the conduct of every subordinate employé of this Parliament is not such as entitles him to be retained in the employment of Parliament, we are to meet every night like this, and hon. gentlemen are to come here with their newspaper scraps and give us these scissors rhetorics, all as to the question whether these gentlemen were properly dismissed or not? Why, the fact that we are debating this question here shows that if any wrong were done, the jurisdiction of the Speaker will not be final and we will discuss it here. Far be it from me to say one harsh word of those gentlemen. I do not know them. That profession is cognate to the profession that I once had myself, and my sympathies, so far as I have any sympathies, would be with them. But what do we find? The hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Casey) says that they apologised, he says that they expressed regret. I am sorry to say that the worst part of the conduct of those gentlemen is not, in my opinion, what they said on the hustings when fighting a political battle, but it was in the demeanor they assumed when dealing with the Speaker who represents this House of Commons. Their position is this: they defied the Speaker. They said: "You have no jurisdiction, we appeal to the Debates Committee. They say they have an independent position which has been recognised. And how do they prove this independent position? By answering that they are in the employ of the Parliament of Canada, in the employ of the Government of Canada therefore, which represents this House for executive purposes, and yet they can go broadcast through the country and try to lower the efficiency of that Government by lowering its dignity. Do hon. members think that the position is tolerable? The hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) quoted certain dicta, but there are stronger dicta which the hon. gentleman might have quoted if he had thought of them; these are statements of a gentleman who will be thought the highest authority by hon. gentlemen of the Opposition. I have the language before me of Mr. Blake, who said:—

"So long as nomination by patronage continues, resulting generally in the appointment of one friend of the party in power, it must be agreed in the course of time that public officers must dissociate themselves altogether from the field of politics. Everything pointed to the position that a public servant should be neutral—that he should have nothing to do with politics, that he should not consider himself the servant of the majority or the minority, but the servant of the whole people, that he should have such relations to the members of this House that the most active partisans on either side might have free, frank and friendly communication with him on public matters."

And yet with such statesman-like language on the part of the late leader of the Opposition, a man whom we all honor, a man held in reverence by the Opposition here, we have one member of that party after another rising and denouncing the Secretary of State, forsooth, because he gave expression to the very difficulty that has been sketched by Mr. Blake here. He found it difficult to meet those people he said; it was not pleasant to meet them; he could not have that frank and free discussion with them that Mr. Blake said was essential to that relationship not merely between a member of the Government and an employé of this House, but between the humblest member of this House and such an employé. That is not all. In the same speech Mr. Blake said:

"But there was a concurrence of opinion among both parties that their right ought to be simply the right of voting (that is the employee), and that any public servant who went farther than that went beyond the line of his duty, and deserved censure if not dismissal. He said dismissal."

Then Mr. Mackenzie in the same debate spoke equally strongly. He said:

"It was quite enough that they should have the right to vote under the law; but it was altogether intolerable that civil servants should actively engage as electioneering agents."

Of course, we have the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Casey) saying that a certain Act, the Act that has been quoted, was passed before the Hansard staff was organised. What difference does that make?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Not the slightest.

Mr. DAVIN. It requires that particular perspicuous orb, of which hon. gentlemen on the Opposition side have command, to be able to see an analogy between a member of the British Parliament and one of the Hansard staff and to see no analogy between such an officer as is described in clause 16, and a member of the Hansard staff.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. I am really sorry that the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) is not in his place, because he is a very learned gentleman, he is a distinguished graduate of Toronto University, in fact I think he occupies the second position, that of Vice-Chancellor of the University, and I will say this, that he is an honor to the University. But, Mr. Speaker, I will say that his biblical education has been neglected. I am very sorry that he is not here, for I should have liked to have given him a lesson on biblical literature. He spoke of the Government of Canada as determined to dismiss these gentlemen, and determined not only to dismiss them, but to dismiss some people whom he describes as devoted to the shamrock, and it was beautiful to see the Donnybrook Fair enthusiasm he got up about those gentlemen. He seemed to think this Government is determined to destroy the shamrock and fleur de lis. I apprehend those hon. gentleman of the Rouge party, the leading and active members of the party are not very devoted to the fleur de lis. I should have thought it would be quite another emblem they would have been devoted to. As for the Government going against those gentlemen or against the devotees of the shamrock where was the evidence? None whatever. No more than there was any evidence for the assertions of the hon. member that this or that person wrote such articles to which he referred. But my hon. friend the member for North York (Mr. Mulock) referring to the language that the Supreme Power addressed to Elijah said that the Government was determined to destroy anyone who would not "bend the knee to Baliol." Well, Sir, of course we have heard of Baal. I know Baal, but I am not acquainted with Baliol. There is a Baliol College at Oxford, but there is no connection whatever between the founder of Baliol College and the Baal that is referred to in that recondite quotation from Holy Writ. Sir, I am deeply grieved, I am grieved because I know something of the early training of my hon. friend, and I know he has been well brought up. I know he used to be sent to the Sunday School and that he was afterwards examined as to his achievements there and I am sure that he must have lately neglected his biblical studies to have given us that time honored quotation as "bends the knee to Baliol." But, Sir, he is not in a very bad position, because on that side of the House he has the assistance of my ingenious friend, who is the very learned member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and I have no doubt they will bring out a revised edition of the Old Testament between them, and the next time I turn to Kings, I will find that "7,000 will not bow their knee to Baal," but "7,000 will not bow their knee to Baliol," and my hon. friend from Ann Harbor will declare that some editions of the Septuagint will be found with "Baliol" in it. Now, Sir, I want to call the attention of the House to the great inconvenience that might occur if the doctrines of these gentlemen were accepted. Suppose we accept the doctrine of the hon.

member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), that any conduct, no matter how violent against a member of this House, and of which a member of this House had complained, must yet be overlooked by the Speaker. Suppose we accept that, why, Sir, the language may be used towards a man that this House would elect a Speaker, and the Speaker would have to come in contact with those gentlemen who have used opprobrious and offensive and insulting expressions for which they never apologised; because in those documents placed before us there is no apology and only to be found insult heaped upon insult. We have had the whole matter before us in the committee. Would it not be an unenviable position suppose my hon. friend the Secretary of State had been made Speaker, would the relationship be a pleasant one between those gentlemen and the Speaker. I think, Sir, it would lead to a great deal that was undesirable. Sir, I have heard a great deal about the rights of journalists here. I am a journalist if I am anything. I have heard a great deal about the rights of journalists, but I never have considered that it was the right of a journalist to use language insulting towards any man. If it is known that because gentlemen are journalists and have certain rights that they can come here and be employed as servants of this House and then go when they like and where they like and hurl insults and calumnies broadcast against some of the most honored men in this House, it would be a bad precedent. Why, Sir, the thing is perfectly improbable. I will say this in passing also that in this question we have nothing to do with the motives of my hon. friend the member for Richmond (Mr. Ives), or with the motives of the hon. the Secretary of State. I will not discuss their motives. I believe their motives to be good. I believe the Secretary of State, when he says that he is anxious for the dignity of the House, is sincere. Why, Sir, if a man occupying his position were not jealous for the dignity of this House he would not be worthy of his position. When he says he is jealous for the dignity of this House I believe him, but, Sir, I put aside the question of his motives. We have nothing to do whatever with the motives no more than a judge administering the law would have anything to do with the motives of a man who had brought before his attention a person charged with certain offences. All the judge would have to do in such a case would be to decide where the indictment lay, whether the charges were proved, and whatever the motives might be he would have to find accordingly. Mr. Speaker, I have brought before the House the points that struck me as I listened to this debate. I hope that my hon. friend, the member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins), will speak on the subject, and he will go more fully probably than I have into what was done in the committee, if he should think it necessary so to do. But, Sir, on this subject I may be permitted to express a hope which I trust will meet with the approval of the House. I do not know whether I should venture to express that hope. My hon. friend the member for Elgin (Mr. Casey) spoke of himself as if he were an old member and he spoke of some hon. gentlemen as "boys in parliamentary knowledge" and "boys in parliamentary experience." Well, Sir, in the same way I am a boy in parliamentary experience as compared with my hon. friend the member for Elgin (Mr. Casey) and yet, Sir, I will venture—throwing myself on the indulgence of the House—to express the hope that the older members will set to young members such as I am a better example of deliberative discussion in this assembly; this the first deliberative assembly of English-speaking men after the Imperial Parliament, and that they will come here and debate as men with reason and with knowledge should debate and not come here reading bundles and yard arms long of newspaper extracts which have as much to do with the question and with the real issues as they would have to do with the attempt to square the solar parallax. I have heard of a man who, in solving the problem of perpetual motion, said he obtained a complete solution by contemplating the durations of a chipmonk's tail.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Mr. Speaker, the dismissal of those officials has caused a considerable debate in the House. The translators are appointed by the House, the Hansard is a growth of the House and the officers are appointed by the House and not by the Speaker. They are not officers of the House in the same way that other officers are appointed. It was only a few years ago since the Hansard was instituted by the House and I understand and I expect that there should be fair play in this connection and that those who are appointed on the staff as translators or as shorthand reporters should bear a relative proportion to the strength of parties in this House. The translators, it appears, are eight in number. It appears that they took part in the election that was held in the beginning of 1887. It appears that both those who profess to be Conservatives and those who profess to be Reformers took part in that election, and I have no doubt they both displayed the same amount of zeal. I have not heard complaints against those translators who opposed gentlemen on this side of the House. It is well known that gentlemen on this side of the House are not apt to complain of every trifling case that arises. They have perhaps just as good cause as hon. gentlemen opposite to complain against these Hansard translators. It appears that at that time Richmond and Wolfe and the county of Terrebonne were without members; the House had been dissolved, and these gentlemen were not members of the House. These translators were, then only speaking of persons who were not members of the House; and if one side had a right, the other side had just as good a right to go out and take part in the election. It is not seriously contended that there shall be one law to govern those who are Conservatives, and another law to govern those who are Reformers. That would be a singular proposition to lay down; yet that is the principle on which the dismissal of these translators is based. I contend, and I think I contend rightly, that the Speaker has no authority to dismiss these translators; they were employed by the House, and can only be dismissed by the House. It is very probable that the translators did not know who the hon. member for Terrebonne, the Secretary of State was. It is probable that they had not heard of the greatness of that distinguished man, or read his life and times by one of the papers in the Province of Quebec. This work gives the portrait of this distinguished man. But I will trouble the House to read a little of the life history which it gives of him, and if these translators had seen this and learned the great height to which the hon. Secretary of State had attained in the political world, they might probably not have ventured to say anything about that individual. This history says:

"In the 5th century before Christ there appeared a man to whose ear all the people of Greece seemed attached. His insinuating and persuasive eloquence had crowned him king of speech, and his oratorical contests which were but one series of victories gave to his century the name of Pericles. What an admirable analogy between that phase of Greek history and the present time in Canada? In the two countries all depends on speech. The acts of the Governments are discussed openly, the people take part in Government contests. Speech is sovereign. The statesman should be an orator. And if Pericles at Agora, in Athens, defended the rights of his people, here the Hon. Mr. Chapleau in seductive accents of persuasive eloquence supports with energy the rights of progress and patriotism, everything connected with him recalls to mind that fine eloquence which fascinated and conquered antiquity and enlightened the modern world with the purest rays of oratorical art. It is not the harsh and dry speech of the ancient Romans which had its place rather in the bloody battles in the circus than in the debates in the forum, neither is that full and majestic eloquence, but an eloquence deep and often without originality of which Cicero is the most brilliant representative. Mr. Chapleau belongs to the finest class of exalted orators, the speech at the same time harmonious and sweet, his incomparable mastery of irony, the broadness of his views and above all his invincible love for his country have raised him to the rank of Demosthenes and Isocrates."

But I will allow the hon. Secretary of State to speak for himself. He appears to have been brought up with the culture which my learned friend here (Mr. Davin) talks about. Under circumstances so agreeable and so refined, here is what he says of himself:

"What is politics? Until now I thought that it was the science of men and things applied to the administration of public affairs. I thought that it was the art of instructing the people and directing them towards their destinies in the world. Was I mistaken? Am I therefore a simpleton? It is true that I was very young when I learned the element of politics. I liked politics before having known the way of interest, ambition or intrigue. I studied politics before having understood the narrow meanness or the calculating impudence which is connected with it. I had just left college. I had read in the history of my country that my forefathers came of a race which could be said with reason: Gesta Dei per Francos."

That is what the hon. Secretary of State said of himself. He had studied politics before meanness and intrigue had entered into it; and this is the gentleman who insists on having two of his French compatriots removed for taking lessons at his feet, for standing on the same platform as himself and discussing public issues before the people. What were the reasons which led the Secretary of State to come and ask the Speaker to discuss them? It was for taking the same stand that not only he, but all the people in the Province of Quebec, took on that occasion. That is the head and front of their offending. That is why they are now being persecuted. I think the hon. Secretary of State has been studying intrigue to some extent since the time he went to school. Now we find him coming and asking the Speaker of this House to dismiss these translators, because he says:

"I could neither speak to them nor salute them in this House, and I say sincerely that their presence within the precincts of this House is for me a nuisance to which it appears to me, no one has a right to subject a member of Parliament."

No doubt the hon. gentleman exclaimed to himself and wondered in his youth,

"Oh, why were voters made so coarse,
And M. P.'s made so fine?"

That is the sentiment he displays in the petty act of malice he seeks to inflict on these translators, because they exercised the privileges of British freemen at a time when they were not employed by this House to make known their opinions to the people among whom they lived. One of them states that he did not mention the name of the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe. What an omission? To imagine that any person could write the history of this country and not mention the name of the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe! Scarcely, if he had written the political history of the Province of Quebec. I wonder at the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe being so terribly thin-skinned as to be offended at the language these men have used. It is true the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) has been living away down in the sunny South for a certain number of years. It is true he has taken a certain amount of surplus cash and invested it down in Texas—in that land where they are so polite, and where they are so light and free, that when he comes back here to Canada he is astonished that gentlemen in Canada have opinions and express their opinions in clear, straightforward language without anybody gainsaying them. But the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe, living down in Texas, having taken away the surplus earnings of the people in Quebec and Ontario and invested it there, says:—Why, it is a terrible thing?—that the presence of these translators in the House is disgusting to him. After a residence of three or four years in Texas, he comes back and finds they have used language he was not accustomed to hear in Texas, and which was very offensive to him. Here is what he says:

"He has also written several articles for the press, abusing me and the Government, and he was and is a violent partisan, unfit for the position he occupies and whose presence is distasteful to me. I cannot have any communication with him."

Poor fellow!

"I ask that he be dismissed from the service of the House of Commons."

Just because his presence is distasteful. Is every hon. member to say that merely because an officer of this House is distasteful to him, that officer must be dismissed? What would we come to if such were the rule? Why, the thing is absurd. It is a monstrous proposition to make, that because an officer of the House is offensive to the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe, perfumed with the airs of Texas, the owner and master of a ranche down there, he must be dismissed. I wonder why we should discuss that question here at all. Why should we not discharge these officials right away? It was a terrible commentary on British institutions that they should think or say anything that would be offensive to the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe, with all his Texas air, brought up from the ranches of Texas; it is terrible that anything should be said against him, when he can stand the language of the cowboys and those who live down there. Now we find that those translators have not said anything that is very severe comparing their utterances and writings with the utterances of some strong supporters of the Government. We have a right to expect that the members of this House should set the example to the officials and to the people of this country by using moderate language. If they expect the people to be moderate, if they expect the officials of the House to be moderate, they should be moderate themselves. In this House we have occasionally heard observations made, which, if followed out, would lead to most disastrous consequences to those who made them, but time smoothes down all these acerbities. We remember in this House hon. gentlemen making serious statements against other hon. gentlemen, and yet we have found that time, that smoothing agent, has removed all those disagreeable reminiscences. We find those against whom the strongest epithets were used by leading members of the Government, afterwards honored by that Government, and recommended to Her Majesty as fit and proper subjects for royal decoration. Who can forget the observations made with regard to the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith), by the right hon. the First Minister; we all remember the epithets which were applied by the hon. the Minister of Finance on one occasion in this House to that same hon. gentleman, and yet we see that same hon. member for Montreal West causing those gentlemen to go before Her Majesty and that he be named as one willing and deserving of knighthood. Would it not be more manly for the Secretary of State and for the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe to allow time to heal this trouble and repair the wrongs that have been done? Why, this appears to have been a cold-blooded, premeditated thing. After the excitement had died away, three months after the elections, this Pericles, who, or his antitype, was born some years before Christ, lays this charge before the Speaker of this House, and the Speaker himself has made statements, I believe, just as strong against the Government as those translators have. The Speaker was just as much opposed to their policy in regard to the execution of Riel as were the translators. What did the Government do with him in order to convince this country of the insincerity of their course? They said to their friends and to the people: We have executed Riel, and we believe that we were right in so doing; we have been condemned for doing it, but those who were opposed to us were knaves, cowards and traitors. And the Government led the people to believe in the sincerity of that statement, but what do we find? We find that they appointed to be the first commoner the hon. gentleman who gave them abuse without stint. They showed thus there was no sincerity in all the appeals they made to the Protestant element. What was their great slogan against the Reform party in the last elections? It was the cry of danger to Confederation from French aggression. We were told by the Tories that Confederation was threatened by the stand taken by the French, and the Government wish to show by the dismissal of these translators that they are going to do something to resist the aggressive character of the French people, in this House at least. I would, if I did not fear being taken up for reading language that might perhaps associate my name with literature of a peculiar character, read what the right hon. the First Minister and the hon. Minister of Finance said, as reported in the Hansard of 1878. It is perhaps best not to read it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Give everything you can against him.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I have an idea that the right hon. the First Minister might probably not care to hear the language he used some years ago. I do not know that he ever publicly retracted that language, or that the hon. the Minister of Finance ever publicly retracted it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do not spare him, let us have it?

Mr. LANDERKIN. As that seems to be the general desire, I will read it. The hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith) was then a member of this House, he represented a constituency in Manitoba. There were some differences of opinion existing between the First Minister and the Finance Minister and the hon. member for Montreal West, and they set to work to clear up these difficulties the last day of the last Parliament of 1878. They came here and had a most animating—I do not know what other form of description I might give it, but I will let you judge for yourself as to the epithet that should be applied. After they had sparred, Mr. Tupper said: "Coward, coward, sit down." They went on a little further, and Mr. Tupper says: "Coward, coward, coward." Mr. Smith says: "You are the coward." They go on a little further, and Mr. Tupper says: "Mean, treacherous coward." Then Mr. Tupper says, "Coward, treacherous," and then Sir John A. Macdonald says: "That fellow Smith is the biggest liar I ever met." After language of that kind, I am somewhat surprised that the Secretary of State should feel keenly the language that has been used to him by these translators.

Mr. MITCHELL. Oh, but his dignity, you know.

Mr. LANDERKIN. But at that time he was not a member of the House, and, although this historian says the Secretary of State is such a wonderful man, I do not know that he is of much better mould than the Minister of Public Works. I do not know whether the Minister of Public Works has learned intrigue or not. I understand the historian says that the Secretary of State did not learn any intrigue, and it appears to have been born with him, this air of lack of communication which he should have, and which every member should have, with the officials in this House. I think a more silly pretext to gratify a little personal malice and spleen has never been heard of. Look at the position in the Province of Ontario, which has been governed by that distinguished man, the Hon. Oliver Mowat, for the last sixteen years. Where do you find any evidences of this petty malice being visited on those who opposed him? Why, the greater portion of the Civil Service there are those who are politically opposed to him.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. LANDERKIN. They were when he began, and they continued so as long as they lived, and their places were only filled when those had passed off the stage by death or something of that description. You never find and you never heard of a single instance where any such petty, dominant, arrogant assertion of power was observed or ordered by that hon. gentleman. This is but a prostitution of power to gratify some little political partisan spirit. This is unworthy of a Government, to take vengeance on those who are not officers of the Government but officers of the House. They went out three on one side and five on the other. Look at the broad spirit which animates the Liberal party on this side of the House. We do not bring charges against those who oppose us. We do not descend to such petty meanness. We are too liberal in our views to do anything like that, but the Secretary of State coolly and deliberately, with malice—I say it deliberately—endeavors to ruin these men, and I believe there are some men on that side of the House who are willing to assist him. In my own riding, there are two gentlemen who have held positions under the Liberal Government of Ontario ever since I have been a member of the House. They both oppose me, and they go out and do their level best against me. I have never brought any charges against them. I have no doubt they have used language as strong against me as the language which has been used against this Pericles, this Secretary of State, but I have never brought any charge against them, and I believe it would be against dignity, against my dignity, to bring any charge against them if they had used such language. This is not the first evidence we have had of the narrowness which governs the present Administration, apart from the general policy of the Government, which is a narrow policy, a restrictionist policy, and their policy in connection with the Civil Service is just as narrow. Shortly after they came into power, when the Inspectors of Weights and Measures were good men, able men, honest men, capable men, appointed by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), what did they do? They passed an Act of Parliament and cut off the heads of every one of them, merely because they were not appointed by that Government, because they were not creatures of that Government. You would imagine that these offices were unnecessary and uncalled for, but they turned right round and appointed others in their stead. That was a most arbitrary, a most narrow exercise of the prerogative of the Crown for the purpose of gratifying party aims. They gave as an excuse at that time that it was done for reasons of economy. Why, the Department at the present time is not as efficiently administered as it was then and costs as much. Those gentlemen gave out to the people that they were merely cutting off the heads of those officials to exercise more economy with the public money, but they turned right round and appointed others. You find the same thing in regard to little petty post offices. I applied for a little petty post-office, or I presented a petition from the people in a part of the riding I represent. They applied for a post office and asked me to present a petition to the Postmaster General. I did present the petition to the Postmaster General. It was a very important office. It was in a rural section. The salary of the Postmaster would be about $10. But they were so careful that they would not be governed by the petition of the people, but had to look round for some Tory in order to find out who should be appointed Postmaster. If the affairs were administered in the interests of the people, it would be all right, but those gentlemen administer affairs altogether and exclusively in the interests of party. Then, before the election, there had been several rural post offices of small moment, but very much desired by some people in that riding, which had been hanging fire for four years, and just before the election those post offices were constituted, and the Government came out and said: See how vigilant the Government are in the interests of the people, when all that time the people had been petitioning for these post offices, and they would not establish them. That is the trouble with this Government. They do not consider the people at all. Their administration is entirely in the interests of the party. Whether the people petition, or desire, or deserve, is a question that does not concern them, unless they find how far it will serve their party. The member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) rebuked the member for North York (Mr. Mulock). He termed him Baal.

Mr. LANDERKIN.

Here is an instance of Scripture repeating itself. Baal was rebuked by an ass.

Mr. DAVIN. I rise to order. I desire to correct the hon. gentleman's knowledge of Scripture. It was not Baal who was rebuked by an ass; it was Balaam.

Mr. LANDERKIN. He also told us he was going to instruct the member for North York (Mr. Mulock) on bibulous literature. I do not know whether he thought the bibulous qualities of the member for North York had not been developed, and that he would instruct him.

Mr. DAVIN. That would be impossible.

Mr. LANDERKIN. At all events, he has shown us that he has seen the Bible somewhere. I suppose they have it up in the Prairie Province, and I recommend him to read it again. I say in conclusion that the motion that has been introduced by the leader of the Opposition, is, in my opinion, a correct stand for this House to take. I do not believe in allowing any official of this House to take away the privileges and the rights that the people gave to the members of this House, and when the members of this House appointed that committee on the Hansard debates, and when those gentlemen have discharged the duties entrusted to them with zeal and ability, then I say the Speaker of this House has no power to dismiss any of the officials appointed by this House unless he is directed so to do by this House. It is beyond his prerogative to dismiss them, and I consider that he has exercised partisan powers that should not emanate from the Speaker's Chair. The Speaker, of all gentlemen in this House, should hold the balance of power equal between the parties, and he should guard the interests of both parties, particularly of the minority. You will find that laid down by all constituted authorities, and every gentleman in this House must come to the conclusion from reading them that it is the duty of the Speaker to exercise that right and power, with which he has been clothed by members of this House, with fair play, with justice, and with equal rights to both parties. I think the Speaker travels beyond his prerogative when he attempts arbitrarily to dismiss any officials of this House before he has had the order from this House to do so. It is the power that creates that should destroy. The House of Commons alone should give instruction to the Speaker to have these officials removed, and if the Speaker attempts to do that without an order of this House, he is going beyond his jurisdiction. I think if the Secretary of State would only ponder over this question and reflect upon the language that was used of him by this author, whose name I do not know, if he calmly and carefully considered the opinion given in that paper, he would rise superior to this little petty malice, and would withdraw from the Speaker the request to have these translators removed. I think it would do him infinite credit with his wonderful abilities which have been paraded by this authority; it would show that he had a magnanimous heart in his bosom; I think it would do him a great deal of credit to reinstate these parties, and to let them go on and pursue the work which they have done with efficiency and despatch.

Mr. SPROULE. We have just had an exhibition of the logic that hon. gentlemen have given this House, and if close reasoning could prove anything, I think they might hope to accomplish a great deal by their arguments. It seems to have been the object of hon. gentlemen, from first to last, to steer as far from the subject of discussion as it was possible for them to do. The gentleman who has just taken his seat has travelled over very extensive ground, he has pressed into service almost everything that his fertile imagination could invent, but without touching the question at issue at all. His sallies of wit addressed to the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) appears to be in harmony with his reasoning. He referred to him as representing that character in the Bible where it is said that Balaam first spoke to that noted beast, the ass, but he did not tell the House that it was the ass who replied to Balaam. It was true that the member for Assiniboia made his criticisms, it was true also that a reply came back to him. If there was any analogy in the scriptural quotation, it must apply to the party that replied to Balaam, and if he himself be Balaam, who must the party be who replied to Balaam? The hon. member for Assiniboia made reference to the report, not a very courteous and gentlemanly one, that was addressed by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) to this side of the House, when "question" was called, because the hon. gentleman was wandering entirely from the subject. The hon. gentleman from North York gave his first edition of his speech before dinner. I think the House accepted it as his views upon the subject. But that hon. gentleman has this peculiarity, that he sometimes revises and gives a second edition of his speech. It is true that his speech after dinner was revised by the original author, but when we come to compare what he said before dinner with what he said after dinner, we may be charitable enough to suppose that there is a reason for excusing the great difference between the two. But coming more directly to the question in which we are interested, I think that when we adopted the system of reporting the debates of this House, and of translating them, we entrusted that duty to men in whom we had every confidence. Both sides of the House have a right to look upon those men with confidence, as honest men, as honorable men, as men who would not willingly misrepresent the statements of any hon. member; and if we afterwards find them using language the most intemperate, the most extreme, and I think I might say the most untrue, that could be either invented or spoken by one man against another; and if we find some of these same men coming back as translators for this House, how can we ever have confidence in them, that they will do their work impartially? But we are asked whether we are prepared to condemn the Speaker because he exercised what is recognised to be his undoubted authority in dismissing these men. I think both the law and the rules of this Parliament, as laid down by the Secretary of State and the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives), must be admitted by every fair-minded gentleman in this House to be the correct rules, and to be the law which governs either the engagement or discharge of employes of the Government. I say we are asked to condemn the Speaker because he has used his undoubted right in discharging men that he believed were not fit to be employed in the capacity they occupy. Now, I think we can come to but one conclusion, after looking carefully over both the law and the rules under which he acted; and if we find that he has acted within his right, then I think we ought to sustain him. But if we go beyond that, and if we ask ourselves whether the language that these men have been charged with using is such that a member of Parliament could endorse, either in this House or out of it, against members of Parliament, I think we can come to but one conclusion. I may be pardoned if I give you some of the choice epithets which were hurled at heads of Ministers of the Crown in this House. I have here some of them, as given in a report that is before this House, and I assume it to be correct. It says that Mr. Rémi Tremblay courted the loss of his position. Now, I may say in passing, that hon. gentlemen opposite contend that this gentleman apologised for using language in the temporary heat of debate, that he might not have used under other circumstances. But instead of apologising, at the very time he used that language he stated that he was likely to be called to account for it and that he was willing to risk his position. Is that like apology? Hon. gentlemen defending him say this was done in heat of debate, and afterwards he made an apology. The same gentleman, I believe, if I have not forgotten the distinction between the two, made a reference to that statement, and stated that he regretted that he was unable, except in an indirect way, to give the lie direct to the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe, that he was unable to do it to the Secretary of State, as he was able to do it to the member for Richmond and Wolfe. I say that was clearly the inference that must be drawn from the letter he wrote to the Speaker afterwards, in reply to the allegation set forth by the Secretary of State and by the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives). Did that look like an apology? It was rather a defence. He said they might be pardoned for having the temerity for standing by their convictions. They were honest enough to admit those were their convictions. And in my opinion it was a defence rather than an apology for what they had stated. He goes on to speak of those hon. gentlemen who represent the Crown to-day:

"Triumphant vice insults helpless virtue. Orangeism, that hideous monster which hell has vomited forth on Canada, raises its horrible head and casts a covetous eye on the prey which hateful treason is preparing to throw to it."

Is that language any hon. gentleman would tolerate against himself or any of his friends either in this House or outside of it? Is it language we should condone by allowing these men to hold responsible positions between two contending parties, believing that they will fairly discharge their duty impartially towards men against whom they have used such intemperate language. It is not reasonable, it is an insult to the intelligence of the House and of the people to say that we are obliged to retain such men in the employ of the Government, knowing they have used such very extreme and intemperate language. He says:

"The hangmen are jubilant."

Who are the hangmen? Those hon. gentlemen entrusted with the confidence of the people, some of them for more than a quarter of a century, those hon. gentlemen who stand so high to day in the confidence of the people as to have been returned, once, twice, three or four times not but very many times by enormous majorities. And those are the men designated as hangmen. He continues:

"They have succeeded in proclaiming to the world that we are a heartless and venal people."

Then he goes on to say:

"The re-election of all the hangmen Ministers, and the sustaining in power of Sir John Macdonald and his accomplices, stains with a fresh blot, still more ignoble than the first, our escutcheon, which had been already sufficiently degraded."

After the elections, when the country had given its verdict, Rémi Tremblay published the following:

"At last you have had your day of victory; you have insulted the country in its agony. For you, treachery is a title to glory; you heap opprobrium on the noble Gallic race."

"Everlasting shame to you, mercenary renegades, for whom lucre is the supreme law!"

"Courtiers of a sanguinary sect, traitors to your native land, traitors to your faith; degenerate sons of a manly race, conceived by self-interest, born of terror; applaud and shout for joy, you servile phalanx; we are branded, thanks to you, a heartless people."

And those men who used such language against Ministers of the Crown are men whom hon. gentlemen opposite would attempt to stand up and defend. I do not wonder that they themselves indulge in intemperate language both in and out of Parliament, when they are prepared to condone and to defend such language. I do not wonder that their followers use violent language, when hon. gentlemen, who by the rules of the House we are compelled to call honorable, defend such conduct either inside or outside of the House, they should be the last to do it. But the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), in his celebrated after-dinner speech, which was so different from his before-dinner speech, when he might say of himself: It is not I that speaks, but the spirit within me—he was speaking out of the fulness of his heart, said we hold hon. gentlemen opposite responsible for it, and we condemn them for it. Hon. gentlemen have been condemning them for years. They have held the Government responsible for years, and hon. gentlemen representing the Government and their friends in this House and the country are willing to bear that responsibility. They are willing to shoulder it, and the country will exonerate them for doing anything wrong. They say we hold them responsible for it and condemn them for it, and that some of us on this side of the House have dug their political graves. He spoke of the hon. member for Montreal (Mr. Curran), the Secretary of State and the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe. It ought to be at least one consolation to the hon. gentlemen opposite to remember that when they have indulged in prophecy they have only made faithful that saying of the Scriptures which declares there shall be many false prophets in the latter days, because their prophecy has nearly always been unfulfilled. It has rarely ever come true, and therefore it carries very small weight with hon. members of the House. But the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) comes forward with an amendment which, as the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) says in so many words condemns his own leader. I believe such to be the case. The hon. member for Bothwell goes further and lays down a proposition or allegation, the most unreasonable proposed by any man who pretended to have ability. What is the nature of the amendment? It is that if Mr. Speaker has the authority, under the circumstances, we think he was not justified in using it, and that in the opinion of this House the language those gentlemen used was no worse than the language used by other translators who are not arraigned before this House. But they are not men who were not arraigned, we are here to try. No matter how intemperate their language, we are not conversant with that language because it is not before us, but we are conversant with the language used by the gentlemen arraigned before this House and dealt with by the Speaker of the House previous to this debate. Those men are the men we are trying, and not those who have not been arraigned. It is absurd to contend that two wrongs ever make a right. If other gentlemen have been wrong that is no reason to say those men are right. It matters not what language may have been used by other gentlemen, the only language before us is that in the printed record, and it is for the House to judge whether that language was right or wrong. The hon. gentleman has referred to the conduct of various Governments, and has referred to employés of the Governments who have taken part in elections, and if you believe the contentions made by those hon. gentlemen, you would believe that both they and their party never indulged in anything like recrimination. Is not the history of the Government of Ontario, of the Government of Quebec, of the Government of Manitoba an argument to the contrary? All those Governments have adopted the same rule, and have invariably dismissed parties brought to their notice as violating this rule. It was only two days ago that we saw this occur in Manitoba in regard to a very large number. Does any hon. gentleman pretend to say that Mr. Greenway had not dismissed civil servants who have been in opposition to his Government and to his party? And it is only within a few days past that he has been dismissing them. Does not the hon. gentleman know that the Hon. Mr. Mercier in Quebec has dismissed those who are opposed to him? Why we see an account of it day after day. Does not the hon. gentleman know that the Hon. Oliver Mowat is following out the same rule invariably in everyone of those cases? And if it has not been carried on to a greater extent it is due to the fact because it has not been brought to the attention of the Government. In every Province the rule has been carried out, and those parties have been dismissed. It is not for us to say to-night whether the principle carried out to extremes is right or wrong. It is for us to say whether we support the action of the Speaker in discharging what we conceived to be fairly his duty. If you go beyond that to say whether we believe the conduct of those men is entitled to be condoned or condemned by this House, I maintain that no matter from what point we view it, we are bound to condemn that language and bound to sustain the Speaker in his action. I for one am prepared to do so, not only on this occasion, but on every occasion where a charge comes before this House, no matter which side it comes from, and where I find the offence as grievous as it is in this particular case.

Mr. FISHER It is not my intention at this late stage of the debate to at all go into the question of the authority of the Speaker as to his action in the dismissal of the Hansard translators. There are one or two points I wish to allude to and which I will do very briefly. I was not at all surprised that the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) quoted words from the Hon. Edward Blake's utterances upon constitutional questions and questions relating to the rights and privileges of people in this House. I have noticed on frequent occasions, Sir, that hon. gentlemen who differ from the Hon. Edward Blake on many questions when they wish to quote utterances of a broad and patriotic and statesmanlike character are obliged to go to the words of that gentleman to support their assertions and to make a point if they can. If the hon. gentleman's contention is correct that it is not right for public servants to engage in a political warfare I would like to know how it is that while the Secretary of State has insisted upon the dismissal of those three Liberal Hansard translators that he has not also insisted upon the dismissal of the other five translators who certainly have taken part in political discussions and certainly have taken a controversial position upon the political questions of the day. If the one side is to be dismissed and this is to be the rule of procedure by the Government, they ought to dismiss their own supporters as well. Perhaps I may not ask nor expect that they will agree to this. I do not believe, Sir, it is the intention or the practice of hon. gentlemen opposite to follow out that rule. I know, Sir, that in years gone by not only have they allowed particular supporters of themselves in the civil service to go to the country and canvass and work against gentlemen on this side, but I have myself in my experience suffered from that fact. Perhaps I ought not to say suffered, because I do not think that gentlemen who came to work against me accomplished any very great good for the party they worked for. In 1882 I was running for a vacant seat in the House of Commons, and a gentleman who was at that time in the employment of the Department of Agriculture was present in my county and spoke against me at various meetings and against the party to which I belonged with considerable vehemence and considerable virulence. Still that gentleman was not only not dismissed from his employment but he has since obtained preferment and advancement in the Civil Service at the hands of the gentlemen who employed him then to do that party work for them. I do not believe this is an isolated instance, for I know several occasions in which this occurred. I think the duty lies but ill in the mouth of the hon. Secretary of State and of the hon. gentleman now on the Ministerial benches to pretend for an instant that they are jealous of any abuses of a political character in the Civil Service which they control. But, Sir, I have no particular object in speaking here to-night, and it is to a large extent in consequence of the regret which I feel that the hon. Secretary of State in speaking of these gentlemen should, as I understood him, characterise them as blackguards and use very strong epithets in regard to them. I am not personally acquainted with the utterances or speeches of two of those gentlemen. In regard to one of them, Mr. Ernest Tremblay, of St. Hyacinthe, I am well acquainted with his utterance, with him personally, and with his conduct in the campaign to which allusion has been made. It happened, Sir, that in the last general election for this Parliament Mr. Ernest Tremblay was in my county. Mr. Ernest Tremblay in that contest assisted me in my campaign and I can say most emphatically that not only is Mr. Ernest Tremblay a well educated, well informed, and cultured gentleman, but that on every occasion that he spoke in that country or in that campaign his utterances were uniformly characterised by extreme courtesy to his opponents and by an absolute and entire lack of any references that would be considered personal or against which objection could be taken. Not only can I make this statement but I have in my hand a letter which was addressed to Mr. Ernest Tremblay by a gentleman in my county who has managed and controlled and conducted the campaign against me. I will read that letter so that you, Sir, may understand that those are not simply my own experience that I am expressing with regard to Mr. Tremblay but that they are also the opinions of those opposed to him in that campaign and against whom he spoke not personally but politically. The letter is dated :

"KNOWLTON, 7th June, 1887.

"MY DEAR SIR,—In reply to your letter of the 4th inst., I must say that I was present at most all the meetings you attended in Brome, P. Q., during the last Federal election. On no occasion did I hear you make a personal attack on any of the Ministers or any member of Parliament. You will pardon me if I say that I regarded your speeches rather as political lectures for a select assembly than as effective hustings addresses. You are at liberty to make such use of this letter as you please.

Yours truly,

"W. W. CUITO."

Now, Sir, I think that so far as Mr. Ernest Tremblay's conduct in the campaign to which allusion has been made is concerned, that this letter written by a former colleague of the Secretary of State, and a gentleman whose word the hon. the Secretary of State will take, and whom he holds in high estimation, will sufficiently dispose of the accusation in this respect. But, Sir, this is not the only proof that I have in regard to the conduct of that gentleman during the Federal election campaign. It happened at one time he was not occupied in my county and that he left my county to attend a public meeting in the County of Richelieu, at St. Roch. On the following day the Sorelois gave the following account of an encounter between Mr. Ernest Tremblay and Mr. Vanasse one of his colleagues in the Hansard debates translating staff. Mr. Vanasse was I understand at that time the editor or manager of the Sorelois, the newspaper from which I am quoting :

"Mr. Vanasse spoke the second time and then Mr. Ernest Tremblay, from St. Hyacinthe, not the one who attended the meeting held in this town last Saturday addressed the meeting in the interest of the liberal cause. If we do not always approve of the political opinions of Mr. Tremblay there is in his case one thing of which we do approve and which it is a pleasure and a duty for us to mention and it is his courteous manner of carrying on a discussion. The polite language which Mr. Tremblay used yesterday, contrasted peculiarly with the preposterous remarks and the rude and vulgar expressions of the young demagogue Lemieux, and the audience proved that people can perfectly make a distinction between a gentleman and a blackguard."

Here is the utterance of that gentleman's colleague, who met Mr. Tremblay on the hustings, and so far from characterising his language as the hon. Secretary of State to-day characterised it, as that of a blackguard—

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I did not.

Mr. FISHER. I am glad to hear the hon. Secretary of State say he did not; I am glad to find that he was more guarded in his language and that he did not use this extreme epithet which I thought he did use; but I fear that some of the epithets he did use were almost as bad. But I am glad to find that one who was present at that meeting, and had a better opportunity of knowing what Mr. Tremblay's language was like, though politically opposed to him, has characterised it in the way I said. I confess I am very much disappointed to find that this question in regard to these gentlemen has been brought up again this session. I am surprised to find a gentleman in the position of the Secretary of State, who, perhaps, on the spur of the moment, immediately after the campaign, might have felt hurt by the language used, and might have been indiscreet enough to allow himself to be carried away by his personal feelings, and to forget the dignified position he ought to hold in this Government; I am surprised to find that he has nursed his wrath for a whole year; and that, instead of this matter being allowed to pass away as a thing of the past, his vengeance must be carried out to the end. I believe conduct like this is unworthy of a Government. I was going to say that it was unworthy of the Secretary of State, but perhaps I had better not. If the hon. gentleman is prepared to say that it is worthy of himself, I am quite ready to let him think so. I am not going into the details of the question as to who ought to dismiss these gentlemen, or as to how their action should be treated, which I believe has been thoroughly discussed by gentlemen on this side. I must again express my surprise that this action has been taken, as I think the question might have been left in abeyance and this discussion avoided.

Mr. McNEILL. I am not going to enter into this debate; but I desire, with the indulgence of this House, to read a speech of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), which I intended to hand to the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin), but which I omitted to do in time. The hon. member for South Oxford in the session of 1886 made use of these words :

"Now, I have always myself contended, and I am quite willing to give the gentlemen opposite the benefit of that contention, that if a civil servant, a man in the employment of the Government, chooses to step out of the line, and chooses to canvass or make himself conspicuous in opposition to the candidate of the Government, he must take the consequence. I have always believed that it is impossible to maintain the discipline of the service if that occurs."

Furthermore, he says :

"If the hon. gentlemen who are the subjects of this motion are prepared to show that this gentleman actively interfered. I say that I, for one, would sustain the action of the Government in dismissing the civil servant."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. member for North Bruce has correctly defined the position I have always held on this question. I am of opinion that a civil servant who intermeddles in political matters takes his political life in his hands, and must abide by the consequences; and all I would ask in this matter is that the same rule and the same measure be extended to all those gentlemen of the translating staff who have interfered in politics. If it be right to dismiss the one, it is equally right to dismiss the other. That is the position I hold on that subject, and I think it is a position which is pretty generally held. It was substantially the position which I understood my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Laurier) to take regarding the merits of the question. Here we have seven or eight translators, all of whom it appears have been interfering actively. Some two or three are selected for dismissal. My hon. friend objects, and objects very properly, to those who interfered on one side, being servants of this House, servants of the whole body, being selected for dismissal, and the others being let go scott free. That is the objection of my hon. friend, passing over for the moment the point as to who had the right to dismiss, which is an entirely different point. The question as we now have it, is on the amendment of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), I believe. I am quite prepared to say that my own view of the case is that no civil servant at all should interfere in elections, and I would go even further, as I have said many a time, and say that I think it would conduce to the general welfare of this community and to the welfare of the civil servants themselves if they were relegated very much to the position to which we relegate our judges, and required in elections to abstain even from voting. That, however, is another matter; but I still adhere to the position I have always held as to the interference of the civil servants in elections.

Mr. DESJARDINS. It appears to me that after the expression of opinion of the hon. member who has just sat down, this discussion is practically closed. In fact, the ground which has been taken by the hon. leader of the Opposition has been left altogether in the speeches which have been made, and especially in the amendment of the hon. member for Bothwell. In fact, most of those who have spoken have tried to cover their retreat by exhuming from the past some speeches which at the time they were made seemed to have been after their own hearts. Well, I do not care for myself if they are quoted in the House, and if they have the same significance now, I do not know that they will be very creditable to the opposition themselves. If it is true that a certain number of members belonging to the Conservative party thought it necessary, in fulfilling what they considered their duty, to condemn the Government on certain matters, and afterwards, felt it to be their duty, as between the two parties, to continue to support the Government in power, I think it is not very creditable to the Opposition to invoke those expressions at the present time. I think it does not reflect a great deal of credit on the Opposition to go on making those quotations, because, although we condemned the administration of the Government in some measures, we believed it to be our duty and in the interests of the country to support them in their general policy. In fact, at the last general elections, all the members who opposed the Government on the Riel question declared, with the assent of the electors in our Province, that they would support the Government of the day, because, after all, they are the only Government which could represent the true interests of the country, and because the people had no more confidence in the Opposition then than they had before. I think it is my duty to say a few words as to the policy adopted by the Debates Committee with regard to those appointments. Up to 1880, this House will remember that the Debates were given under contract. In 1880, official reporters were appointed, and the Committee then took care to declare by resolution that those reporters would be officers, under the rules and regulations of the Speaker and the Commission of Internal Economy.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No.

Mr. DESJARDINS. In 1880, the official reporters were appointed regularly by a committee of the House, and the translation continued to be done under contract up to 1883. Then, when the translation was no longer done under contract, the committee did not consider it necessary to declare that the translators would be considered officers of the House; and it was only because they would not be obliged to do other duty than to translate the reports of the debates that they were paid only $1,000 per session, while the reporters got $2,000 with the understanding that after the session they would be at the call of the different departments or the Speaker to fulfil any necessary duty. That was the only reason why there was a distinction made, and we declared then that the translators would be only subject to the duty of translating the debates of the session. To show that we had no other idea, I will quote the contract that was made some years ago for the publishing of the Debates, by which the House will see that the committee understood then, that, being in existence only during the session, any work that was to be done after the House closed, was to be subject to the control and authority of the Speaker. Here is the contract:

"That if at any time during the continuance hereof, the contractors shall fail to carry out and perform the conditions of this agreement and contract and all his obligations under the same, to the satisfaction of any committee of the House of Commons aforesaid, which may be duly appointed to supervise the reporting and publication of the debates aforesaid, if Parliament be then sitting or of the Commissioners under the Act respecting the internal economy of the House and for other purposes, if Parliament be not then sitting."

Mr. LAURIER. Parliament was sitting.

Mr. DESJARDINS. Parliament was not sitting. Suppose the translators after prorogation had taken place, neglected to complete their work, who would call them to time, if not the Speaker? The House having prorogued the Committee of Debates is no longer in existence, and consequently the Speaker or the Commission of Internal Economy must deal with the translators regarding the completion of the work or their conduct, should they fail to accomplish their work or behave in such a way as to incur the condemnation of the constituted authorities. Further, it will be seen by the order of reference that the committee is appointed to supervise the printing and reporting and publishing of the Official Debates. It has nothing else to do. When the Speaker, who has been very unjustly attacked by an hon. member here for having acted in a partisan spirit in that matter, was called to dismiss those translators, he did not rush into it, he did not immediately dismiss them, but he sent letters to those who had been accused, and gave them a chance to make any explanation they might think fit to make. In fact, he consented to send to the committee of the House of Commons the complaint of the hon. the Secretary of State and of the hon. the member for Richmond and Wolfe, only towards the end of the Session. The committee took those letters into consideration, and when they saw that the accusation was not about the way the work was done, but was with reference to a breach of discipline, they said: We have nothing to do with that, and referred it to the Speaker. The rules of Parliament must be applied in the settlement of the questions like this. If the committee had taken authority in this matter, we would have had two conflicting authorities. Therefore, the majority of the committee, after having considered the whole question carefully, declared they had but one thing to do, and that was to declare, as stated in the report that was laid on the Table at the end of last Session:

"That whereas this committee has been established for the special object of looking after the reporting, the translation, and the publication of the Debates; and whereas, the complaints of the Secretary of State and the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe against the conduct of the gentlemen connected with the French translation of the Debates, made to the Speaker and referred by him to the committee, appeared to the said committee to be in the nature of a question of privilege and discipline, and therefore do not fall under the control of the said committee, be it resolved that the said complaint, with the answers thereto, be referred back to the Speaker, to be dealt with by him as he sees fit."

Objection is taken against the Speaker's dealing with that matter, after that report was sent to him. It was not necessary that the report should be carried by the House in order to give effect to that resolution. We see that concurrence in the reports of general committees is not necessary unless the resolutions brought before the House involve an expenditure of money, or the appointment of some one, or some action to be taken by the House. In this case, there was no action recommended. We merely declared in that report that we had nothing to do with the question, that it was within the province of the Speaker and under the authority of the Speaker to deal with that matter. I find here, on page 452 of Bourinot, that:

"It is the practice to move concurrence in the reports of committees in certain cases. For instance, the reports on printing are invariably agreed to, as they contain recommendations for the printing and distribution of documents, which must be duly authorised by the House

Also, reports containing certain opinions or resolutions are frequently concurred in, on motion. But, when the report does not contain any resolution or other proposition for the consideration of the House, it does not appear that any further proceedings with reference to it as a report are necessary. It remains in the possession and on the Journals of the House as a basis or ground for such further proceedings as may be proper or necessary."

They make an accusation against the Speaker because he took action on the report. He could not do without it. In fact, the committee not only placed that resolution in the report which was brought before the House, but a copy was ordered to be sent to the Speaker himself, so that he was cognisant of the fact that the opinion of the committee was that it had nothing to do with that question of discipline, but that in its opinion it was for the Speaker to deal with it, so that the Speaker and the House were in possession of that report, and it was for them or for any member who did not agree with that report, or who did agree with it, to take any proceedings on the report, to rise and move in the House so as to deal with that report, either against or for. I think that question is pretty well settled. I think, after all, the discussion can be resumed in the reading of the clause of the statute, which I think is as clear as it can be. The question before the House as to the jurisdiction of the Speaker is plainly defined by the statute itself, which says:

"If any complaint or representation shall at any time be made to the Speaker for the time being, of the misconduct or unfitness of any clerk, officer, messenger or other person attendant on the House of Commons, now or hereafter to be appointed, it shall be lawful for the said Speaker to cause an enquiry to be made into the conduct or fitness of such person; and if thereupon it shall appear to the Speaker that such person has been guilty of misconduct, or is unfit to hold his situation, the Speaker may, if such clerk, officer, messenger or other person has been appointed by the Crown, suspend him and report such suspension to the Governor, and if he has not been appointed by the Crown"—

They do not say if he has been appointed in such or such manner, or appointed by the Speaker, but he has not been appointed by the Crown.

"then, the Speaker may suspend or remove such person."

In fact, this has been so well acknowledged that since 1873, after the dismissal of Mr. Tassé, nobody was ever called to the Bar of the House when there was a complaint against him, but, upon calling the attention of the Speaker to the case, the Speaker would remove him, and that was all. I think that has been the practice. Some cases have been quoted, but I find there are others.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman has read the clause of the statute which says the Speaker has a right to remove or suspend an officer for incapacity or anything of that sort. I understood the hon. gentleman to argue that, in this case, that was a matter wholly within the jurisdiction of the committee. If the hon. gentleman is right in saying that the statute applies to this class of cases, he will see that he must be wrong as to the jurisdiction of the committee.

Mr. DESJARDINS. Not at all, because the House has given special authority to the committee to deal with the qualification of the translators. The House has acknowledged the right of the committee to recommend the appointment of the proper persons to be translators, and that is all the right given to the committee. In fact, that is precisely the explanation of that part of the clause of the statute. The House has legislated otherwise as regards the translation, because it has given the committee the right to deal with the qualifications of the translators, but, as to their behavior or as to questions of discipline, no authority has been given to the committee.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman will see that that provision is a statutory provision. The other is a mere resolution of the House, and, if he is right as to the construction of the statute, clearly no resolution of the House can override the authority given by the statute, and then the committee cannot have any authority at all.

Mr. DESJARDINS. It has never been contested, and it has been acted upon as the policy of the House, and the rule adopted by the House was never put in conflict with the statute. The first appointments made were those of the official reporters in 1840. What does the resolution say, which was concurred in by the House?

"That, as greater permanency in the personnel of the reporting staff would ensure a higher state of efficiency, the committee would recommend that six reporters be engaged and recognised as officers of the House, subject to such regulations as may from time to time be enacted by the Commissioners for the Internal Economy of the House."

That was the declaration which was made when the first officers under the committee on the Official Debates were appointed. They were immediately acknowledged as officers of the House. It is true that, when the translators were appointed, the Committee did not find it necessary to make the same declaration, because it was really considered that these officers could not be treated otherwise than those who were the reporting officers of the House. They were the same officers, and were acting under the same authority, and under the same rule, and I do not think it can be contended that it has ever been the idea or opinion of the House that they would constitute two conflicting authorities in this House; so the Speaker remains the authority of the House, the guardian of the dignity of the House, the one to whom any member who has been unjustly dealt with, who has been attacked or calumniated or insulted by any of the officers of the House, must apply for redress, and I think that is the only conclusion at which we can arrive.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. So many appeals have been made to me, to my good heart, as some hon. member says, that I cannot allow this debate to close without saying one word. If it was a question of personal resentment, I would answer immediately that I forget and forgive all that those gentlemen may have said against me. I have already shown my good will towards one of them, whose dismissal has been decided on by the Speaker, Mr. Poirier. He was a candidate against me in 1882 and in 1883, and in 1884 I recommended him to the Hansard Committee to be appointed as translator. It is true I was badly rewarded by him, as he said in the country that I must have lied here when I stated that I did not know he was an applicant for the position up to the time I had heard that he had been recommended. It is true I said that I was ready to forgive the past, and I said that he was qualified to be a translator. As for personal resentment, I have none. I only wish to maintain the authority of the Speaker, the authority of this House, and the dignity of its members. I say that the conduct of these men since the complaint was made against them, has been even worse than it was before against myself and other hon. gentlemen in this House. Since that time, if they had made the least apology to the Speaker, if they had only explained that the offensive language they used was in the midst of a wild excitement in the Province of Quebec, I would have been the first to ask the Speaker, and to ask my hon. friend from Richmond and Wolfe, to forgive and forget. But instead of that, they have been defiant in this House, they have been parading themselves in the corridors, and their conduct is not changed. If the decision of the Speaker of this House is set aside, the meanest messenger employed in this building would have the same right to set at defiance the authority of the Speaker, and to treat the members of this House, whose servants they are, with contumely. Again it has been charged that I am actuated by spite. That is not so. I do not wish to refer to the quotations that the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has made from the Monde, expressions that have never been written in the Monde by anybody who occupies a position here as a servant of the House. My hon. friend has been mistaken, misinformed, his quotation is incorrect, and is not true. I have never been accused in the Monde, or even in the Presse, of being a public thief; he will never find that in these papers, and his quotation is untrue. The hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), said there was a great difference between people according to the salaries they were paid; and that a man who is paid two or three thousand a year would have more respect for the House, more respect for the authority of the Speaker, than a man who is paid only one thousand for three months' work. Sir, I do not weigh the honor of the House and the dignity of its members by dollars and cents. The man who works here for three months for one thousand dollars should be subjected to the same rule as a third-class clerk who works for four hundred, or a messenger for three hundred dollars a year. These technicalities of the hon. gentleman are not worthy of this debate. When I made my complaint before the Speaker I did it in accordance with the same principle that guided me in 1882, when I was Premier of the Province of Quebec. I had an Order in Council passed saying that members of the Civil Service should not meddle conspicuously in elections, and should not go on the hustings and oppose candidates. I was exactly of the opinion of the hon. member for Oxford. I say now that if any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House makes a complaint against one of the officers of the House, belonging to my own party, and if the hon. member says that offensive expressions have been used against him publicly, I would at once vote to dismiss that officer. In 1882, in that report to Council, I stated that it would destroy the trust, and confidence, and the harmony that should exist between civil servants and members of the House of Assembly, if the former were allowed actively to engage in politics. I was not alone in taking that course. On the 11th April, 1887, the Hon. Mr. Mercier, Premier of Quebec, whom the hon. member for Oxford banquetted and applauded last night, said the same thing that I did, and he dismissed, whom? Not merely a civil servant, but he dismissed Mr. Lanctot, interpreter in the Court House at Quebec, a man learned in the law, a Queen's Counsel, whose knowledge of both languages entitled him to serve as interpreter in the courts. Here is the reason given for his dismissal by the Premier of Quebec.

"That Mr. Lanctot has presented himself as a candidate, that he has defended one party and opposed another on the hustings."

And the Premier concludes:

"Under the circumstances, and applying the principles laid down by the Order in Council of the 20th April, 1882,"—

That was my Order in Council.

—"with reference to the interference of employés in the election, that gentleman is dismissed."

My course in this case has been consistent with my course in the Government of Quebec. I have always been in favor, without regard to one side of the House or the other, of discipline among civil servants, and if the Speaker's decision was not supported in this case, any or all the messengers might leave this House at will, and we might be insulted by them under pretence that they are citizens, and can say everything they please of members of this House. I was almost ashamed to hear some hon. members say to-day that we cannot be supposed to take notice of all the obloquy and calumny that may be heaped upon us. Then the hon. member for Bothwell said that hon. members with whom I shake hands to-day have used expressions against me as offensive as any that I have complained of. That is not true, but if it were true, I can still meet those gentlemen afterwards, and shake hands, and be friends with them, and sit on the same platform and in the same Government. A public man must have no resentments, because we do not know what a few days may bring forth, and we should always act honorably towards one another. Some of my hon. friends have been sitting along side the Premier of this House, who were formerly strong opponents of his. The Hon. George Brown sat in the same Government with him, and God knows what they said of each other previously on public platforms. I know very well the hard language that has been used against me publicly by some hon. members who are now my friends, men who, at a time of great excitement in the Province of Quebec, expressed publicly their disapproval of the Government, but those hon. gentlemen never used in private such personally offensive language as would prevent us from meeting, and shaking hands, and being friends. Nobody will find in the mouth of the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron), for instance, who was probably one of those who was carried the furthest away in the excitement of 1885, that I was a public thief, that I was a dilapidator, that I was a liar. They will never find in the language of the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins), who was also in that movement, anything of a personal character. We must make allowance for the expressions of public men on political questions, which are far different from private and personal calumny. These hon. gentlemen were members of the House, they were not asking for favors, they were not in the service of the Government, they were their own masters as well as we, and they had a right to stand up with me as an equal. The hon. member for Bothwell reminds me of a story. A cook once said to his master: "Sir, your expressions are such that they require us to meet in an encounter." The master said: "Very well, but you must first leave the kitchen, and then we will see about it." I have not done anything from a feeling of resentment or spite, but in my actions I have been inspired only by a feeling as to what is due to the honor and discipline of the House.

Mr. PLATT. I rise to express my opinion to the House, and I never desired to force it upon the House with more tenacity than I do at the present time, when I find my opinion differs from that of a large majority of those who have spoken upon this question. The people of the country may be listening to this debate with more interest than we imagine. Members of Parliament may think that in the present discussion they are supreme, that they are much better than outside people; and I apprehend that when we are in Session we are supreme, but when His Excellency dismisses us at the close of the Parliament, all the citizens are placed on a par. I differ from those on this side of the House, as well as hon. gentlemen opposite who have expressed the opinion that members of the Civil Service, especially members of that part of the Service who are essentially members of the House receiving their authority from Parliament, shall be debarred from the rights of citizenship when this country is called upon to express its opinion on public questions. That is the ground upon which I object to the opinion expressed on the floor of this House, that there is a certain class of our community that should be debarred from expressing, at any time, their opinions upon the questions of the day. I am prepared to take my stand upon this ground, that even the Civil Service, even the Hansard translators, and above all those who are employed in the public service, the same as I might employ men in my service, should be debarred from citizenship, is to me something repulsive. I cannot for a moment accept the idea that we in this country, having so few people, a few millions, having as many thousands as we have millions in our employ, should allow men to be made slaves, should allow their intelligence to dwarf, should have no opinions of their own, should not dare to enter on public discussions when a general election comes round. I grant that during the session of Parliament they should act with a certain amount of courtesy to members of Parliament; but when His Excellency dissolves Parliament and an appeal is made to the people to express their opinions on the great public questions, then I say a civil servant is just as good as a member of Parliament or any body else; there is no man in this country having a right to vote who has not a right to express his opinion. It is only a matter of degree. Members of Parliament face each other, draw the sword of warfare and tell each other what they think face to face; but are we to suppose that those who are in the employment of the House of Commons or the departments of the Government have no opinions on these questions? If they have opinions, why in the name of common sense, should we not allow them to express those opinions. I take it that the moment His Excellency dissolves Parliament the people of the country are in common, no man is better than another, every man should be allowed to express his opinions just as he thinks, and although the Secretary of State may think that at certain times and on certain occasions it behooves a member of the Civil Service to pay obeisance to him or a member of Parliament, there is a time when these men feel they have within them just as much manhood as I have or as is possessed by that hon. gentleman or any member of Parliament. Why should we ask them to deprive themselves of the right of citizenship and the right to discuss the public questions of the day; and if they do express an opinion, why have they not the right to express an opinion just as strongly as has a member of Parliament? I wish no dividing line between the citizens of this country; I do not believe there should be a class of men who should make themselves slaves because they serve Parliament or the Government. Let us all be free men, let us have free speech, free thought, free action. I do not believe hon. members on this side need be afraid of the civil servants in the employment of the Government unless we have done something wrong, and hon. gentlemen opposite will not fear the expositions which intelligent men such as the translators may offer unless they have done something wrong. When we find these men acting upon their common rights as citizens, when they are manly enough to go forward on the public platform and expound their opinion on public questions, is that a reason why we should have them dismissed from their positions and slaves instead of free men occupy the positions which they occupied before? On no other subject do I feel more keenly than this, that we are not a sufficiently large population in this country to have any large number of our citizens made slaves, unable to express themselves, unable to vote, unable to act as their conscience dictates. I claim for civil servants of the country, for the Hansard reporters, for the translators that they are citizens as much as you and I are, Mr. Speaker, and while I do not question the legal right of the Speaker to act as he has done—that is a part of the question I leave to old parliamentarians and lawyers—but as citizens I think they have the same right as I have or any member has to act at a general election just as each man's conscience dictates. I say, therefore, that we should not support the dismissal of any civil servant so long as he acts as I act and anybody else acts according to his conscience and the best interests of the country which it is his bounden duty to serve.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am afraid I cannot earn the applause of my friends behind me, because I am not going to make a speech on this occasion. The subject has been fully discussed on both sides, every hon. member understands the question and the various phases of it as they appear in the different speeches addressed to the House. I am satisfied that the Speaker had the power which he has exercised, that the power was given to him by the complaint addressed to him as to the conduct of these three persons mentioned. I am satisfied these three persons come within the purview of the statute, that they are persons attendant upon the House, and, therefore, if the misconduct has been complained of, it is the Speaker's duty to act upon it and within the scope of his power to do so; and I also think, after hearing the language that has been used, and after an inspection of the papers laid before the House, that these men richly deserve the exercise of the power by the Speaker. I therefore, move in amendment to the said proposed amendment, that all the words after the word "That" in the original motion, where it appears the first time, be struck out, and the following substituted in lieu thereof:—

"Mr. Speaker, in dismissing Rémi Tremblay, E Tremblay and A. E. Poirier from their offices of translators of the Debates of this House, has acted within the scope of his powers, and has exercised such powers with a due regard to the dignity of this House, and to the consideration and respect due to its members."

Mr. LAURIER. I have just one word to say in answer to the right hon. gentleman. If the same measure of justice is to be applied to all the offenders who have equally offended in this matter, the resolution of my hon. friend does not go far enough and it should include all those who being actual officers of the House are not only during the elections, but are day after day writing letters and writing correspondence to their papers upbraiding members of this House. The practice should not be tolerated at all. I have said in my opening remarks and I repeat it here that it should not be tolerated that an officer of the House should engage in active politics. I think the principle is a wrong one. I agree with my friend from Oxford. I agree with everybody who has spoken on this side that if my hon. friend the Secretary of State wants to pose in a magnanimous position it does not lie in his dismissing men because they offended him, but let him say, we have been violating the rule, let us make a new rule and let us forget the past, and then we will think it magnanimous. Notwithstanding what my friend may say, I cannot believe he is actuated unconsciously, perhaps since he protests with anything but resentment. If he were not actuated by resentment he would say: I will make it a rule that those men will not in future trespass against the privileges of this House; but the result will now remain with the connivance of the hon. gentleman who leads this House that three men will be selected because they have not offended against the majority, and those who offended against the minority will be paid and protected by the majority of this House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not think the hon. gentleman ought to make that charge against us. If the hon. gentleman will look at the clause he will see that the Speaker has no power to dismiss or suspend an officer except a complaint or representation is made against him. A complaint and representation was made to the Speaker against those three men. No complaint or representation was made against the other five men of which the hon. gentleman now speaks, and until a complaint or representation was made to the Speaker he did not interfere. It was such complaint and representation that invested him with the power, and if a complaint or representation is made to the Speaker about the other parties at any time I have no doubt that the Speaker will take the same course in respect to those other parties as he was obliged to take on the representation made to him respecting the other three.

Mr. LAURIER. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to say one word in answer?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Certainly.

Mr. LAURIER. I will not make such a complaint against any of those translators here on the Debates, because they have been allowed the right in the past and I would think it unmanly on my part if I were to make any such complaint. I have a paper here full of extracts. It is true that I am not called a pendard or such expressions but I am treated to things not at all flattering of myself. I will not make any complaint against those translators so long as it is allowed by this House that they have a right to engage in politics or anything else after the session. So long as that is not forbidden I will not make a complaint.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have not taken any part in this debate, but I have listened to it with a good deal of attention and I am surprised at the course taken by the right hon. gentleman in moving this amendment.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear; oh, oh.

Mr. MITCHELL. Of course I expected that the claqueurs behind him would interrupt. I knew what was to come and I expected it.

Mr. RYKERT. You have been there.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have never been there a tool. I am surprised at the remarks of the right hon. gentleman. He says it requires a complaint to be presented to the Speaker before action can be taken by the Speaker in dismissing those men. I am not going to discuss the question whether the Speaker has the power to dismiss them or not. That has been discussed by other gentlemen in this House. In reference to the conduct of the right hon. gentleman who professes with such humility and suavity to present to this House the position in which the matter stands I am going to say that this debate has shown the other five translators are guilty of the same things as has been alleged against the other three. Those allegations have been made by gentlemen who occupy a position in this House which entitles their statements to be received with reliance and respect. The right hon. gentleman instead of moving an amendment to dismiss those men, who from enthusiasm or strong party feelings might be led away by the practice which prevailed—not alone amongst the employés of Parliament, but amongst the employés of the Government in Ottawa and elsewhere, who have taken part in public contests—I say it would have better become the right hon. gentleman if he had taken the stand, that after hearing the allegations against those three men, he should defer the matter until he considers the case of the others. I am not going to justify those men, for my opinion is this upon that question: that the employés of the Government, or the employés of this House, ought to refrain from taking any part in public contests when a contest is going on. They may have their opinions, they may even state their opinions, I would concede that, but they cannot take any very active part at all events in any public contest that goes on. It would better become the right hon. gentleman as arbitrator of the affairs of this country and as the absolute autocrat of this House if he in this case said: Those three men have had a charge laid against them because they have chosen to attack the hon. the Secretary of State and the case of the other men who were equally guilty upon the statements made in this Parliament, and upon the honor and responsibilities of members of Parliament must be considered. It would have been better for the right hon. gentleman to have taken the course, if he desired to be fair, of giving those charges consideration and if those other five men are equally guilty to deal out the same treatment to all alike, because hon. gentlemen on that side of the House have brought charges which hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have refrained from doing, he should not dismiss those three men and keep the others in office.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh! oh!

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes. Oh, oh! It would better become the right hon. gentleman, if he desired to show any spirit of fair play and distribute that justice which he professes to distribute, to have said to this House: We will defer consideration of this matter until we have considered the cases of the others and are in a position to treat all alike. For my part I shall vote against the amendment not because those men have the right to interfere in public affairs at all, but I vote against it as a protest against the injustice done to those men by the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The First Minister professes to act in a fair manner towards those three employés of the House whom he says have been complained against and who deserve dismissal. The hon. gentleman knows that the members on this side of the House have again and again proposed that those employed in the public service should cease to be political partisans on either side the moment they are employed. That is a principle which the hon. gentleman has never conceded, and so far as those translators are concerned it was said at the time of their appointment that the House gave employment to them but for a very small portion of the year and that their salaries were less than the ordinary reporters upon the Official Debates, and that they were to be at liberty to engage in ordinary avocations whenever they were not employed here. It was well known at the time they were appointed that some of them were on the political press of one side and some on the political press on the other side, and it was expressly stated by the committee at whose instance they were appointed that they were not to be interfered with in their political freedom or independence. That was the position in which the parties stood, and the hon. Secretary of State has complained against those men for exercising their rights as free men.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. No.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes, and the hon. gentleman who moves the amendment is acting on that assumption. Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman cannot have forgotten that he caused to be appointed here a number of men who were engaged as reporters on the political newspapers supporting him, as extra sessional clerks at $4 a day, and that they never wrote a line in the public service, but received their $4 a day to contribute to those newspapers which were weekly employed in maligning and misrepresenting hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. And now, for him to say that he is prepared to sustain the Speaker in dismissing an official the moment he is complained against on that side of the House, is a very extraordinary statement to make.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did not say that.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then I will not charge him with saying it, but I will say that the hon. gentleman is prepared to sustain the speaker in dismissing an official from the public service as soon as he attacks any one on that side of the House, but he is not prepared to dismiss him when he attacks hon. gentlemen on this side.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did not say that either.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Well, that is the clear inference, not only from what the hon. gentleman has moved and said, but from what he has been doing for the last ten years. Now, I wish to call the attention of the House to this section of the Act, because I do not think it is open to the construction the First Minister has put on it. At all events, that is not the clear and obvious construction that has been put on it by the House. What has the House been doing? A committee of the House has been appointing certain officers; it has exercised supervision over them; it has done what the Speaker is authorised to do with regard to the officials here spoken of; it has judged of their fitness, and has decided whether they ought or ought not to be retained in the service. It is well known that no decision of this House can override a statute; but if these people come under this Act, this committee has been overriding this statute. The term "other person" in the Act does not refer to this class of officers, but only to those who are appointed either by the Speaker or by the Crown. These officers are appointed by neither, and therefore the House has properly interpreted the Act in authorising a committee to judge of the fitness or unfitness of these men, and not the Speaker. The House has for the past five years been assuming that by doing this it has not been going in the face of this statute. Without interfering with the statute at all, the services of these men might be dispensed with precisely as they were appointed, by resolution of this House. Now, Sir, it is perfectly clear that the resolution of the hon. gentleman is a mere ad captandum resolution. It is one intended to perpetuate a personal wrong done to these parties. It affirms a jurisdiction which under the provisions of this law is not given to the Speaker. It is making the declaration that the House has for the past five years been guilty of a usurpation of functions not given to it by the Act. The hon. gentleman shakes his head, but I say it is impossible for him to escape from that position, and he now asks the House to stultify itself and to declare that it has been acting contrary to the provisions of the statute for the last five years. I trust that no hon. gentleman on this side of the House, at any rate, will be guilty of so gross an act of inconsistency, as well as so gross a wrong, as would be effected by the adoption of this resolution.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am speaking to the question. If the hon. gentleman who is interrupting me had one tithe of the interest at stake that there is at stake in this matter, he would be ready to spend half a night of the time of the House; and he is ready to do a gross act of injustice to three men who have done no wrong and who are entitled to his protection. The hon. gentleman who is interrupting me is ready to take the bread and butter out of the mouths of men who are just as honest, as intelligent, as earnest in defense of what they believe to be right and fair, as the hon. gentleman himself is. It is a matter of too much consequence to those parties to be treated as cavalierly as the hon. gentleman proposes to treat them. Here are men who are shown from the extracts that have been read to have said more violent things of the gentlemen on the Treasury benches than those whom they propose to dismiss, and they do not even complain of them, because they belong to the party behind them; and they now level their attacks daily against hon. gentlemen on this side of the House and are maintained in that position. Sir, this resolution is a resolution to discriminate between men belonging to different political parties. It proposes to mete out one measure of justice to one portion of the public service, and another and different measure to another portion, and I trust, Sir, that this country will not fail to mark the course hon. gentlemen opposite are taking. Why, the right hon. the First Minister sustained here last year a man who, in violation of his oath of office and in violation of the statutes, did a gross wrong to eighty members on this side. And what has he done to him now? He has put him into the Agriculture Department, in charge of an important portion of the public service, with a salary of $600 or $800 more than he received before. It will be possible, with that fact before the country, to convince any one that the hon. gentleman proposes to punish these men, not because they have done a wrong, but simply because they happen to be Reformers.

STEAMBOAT INSPECTION ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. FOSTER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 99) to amend the Steamboat Inspection Act. He said: This Bill makes one or two not very important amendments to the present Act, and provides for the issue of permits on examination and report by the Inspector of Boilers to persons who carry passengers on their boats in certain waters, which are defined.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

DETENTION OF A REGISTERED LETTER.

Mr. McMULLEN (for Mr. LANDERKIN) asked, Is it the intention of the Government to pay to Mrs. Barbara Winkler, of Newstadt, the balance of principal and the interest on the sum of $689.60, contained in a registered letter sent her by the Bank of Commerce, Walkerton, on the 22nd of June, of which sum she received only $688.80 on the 12th of December, 1887, and whether any steps have been taken by the Government to discover and punish those guilty of the detention of said letter?

Mr. SPEAKER. I suppose the hon. member is authorised to ask this question by the hon. member in whose name it stands?

33-1888-1

Mr. McMULLEN. Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER. It would be better to state that, as otherwise it would be irregular.

Mr. McLELAN. The Government has made no payment whatever to Mrs. Barbara Winkler, of Newstadt, on account of the money contained in a registered letter to her address which was lost in the Walkerton Post Office. The money paid to her was paid by the postmaster of Walkerton, whose office was responsible for the letter going astray. Mrs. Winkler has received $688.80 out of the amount of $689.60, and for the amount of 80 cents remaining unpaid she must prosecute her claim against the postmaster of Walkerton. The case was thoroughly inquired into at the time by the Government inspectors, but they were unable to discover that anyone connected with the Post Office Department was in any way responsible for the loss of the letter.

DISTRIBUTION OF THE DEBATES.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before we proceed to the Orders of the Day, I wish to call the attention of the House to the numerous complaints that have been made by members of the press, that they have not received, as has heretofore been the custom, copies of our Hansard. I think some of the hon. gentlemen who preside over the distribution of the Hansard are here, and I would be glad to know from them if steps have been taken to remedy these complaints, because I must say it has been most unfortunate if the Hansards have not been distributed to the newspaper press regularly. It is almost the only way in which the people at large can obtain a reasonable return for the very large sum of money the Debates cost us; and if through any inadvertence that has been done, I hope that members of the committee will rectify it without delay.

Mr. DESJARDINS. I do not know the reason of the failure to distribute the Hansard, but I know that the committee has given no orders to have the supply cut off. I will enquire and ascertain why it is that the Debates have not been sent out as usual to the newspaper press.

Mr. MITCHELL. I may remark upon this point, that I enquired at the Herald office on Saturday in reference to the complaints that were made, and I find that we received the copies of the debates. But I understand that country papers are complaining that they have not received it. The city papers I believe have no cause of complaint.

Mr. HESSON. I think that hon. gentlemen are under a misapprehension upon the whole question. Complaint is not made by the newspapers that they are not receiving the daily issue of the Hansard, but that they are not supplied by the Debates Committee with a bound copy.

Mr. MITCHELL. Oh, no.

Mr. HESSON. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. You hear that complaint all around the House, and if you will simply open your ears you will hear it from the gallery.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The reason I mentioned the matter is that I have received information that during the last debate the Hansards have not been supplied to the country press.

Mr. GILLMOR. It occurs to me that we should distribute rather the corrected copies of the Hansard, instead of the daily issue. I think the corrected copies of the Hansard is what should be distributed to the press. All the members of Parliament get the first copy before it is corrected, therefore they have it as it is taken by the reporters. But these copies that are not corrected go over the whole Dominion, and the people see the report of a man's speech with all its imperfections and the mistakes that may arise in taking down the speech, or some omissions that may have been made. He meets that everywhere, and he says: "That is not my speech as corrected." All the members of the House have an opportunity to correct their speeches, and it is the corrected speeches, in my opinion, that ought to go to the country; then, whenever a member is called to account for his speech, he refers to the corrected copy, and there is what he said. Of course you may say that members may alter their speeches; but I think there is not much danger, because the whole of the 211 members have heard the speeches, and if there has been any alterations made, it can be detected. But sending out the daily issue is a great evil, and I think it would be better to have the corrected copies go out to the country and the press. I am anxious that the press should have just what an hon. member said, and intended to say.

Mr. WELSH. I quite agree with the hon. member that the Hansard should be corrected before it goes out. I will give you an instance in point. When I was speaking here the other day, I made the remark that I had "a boatswain" in my employ, and it was taken down as "a Boston man." Now, I am sure that no hon. member of this House would wish a statement of that kind to go to the public, an incorrect statement. I think the suggestion of the hon. member is a very good one, that we should send out the corrected report, and I think the hon. gentlemen who have control of this matter should take it in hand.

Mr. EDGAR. I see that the hon. Minister of Customs is in his place, and he can recollect that on Monday he suggested an amendment to the motion that I made for papers and correspondence between the Canadian and American Governments about wrecking vessels, limiting that motion to the papers since the last return; but he was not able at that time to tell the House what the date of the last returns was, and he said that he would do so. I would like to know from him the date of the last return, so that we may refer to it. I would like also to suggest to the Minister that the returns should be brought down at as early a date as possible, in order that it may be before the House when the Bill comes before us on that subject which the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) has in hand. With reference to the matter which was spoken about just now, the Hansard, I quite agree with the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) in reference to imperfect reports. I remember that on a former occasion—if I may be allowed to refer to a former debate, without being irregular—I happened to remark that an hon. gentleman on the other side of the House spoke with the airs of "Turvy Drop," and I was horrified to see in the Hansard next day that I was charged with saying that the hon. gentleman spoke with the airs of "a turkey cock."

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). We have had all these questions in the past in connection with the Hansard. If you adopt the principle that none shall go to the country except those that have been previously corrected, it simply postpones the receipt of them by the newspapers for several months. Now, any one who knows anything about newspapers, knows that they cease to be of any value if they do not get the material with which they make their comments for two or three weeks after the event, when the matter ceases to be of any practical interest. The mistakes that the gentleman refers to are mistakes that are almost inevitable, and I think that we may fairly say of the Hansard staff, and the reporting of our debates at the present moment, that I do not think there is to be found anywhere—and I use that term in the broadest sense—half a dozen gentlemen who do their work more conscientiously, and on the whole, more satisfactorily, than the gentlemen who are at the table now. The other question, as to whether the debates, as officially revised, should go to the press, is, of course, a separate question altogether, and it involves a separate explanation. For myself, I would like very much to see them get the corrected copies, because all these reports are matters of record, and newspaper editors, in discussing these questions later on, have to refer to the Hansard, and it is a very decided advantage if they can refer to the corrected copy, as bound. As for these little errors that occur, where one hon. gentleman says that he was made to say he was employing a Boston man instead of a boatswain, and the other remark, that an hon. gentleman spoke like a turkey cock instead of Turvy Drop, these are mistakes that almost any person in hearing them, especially the latter, might make; but these are technical errors that are of very little importance. I think it would be a very serious matter for the press if they did not get the Hansard before it had passed through the hands of the members, and through the hands of the printers the second time.

Mr. TROW. It has often seemed astonishing to me that there are not more errors in the Hansard, and I am frequently astonished to find the speeches of hon. gentlemen so correctly reported. Private discussions go on all round the Chamber when hon. gentlemen are speaking, and I am surprised at the accuracy of the reports; it is evident to me that the reporters are thoroughly up in their profession, or otherwise they could not perform their duties in the perfect manner they do perform them.

Mr. SPROULE. I think, when this subject is under discussion, it would be well to have a general expression of the House in regard to it, because I believe the opinion is prevalent throughout the country that it would be a great improvement, even with the delay that would occur, if a revised copy of Hansard were sent to the press. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) says it would be a serious matter if it was not sent out immediately to the press, but, in any event, the copies of Hansard can only reach the press a hundred miles or so of the capital within a day or two, those going down to Prince Edward Island, Halifax, Manitoba and British Columbia not reaching there for several days. It could not make much difference if there was a few days' longer delay, provided a correct copy was sent out. The Hansard is referred to principally by the weekly newspapers throughout the country, and if Hansard sent out this week were too late for next issue it could be used the following week, and it would be almost equally fresh. Complaints are constantly received in regard to this matter. Members are called upon to account for speeches they make in this House, and they are able to question what it was represented they did say, and they were entitled to do so, because they did not correct the original copy of the report. When we consider the difficulties the reporters have to contend with, first, in regard to hearing accurately what is said, then in taking it down, then in transcribing it, and inaccuracies take place; add all these together and it will appear that the daily issue sent out is literally full of mistakes and of little or no use. Now, we can easily get the copy of speeches within twenty-four hours; twenty-four hours after that I think almost every member would correct it, and we would have a delay of only two days, and a great benefit would accrue from a correct copy going out of what members said, and which they must stand by, and for which they would be expected to be held accountable. It is most important that this should be done, and from the expressions I have heard from different members on both sides of the House, this amendment should be made so that correct copies would be sent out.

Mr. LAURIER. There is another matter to which I desire to call the attention of the House, and it is the most objectionable practice which has grown up of late, and which, if pursued in, will surely impair the good relations that ought to exist between the two sides of the House. Every division we have had during the present Session has been characterised by most offensive manifestations on the part of some hon. gentlemen opposite against some hon. members on this side of the House. There seem to be some hon. members who are made the butt for hooting and insults. Hon. gentlemen opposite must admit that if the practice is continued it must provoke retaliation, and retaliation would be far more desirable than the practice itself. I can understand there will be, and must be, differences of opinion in the House, but every member has a right to expect that his opinions will be respected by his colleagues. In so far as I am concerned in this matter from the position which I occupy, I shall endeavor to see that not only the debates but the proceedings will be characterised and conducted—and I invite the co-operation of my hon. friends on this matter—with that courtesy which should prevail in such an assembly as this. At the same time I shall expect that the same courtesy be extended to us by the other side of the House. Last night the division was conspicuous by the most offensive manifestations, and I have only this to say in conclusion, that I hope in future such manifestations will not take place as occurred last evening.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I agree with the hon. gentleman that it is very important each side of the House should respect the other side, and each member should respect all the members of the House. Of course, the hon. gentleman has observed certain manifestations that have taken place during divisions, but I must say that, with my recollection of last Session, I cannot but feel that similar manifestations were made towards certain members on this side of the House by hon. members opposite. Perhaps that would not be a good reason for one side or the other to retaliate, but it shows, at all events, that if there has been any feeling in this direction on one side there has been the same feeling on the other side of the House. Therefore, without naming or recriminating I think, speaking for this side of the House, that we agree that it would be a great deal better that no manifestations should be made against any hon. member. Of course, there is always allowed the parliamentary manifestation of "hear, hear," when a member's vote seems to be a little extraordinary to members of the House. That is the parliamentary way of showing approval or disapproval on one side or the other, and I am sure the hon. gentleman would not wish to put a stop to that proper way of manifesting one's sentiments; but I am sure we all agree, as well as the Opposition side represented by the hon. gentleman, that the proper way of conducting the business of this House is to cease on both sides from making manifestations of that kind.

Mr. LAURIER. I do not exactly remember what took place last Session, but perhaps the hon. gentleman has a stronger motive for remembering what took place than I have. I thought, as hon. gentlemen opposite were far more numerous than those on this side of the House, there were more manifestations on the other side than on this; but, at all events, let that be so or not, I hope that we will agree that past issues be buried and a better understanding be had in the future.

Mr. MITCHELL. I quite agree with the suggestions made by the leader of the Opposition, and I was glad to find the leader of the Government for the time being assented to the suggestion that special manifestations should cease. The act of calling out "hear, hear" is not very offensive, but there are other calls which have been made to certain members which are really personally offensive. Both parties are somewhat to blame. The only party really free from blame in this House is the party represented by myself, and I may say for that party that I will endeavor to pursue the course pointed out by the leader of the Opposition and accepted by the leader of the Government for the time being, and refrain from anything like very offensive personal remarks.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). I think the hon. gentleman has undertaken a most important task, and a more difficult one for him to perform than that of the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. BOWELL. I promised the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) to tell him when the last report upon wrecking and tugging was laid before the House. If the hon. gentleman will turn to the Sessional Papers of 1881, No. 9 of 37 and 38, No. of paper 50, he will find the report.

Mr. EDGAR. That was the matter to which I referred.

Mr. BOWELL. Yes.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS ACT.

Mr. AMYOT. Do I understand that the Government have abandoned their Bill to amend the Controverted Elections Act.

Mr. THOMPSON. The Government do not propose to introduce any Bill to amend the Controverted Elections Act, but we have as the hon. member will see on the Order paper a Bill to amend the Dominion Elections Act on the same subject as his Bill. I would suggest that he should let his proposal stand until that Bill is in committee, and then we can discuss the whole subject more easily.

Mr. AMYOT. I suppose there will be the same chance given to my Bill to have it considered if it is not included in the Government Bill. I understand the Bill on the Dominion Elections Act and on the Dominion Controverted Elections Act are two different things. The hon. Minister says his Bill on the Dominion Elections Act comprises the same thing as mine, and I have no objection that it should stand. I do not care who proposes it if it becomes law.

Mr. THOMPSON. The Government Bill I referred to is not to amend the Controverted Elections Act but to amend the Elections Act, and it does not contain the provision which the hon. gentleman has in his Bill. It seems to me it would be more convenient if he would let it stand until the Government Bill is in committee, when he might move, if he adheres to his view about this provision, to add it to the Bill relating to Elections, although it is not technically under the same Act.

WRECKS ON THE GREAT LAKES.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Dawson for an Order of the House for a return respecting Canadian vessels lost or wrecked on the great lakes during the past season of navigation.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Speaker, when this matter was last brought before the House the discussion was postponed until the hon. the Minister of Public Works should have brought down his report, and now that the report is in the hands of hon. members, they will be able to see the extent of the losses and the number of wrecks on the great lakes. This is a very important subject. It is too much the custom in a great many quarters to look upon those lakes as mere mill ponds, and as seas requiring very little attention and in which there is very little danger, but lakes that run up to the length of 400 miles and have a width of 200 miles, as Lake Superior has, would be formidable seas anywhere. The losses which have occurred last year are much less in number and less in amount than those which occurred some years previously. During the last six years the losses on the great lakes have been exceedingly heavy. A number of fine steamers have been lost and a great many valuable lives have perished. But, as I said, the number has been fewer and the amount of loss involved much less last year. That, Sir, is due in a great measure to the improved manner of the inspection. The Government now inspect the hulls and machinery of steamers, and that, I believe, has led to a great saving in life and property. A great deal has been done, but a great deal remains still to be done, and this inspection should be carried somewhat further than it has hitherto been carried. It should extend to vessels which now escape inspection, and I shall touch on that point later on. In the meantime I will draw attention to what the report says of the losses that have occurred on the great lakes last year :

"The barge Oriental, of Kingston, 328 tons register, left the port of Charlotte, U. S., on the 23rd of October last, with a cargo of coal 650 tons in weight, in tow of the steam tug Scotia. The vessel was 21 years old, and was probably worth $1,000. Her crew consisted of a captain, who held a certificate of service as master, a mate, who was an un-certificated man, and two deck hands. There was also a woman cook on board. The vessel encountered very heavy weather and when about three miles from Port Dalhousie the tow line parted. The Oriental went down with all on board and the Scotia made for the port of Niagara, which she reached in safety."

Now, Sir, here is the case of a vessel into the loss of which an investigation was held and it was clearly proved that this vessel was not only unseaworthy but that she was overloaded, and that it was in the power of people consigning freight in order to make money, to put an unseaworthy vessel to sea, the result of which was the loss of five lives. Five poor people were carried to the bottom without any means of saving themselves. That is one instance. Now the next thing spoken of in the report is the loss of the California.

"The propeller California, of Montreal, left Chicago for a port in Canada on the 1st October last, with three passengers and 22 of a crew. She had on board 20,000 bushels of corn, and 696 barrels of pork on deck. On the morning of the 23rd she encountered very heavy weather and commenced to leak; the cargo also shifted and increased the difficulty of steering the vessel to such an extent that she would not answer her port helm. The violence of the waves drove in the anchor shutter, and the vessel shipped a great deal of water through the opening. The leak continued to gain and put out the fires, leaving the vessel at the mercy of the wind and waves, and she finally foundered on the night of the 3rd of October off St. Helen's Island, towards which the vessel was drifting. The vessel was built in 1873, and was cut in two and had 35 feet added to her length in 1883. She was 900 tons gross and 580 tons register tonnage. By this casualty seven of the crew and two of the passengers were lost, although the vessel had four boats, which left her when she foundered with a few persons in each."

Here is another case of overloading. There could be no doubt that that vessel could only carry 22,000 bushels of wheat or corn, and that those 690 barrels of pork put on as a deck load was the cause of her loss. Here is also a statement of the total amount of loss :

"The disasters reported to this department as having occurred to vessels on the inland waters of Canada, and to Canadian vessels on American inland waters during the year 1887, were 39, and the tonnage involved was 13,137 tons register. The number of lives lost was 21, and the amount of loss, both partial and total, to vessels and cargo, as far as estimated, was $90,915."

Now, Sir, last year, although wrecks were fewer and the total amount of loss less than ordinary years, here is an actual loss of over $90,000, and it becomes a very important matter to enquire how this loss could best be prevented. I think, Sir, there is one obvious way in which that can be prevented, and that is to compel the barges, the smaller craft, and the craft which are now very little looked after, to undergo an inspection as well as the large steamers. I have recently received several letters from experienced lake captains about this system of putting unseaworthy barges in tow of steamers, and the result of enquiries which

I have been making may be taken from what I will now read :

"Referring to barges in tow of tugs, they should have the stability of a sailing vessel, and if not of sufficient sail power to take care of themselves under all circumstances, they at all events should be provided with good This in itself might be the means of saving the crew and vessel. A ground tackle, that is, good anchors and chains suitable to their tonnage, good boat, with all necessary appliances ready for immediate use : life-buoys and life-preservers for the crew, properly placed ; a captain and mate with certificates, good substantial windlass and bits, tow ports well secured, food, tow lines of sufficient length. Barge towing is very hazardous, and every reasonable precaution ought to be used. When you consider the tug and her tow on a lee shore, the tow line parting and the barge left helpless, her anchors, handled by competent men, might even then save both crew and vessel. The tug towing the barge has no security that her machinery may not give way at a perilous time, showing plainly the necessity of the barge being well found in crew and outfit. The unseen vessels that are under repairs : Manitoba, Detroit, Champion, Owen Sound, Frances Smith, Collingwood, Southern Belle, Deseronto. The hull inspectors, up to this date, know nothing of repairs done to the resurrected craft ; they have no power."

From another source I have this :

"Hull inspectors are not privileged to use their discretion in matters of inspection, materially affecting their duties. They are hampered by not being allowed to see vessels undergoing repairs. When closed up and completed the repairs are not visible to the inspector, and then the only possibility of ascertaining the correctness of the statements furnished by owners of the repairs, is redocking, which causes great expense and very great dissatisfaction."

Now, Sir, that is a point to which I would draw particular attention, the necessity of having a vessel inspected when she is undergoing repairs. She can then be easily seen. But after she has been patched up and painted over, and when everything looks smooth outside, it is very difficult for the inspectors to ascertain whether or not there is anything wrong with her. Another frightful source of danger is sending out vessels overloaded in the fall. There should be some means found of preventing that ; and I think it could be prevented, as I suggested on a former occasion, by giving authority to the Customs officers at the different ports to decide when a vessel is overloaded. In all of these lake-going vessels there should be a line such as that known in England as the Plimsoll line, beyond which they should not be allowed to load. It is not in the regular steamers that the danger lies. On Lake Superior there are a number of very fine steamers, such as the Canadian Pacific Railway steamers, those that ply from Sarnia, and those that ply from Owen Sound. There are no vessels in the world superior to those, or better adapted for the navigation for which they are used ; in fact, they are floating palaces. Those vessels are always inspected, and it is not in them that the danger lies. It is in those patched-up vessels, old schooners, not properly rigged, which are sent out in tow of steamers, and which are cut adrift the moment danger arises, and are very likely to be lost. One cause of disaster hitherto has been that the lakes were not properly surveyed ; but I am very happy to say that that risk is likely no longer to exist. There has been an admirable hydrographic survey going on from year to year on those lakes, and I hope it will be continued until a complete survey is obtained. The survey made by Admiral Bayfield, which has immortalized, and very justly immortalized him, was made under circumstances which did not admit of his finding all the shoals existing in those lakes ; but the hydrographic survey which has been going on since has revealed a great many hidden shoals and rocks, which will hereafter appear on the charts. In order to convince the House of the necessity of going on with these surveys and the necessity of providing properly for the navigation of the great lakes, I need only draw attention to the enormous traffic which is springing up on them. Last year I took occasion to say that the traffic of the great lakes passing through the Sault Ste. Marie canal was nearly equal to that passing through the Suez canal, which passes the traffic of three continents, Europe, Asia and Africa. Would it be believed, Sir, that on these inland lakes we have a traffic not very far short of that traffic? I have not precisely what it was during the past summer; but in 1886, 4,527,000 tons of freight passed through Sault Ste. Marie canal; and I am told that during the past year the freight tonnage exceeds 6,000,000 tons. Now, Sir, that represents an enormous traffic, which you may form some idea of when I tell you what the traffic of the Suez Canal has been. In 1879 the total freight traffic of the Suez Canal was 3,236,000 tons, in 1880 it was 4,344,000 tons, in 1881 it was 5,794,000 tons, and it has gone on increasing until in 1886 it had reached over 8,000,000 tons. But here is an inland canal of North America, the traffic of which is not so very far short of the traffic of the Suez Canal. Now, Sir, what does all this show? It shows that there is a traffic growing up on our great lakes that should be adequately provided for. It shows that every precaution ought to be taken to make the navigation of those lakes as safe as it can possibly be made. I am happy to say that on the Canadian side of the largest of these lakes the navigation is naturally very safe, and with a few more lights and a few additional harbors, the whole traffic to and from Sault Ste. Marie would be brought in that direction, through Canadian waters, calling at Canadian ports, and giving life to Canadian traffic and trade. I believe that I have drawn the attention of the department to all that I can think of at present in relation to this matter, and I hope the inspection of these old barges and the preventing, if possible, of their going out will not be neglected. I have a list here, Inland Lloyds special register for 1887, and it is perfectly frightful to see by it the number of old wooden vessels, from 25 to 36 years of age, that are being patched up and repaired. The traffic on the great lakes will be very large this summer, and if all these vessels are to be allowed to go forth in tow of steamers, the temptation to send them out will be great because the traffic will be great and the profits large; and unless something be done, we may look to a larger and more deplorable loss of life than has occurred in years past.

Mr. DAVIN. I have great pleasure in supporting the motion of my hon. friend. I think that the Department of Customs might be very properly utilised for carrying out the intentions that have been so well explained by the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson). In looking over the report of the Department of Marine, I find that, in the case of the California, the account given there can leave no doubt whatever in the mind of anyone that that vessel was unseaworthy. She was valued at $27,000, although unseaworthy, and insured for $21,000. We may be perfectly certain that the vessel was not worth $27,000, and of course the temptation to overload a vessel like that and to send her out in an unseaworthy condition, taking all the risks, is very strong to the owner of such a vessel. The question is one that appeals not only to our humanity, but to our esteem for our reputation as a great commercial community, and it is one in which the western people are deeply interested. I would therefore urge strongly, in supporting the motion of my hon. friend, this subject on the attention of the hon. the Minister of Marine. It is not necessary, so lucid and so full has been the statement of my hon. friend, that I should say more than that, having looked into the question and knowing something about it, I can endorse all that my hon. friend has said upon this subject.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I would like to say only a few words in order to call the attention of the House to the report made by the owner of the barge Oriental, the case of which was referred to by the hon. member for Algoma, when he made this motion some weeks ago. As regards the subject-matter of his motion, the hon. gentleman has my most cordial assent and support. I think it is of the deepest moment that vessels should be thoroughly inspected and every precaution taken to prevent their leaving shore, unless they are in a seaworthy condition. Thousands of lives are entrusted to them, and every precaution should be taken to ensure the safety of those lives. If there is a Plimsoll in England, we ought to have one here in Canada, who will see that the lives of these poor men, who have to earn their living by going down to the deep, should be protected; and I hope the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will not allow the inspectors to do just as they please, but will see that they do their duty, and thus take care that these old vessels, of which the hon. member for Algoma has spoken, are made tight and seaworthy before being allowed to leave port. But, while I regret very much the loss of life which took place last year, we must, in justice to the owner of the barge Oriental, let him state his own case, and he has sent me this letter, a portion of which I think it my duty to read to the House. He says:

"That the barge was not an unseaworthy vessel, but was one of the strongest boats of her class that was ever built on the lakes, and when I owned her was very tight. I sailed her for the two seasons before her loss, with heavy freights, and on several occasions in heavy storms, and she never strained or made a drop of water, and she was at the time of loss in good condition and perfectly strong and tight. From the water to the top of the rail amidships was six feet, and the distance of the bow was ten feet, when loaded, which is a very large size for a boat to have out of water."

That disposes of the statement that the boat was overloaded. Another statement is made that the tow line was cut, and that she was allowed to drift in the trough of the river, and so perish. To this charge, the owner replies that the tow line was not cut, but that the barge sunk before the tow line broke; and he has proved that by demonstration, having sent down a diver to examine the position of the barge, who reported that she lay upon the bottom of the lake, in thirty feet of water, heading straight for the harbor to which she was heading at the time of the disaster. She had not turned in the trough of the sea as she would have if she had sunk after the tow line broke. Moreover, the diver who went down, reports that the hull is perfectly strong and tight, and the disaster apparently occurred through the neglect of the unfortunate men who were on board, in not having the forecabin properly secured. It was not secured at the time, and the sea washed over her, and she foundered. In justice to the owner, Captain Fraser, I think this statement should be made, and I do so at his request.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to enquire from the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries whether there is any truth in the statement which appeared in some of the papers, that certain portions of the hull of this vessel were exhibited to him, and were found in a state of advanced decay. I know nothing of the facts, but that statement was made, and probably the hon. gentleman will inform the House whether it was correct or not.

Mr. FOSTER. Some very small portions of the vessel have been brought to the department for examination, and labels have been put on them to show the parts from which they come. It is scarcely probable, until the vessel is raised, as I believe the owner intends to do, to say accurately whether it is true that these come from those portions of the vessel or not. I may, at this stage of the discussion, say a word or two with reference to this matter. I had not the advantage of hearing all that my hon. friend for Algoma (Mr. Dawson) said, but from what I could gather in his speech, he has collected a large amount of valuable information which will be on record, and which I will take occasion to look very carefully into. It must not be supposed, however, that the Marine Department, either now or at any previous time in its history, has not been as careful as possible in looking into this matter, especially of inland navigation, and in taking the best means in its power to overcome the difficulties and make navigation on our great lakes as secure and safe as possible. The Steamboat Inspection Act has gone a long way in that direction. A large portion of the expense of the department for new lights and fog-alarms is now made in the region of the great lakes, which is rapidly bringing up that portion of our waters to a state of very great efficiency and security as far as these are concerned. Again, as my hon. friend has said, we have had an exhaustive survey conducted on the most dangerous of those waters in and at the mouth of the Georgian Bay. This survey has been a great advantage so far, and will be of still greater advantage when completed. Notwithstanding the remark of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick), I think we have a very good board of steamboat inspectors and of hull inspectors. They are all men who do their duty very faithfully. I have called their attention, owing to disasters which have taken place lately, and the information which has come to the House in a special manner this year, to the inspection of boats of the class spoken of, these old boats which are being lengthened and rebuilt, and have asked them to insist on a most thorough and vigorous inspection of that class of boats. They should look after those boats while they are in the process of being repaired, when they have a better opportunity of seeing the progress which is being made with them. As to the Oriental, the matter was very thoroughly investigated, and my officers who investigated and reported on that came to the conclusion, notwithstanding the evidence which was given by the owner himself, that the vessel was not a seaworthy vessel, and that it was owing in the main to her unseaworthiness that the accident occurred. That vessel went out from an American port, and of course we have no jurisdiction there. No law that Canada has or could have could remedy the difficulty in the case either of the Oriental or of the California, both of which were sent out from foreign ports. Of course greater care could be taken in regard to them, being Canadian vessels, when they leave Canadian ports, to prosecute their foreign voyages, to see that they were seaworthy. As to the overloading, that is a matter which would be in the power of the country in whose ports they loaded, and from whose ports they started. I believe, in the case of the California, the evidence shows that the vessel came to grief chiefly from the want of shifting boards with reference to her grain cargo. It was late in the season and she had a large cargo on board and the precaution of putting in shifting boards was neglected, and the grain shifted, and that was the chief cause of the loss of the vessel. As to the inspection of all these barges, that would involve an extension of the policy adopted by the Government some time ago as to steamboats, and it would not only be expensive but would be burdensome to the shipping if it were carried out in the same way as it is with regard to steamboats. Still, I have no hesitation in saying that both the expense and the burden should be incurred if it can be shown that it is necessary to take measures for the preservation especially of life, and the preservation of property as well. But, taking this series of years from 1870 to the present time, we have had a very gratifying record in the Dominion of Canada as to these casualties, and this last year the number of lives lost was, I think, only 46, which is less than the number in 1870, and only about one-fifth of the average number from 1870 to 1887. My attention has been called from various sources to the matters which the hon. gentleman has called attention to, and I will give my best attention to the subject, and if anything further is necessary I am sure the Government will be prepared to do their duty in the premises.

Mr. SPROULE. When this subject was under consideration some years ago, I made a suggestion which, I think, would tend largely to remedy the evil. I think this evil is principally due to the fact that men who are expected to perform the duty of looking after vessels when they are in port seldom do it. The duty is given to Customs officers, and, although they may understand that it is a duty they are expected to do, I do not think they understand that it is one which they are compelled to do. What a man is not held responsible for when he neglects it, he is not likely to look after very closely. As time advances, the casualties which happen make us understand more clearly the importance of having a man at every large port in the country where vessels are calling and leaving in great numbers every year, whose special duty it shall be to look after those vessels when they are in port, not only to see that they should not be overloaded, but to see that the cargo is so distributed as to suit the craft it is on. I think, when the Jane Miller was lost, it was generally believed that her loss was attributable to the fact that her load was on deck, and that consequently she could not stand the roughness of the sea. Various vessels have been lost on the Georgian Bay and in the Channel and on Lake Superior, and there has been scarcely one in regard to which there does not appear to have been some defect which might have been removed. While this might be an additional charge on shipping, I do not think that is a fair argument against incurring the expense, because, if a single life is lost in one year which might not have been lost with proper precautions, I think it will be held that it is the duty of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to continue his exertions—for I think they have been well directed in the past, towards the end of saving life—in that way, and I think that there might be a great saving of life and property in this way. If you look at the amount of freight which is lost and its value, and compare that with the cost which would be incurred by the appointment of a few additional inspectors or men to look after vessels in important ports, the expense is comparatively trifling. Perhaps one-tenth part of the cost of the freight which has been lost—leaving out of account the value of human life—would more than pay the additional cost for inspectors to take the further precautions where necessary. Then, in regard to the inspectors of hulls and of steamboats generally, I believe it is held that an inspector of engineers, to be competent, should be an engineer himself. I understand that the present inspectors are engineers; but it is equally important that the inspectors of hulls should be shipwrights, or should have been ship carpenters at least. I am credibly informed that the inspectors we have at present are not all ship carpenters; that they have never served their time at that business, and that they, therefore, cannot understand it as well as those who have. If anything can be done, I think it is important that the best men should be employed. If any freight can be preserved from destruction or any lives from being lost by the appointment of additional men, I think it is equally incumbent upon us, in order to have this done, to appoint, not Collectors of Customs, but a special man to look after vessels in every port where they are in the habit of calling, to see that they are not over-loaded, that the freight is properly stowed away, and that, when leaving, they are properly equipped with every provision for the saving of life in case of stress of weather. The hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson) is entitled to a great deal of credit for bringing this matter before the House year after year. From his position he is cognizant of a great many of the accidents that take place. He is constantly travelling up and down the lakes, and the trade is continually increasing, and there are a large number of crafts on the lakes which are old and are becoming rotten and should be taken off the lakes entirely. I think this system of an inspection should extend not only to steamboats but to sailing vessels and all kinds of boats which are found on the lakes, whether for the purpose of carrying freight or passengers, because every one of them carries less or more of human life, and whenever there is a loss, almost always there is a loss of human life. But if this trouble were taken, if they were inspected, I think it would be equally desirable, because these sailing vessels do carry both freight and passengers. It is important that the hull inspector should examine the whole of them, not only after they are repaired and painted up, but while the work is going on. I think it would be still better to have the repairs made under the supervision of a competent officer whose duty it should be to see that all the timbers of that vessel were sound, as well the new timber as the old timber that was left in them.

Mr. MASSON. I am very glad this matter has been brought up and that so much valuable information has been given to the House respecting vessels. That a certain advance has been made during the last few years in the matter of inspection, and that great benefits have already been derived from inspection, is well known to all those interested in the trade of our lakes; but that a great deal more has yet to be done, is also well known to all those interested. I wish only to point out now the importance of inspection, both during the course of construction and during the course of repair. I think that is a matter of very great importance, and I was pleased to hear the Minister of Marine say that inspectors have instructions to inspect while repairs are being made on the class of vessels referred to by the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson). If such instructions have been given to the inspectors, I believe they have not acted upon them to any great extent; I know from my own personal observations that, so far from going out of their way to inspect vessels in course of repair, they have absolutely refused to do so, telling the parties who asked them to go and inspect while repairs were being made, to see if anything more required to be done, so that the owners might turn out a ship in a seaworthy condition, and in a condition that would assuredly pass a most rigid inspection—I say when the inspectors were invited to examine these repairs, they replied to the owners: “Finish your vessels, and when you are ready to call for inspection, we will go and inspect; until then we have no right to do so.” Now it appears that they were not obeying their instructions. I would press upon the House and the Department the necessity, not only that the inspectors should have the privilege of inspecting during construction, but that it should be their bounden duty, whenever called upon, and even if not called upon, to inspect any vessel they know to be in course of repairs or construction. When an old vessel is being repaired the object of the owner is to make it pass inspection. Besides, under this system, the dishonest builder is put in the same position as the honest builder. It is in the interests of the honest builder to turn out a good and seaworthy vessel, and it is to his advantage to have an inspection while the repairs are being made, and that the repairs should actually be made under the direction and superintendence of the inspector. I do not think any honest builder would object to that. The hon. member for Algoma mentioned one or two vessels undergoing repairs at Owen Sound. I may say that the Dry Dock Company of Owen Sound has specially asked for inspection while vessels are in course of repair. It is their aim to turn out the very best kind of work, and the most seaworthy vessels, and, on behalf of honest men, I think it is the duty of the department not only to make it the privilege of the inspector, but to make it his bounden duty, whether called upon or not, to inspect vessels, whether in course of repair or under construction.

Mr. COOK. I believe with the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, that it would be well for inspection to take place while a boat is undergoing repairs, as well as during construction. But I am of opinion that as there are several shipyards on the Georgian Bay and the inland waters, and as these shipyards compete against each other, the one that turns out the best work will get the greatest amount of trade. Now, I believe the Board of Steamboat Inspection in the city of Toronto are a very efficient lot of gentlemen. I am satisfied that Mr. Harbottle is a very painstaking and efficient officer, and I have yet to learn that he has refused to inspect any boat under his jurisdiction. I believe Mr. Harbottle is always ready and willing to do his duty, and I do not believe, as the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) has stated, that he has refused to do any important duty incumbent upon him as steamboat inspector. If the Government propose to have an inspection of vessels that are under repair, it would be necessary for them to appoint an assistant, and that would increase the expense to the country. I believe that a change for the better is taking place, and since an inspector of hulls has been appointed, we are getting a great deal better class of vessels upon the lakes. It is very important that inspection should be rigid, and that unseaworthy vessels should not be allowed to go out. I believe that the Oriental, from the information I have received, was not a seaworthy vessel. I have seen pieces of wood exhibited in the windows in the city of Toronto, that were said to come from that wreck, and they were entirely decayed and rotten; whether they really came from the wreck, I do not know. Now, several disasters have occurred lately on the great lakes, attended with considerable loss of life. The Asia, for instance, you will remember, only a few years ago, went down. It was said she was unseaworthy, but I believe that, upon investigation since, it has been discovered that she struck a reef of rocks that was discovered since a survey has been going on. Surveys are of great importance to the shipping in the Georgian Bay, on the north coast of which a great many reefs and shoals were found by the survey that is going on, that were not known before. Although the Asia may have been seaworthy and a good vessel, yet, striking a reef like that, she would have gone down. I believe that the inspection is doing a great deal of good upon the lakes, I am glad to know from the lips of the Minister of Marine that he is vigilant in that regard, and that he has given instructions to the board that inspection shall be carried out rigidly in order to prevent, if possible, a recurrence of the disasters that have taken place in the past.

Mr. WELSH. With respect to the system of steamboat inspection and the inspectors, I think the law is very good. It may be subject to some improvement, but down in the Maritime Provinces there is no complaint, and the steamboat inspectors there have given satisfaction to the public as well as to the steamboat owners. If I understand the matter rightly, it refers more particularly to the navigation of inland waters, of lakes and rivers. In regard to building under inspection, I do not think we can lay down a cast-iron rule with regard to it. Considerable expense would be attached to it, and people would be forced to get inspectors to examine the ships. But the public interest would be secured by adopting a principle something like that adopted by the Board of Trade in Great Britain. There the ships are classed in Lloyds or Veritas, or some other society for classing ships. If a man wants to charter a vessel he turns up the register and finds where a certain vessel was built, what it is classed and so forth, and the insurance companies know what rate to charge, and the shipper knows what risk he will be compelled to run. Notwithstanding that system is in force in England they have also a board of trade inspection. In all the ports there are boards of trade inspectors appointed and paid by the Government, and are not allowed to charge any fees or extra remuneration. There is one of these inspectors in every principal port, and his duty is to see that no rotten or unseaworthy ship goes to sea; if such should be the case he is held responsible, and no doubt he loses his office. Port wardens have been appointed by the Government here in all the ports of the Dominion by the present Dominion Government. These should be appointed board of trade inspectors, and be compelled to see that no ship that is old, unseaworthy or rotten, should be allowed to sail. In England the law is that a board of trade inspector can go aboard, without leave or license, of any ship ready to sail. He has the power to prohibit a vessel from sailing. There is a board of arbitration also, and one appointed for Canadian ships, in England. I remember an instance of my own. I had a new ship, and unfortunately she was touched with worms. She was in England, and I found it would cost a very large sum to repair her. I determined to bring her out here and replank her; but on taking her out of dock, ready for sea, she was stopped by the Board of Trade inspector. When asked the reason, he said that she was not seaworthy. I had to send an agent there. He brought the matter before the Board of Trade, and by representing the matter and by putting a life-boat into the vessel, I was permitted to bring her out. All the difficulty experienced here would be removed by the Government appointing the port wardens at the different ports Board of Trade inspectors and entrusting them with the duty of seeing that no vessel left port that was unseaworthy. I am satisfied that would obviate the difficulty; but I do not approve a system of appointing inspectors and compelling vessels to be built under certain regulations. I believe in Free Trade. At the same time the Government should have Board of Trade inspectors to stop any ship that was unseaworthy. A vessel might be built in the best style and fitted out in first-class style, and yet three months afterwards she might meet with an accident that would seriously impair her condition. This system of forcing people to have vessels built under inspection was not found to work successfully in practice. I think this is a good motion to bring before the House, and the subject should be taken in hand by the Government and be dealt with in an inexpensive way and with great regard to the safety of the public interest.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I cannot fully agree with the remarks of the last speaker, although he no doubt fully understands marine matters. It would appear, if you look at the records of the wrecks on our northern lakes and inland waters, that some measures should be adopted by the Government to prevent the great loss of property and sacrifice of human life that annually occur. I can fully understand that a proper inspection of vessels during the time of construction would prove of great value, for it would be the means of securing efficient construction. I was very much pleased that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries stated that the Government were carefully examining and seeing that the inspectors did their duty. That may be the case to a great extent as to sea-going vessels; but in regard to vessels on our great lakes, I am afraid that attention is not paid to the proper inspection of the boats and the manner in which they are loaded and the way they are constructed. I think these different matters are not fully and carefully attended to. Further, I contend that they have no right to load a barge or vessel below a certain mark. If it is necessary in England that there should be a Plimsoll mark, why is it not necessary in Canada? Are the lives of our people not as precious to us as the lives of the people of Great Britain? It is the duty of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to see that vessels navigating the lakes are not overloaded. We know full well that these inland lakes are far more treacherous than the sea. There is greater danger to life and property than there is in navigating the open sea, yet there is marked indifference on the part of the Government to see that human life is protected in a proper manner. I think it is the case that many of the engineers who are employed upon those vessels have not passed an examination as to their competency before taking charge. Such should not be the case. There should be an examination; but if I understand correctly—I have seen it so reported in the press—it is the intention of the Minister of Marine to lessen or almost do away with the examination of engineers running vessels. That would be an unfortunate thing, a calamity. We all remember the sad accident that occurred to a boat at London a few years ago, due to negligence on the part of the authorities to see that the vessel was not overloaded. And circumstances of that kind occurring ought to be ample and sufficient to induce the Minister to see that every person employed upon those pleasure vessels should be competent for their position and able to perform their duties efficiently and well. I hope that after this discussion and after the manner it has been brought to the attention of the House by the member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson), the Minister will exert himself and see in the future that every man employed upon any of those vessels where they not only carry ordinary freight but human freight on board should be an efficient man, that the boat should not be overloaded, and that the materials of which the boat is constructed are of the best that can possibly be obtained. If he will do that he will do a good service, but if he relaxes his energy he will do a wrong, I believe he will be held responsible for the wrong if he will permit in any way the lessening of the severity of the examination which engineers and all those connected with vessels have to pass to show that they are fully and thoroughly competent to perform the duties that devolve upon them.

Mr. McNEILL. I very much agree with almost all that has been said by the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat. I am only sorry that in the last few words he addressed to the House he seemed to imply that he thought it possible that the hon. the Minister of Marine would relax his vigilance. I do not think we have any reason to suppose that that is at all likely. I think that since the hon. gentleman has occupied the position he now holds—

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon for one moment. I said I had seen in the Empire that a relaxation was likely to take place in the examinations of engineers on passenger boats.

Mr. McNEILL. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I did not hear that observation, and I sincerely hope that no relaxation will take place. If there is any intention or any prospect of any such relaxation taking place, I should only add my mite of approval to what the hon. gentleman has said. I think it would be a very unfortunate thing if there were any degree of relaxation, and, on the contrary, I think we ought to proceed in the very opposite direction. When we see the loss of life, when we see the amount of misery that is entailed by that loss of life, when we see the loss of property and realize the enormous extent of that loss year after year upon the lakes, anything like relaxation of the rules which now obtain, would, I think, be nothing less than a calamity. While I agree with a great deal what my hon. friend has said I must say that I do wish to enter my protest against a remark which has fallen in the course of this debate, namely, that the proper way to do is to leave this matter to competition, as it were, that is to say, that the best builder will be the man who will get the best custom. That may be all very well, but I do not think that that will be a remedy for those who find a watery grave in rotten or weakly constructed vessels. The fact is, that I think my hon. friend, the member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson), deserves the thanks of the country for the manner in which he has adhered to this matter. From the very first he has taken it up warmly, he has stuck to his guns and I believe that he is now about to do us a very great service. The two points which seem to have been brought before the House to-day are with reference to the inspection and loading of vessels. So far as the inspection is concerned it seems to me that if we are to have vessels constructed as they ought to be constructed, it is absolutely necessary that the inspector should be called upon to inspect the vessels while they are being constructed, for we all know how easy it is to cover up any defects afterwards. The real way to strike at this mischief, is to have a thorough inspection of the vessels during the course of construction. My hon. friend, the member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) has told us that when a Government inspector is called upon to do this very necessary work, he refuses. If that be so I hope that the Minister of Marine will see that in future the inspector pursues a very different course. The question of overloading is one of almost as great importance and to all those who have taken any interest in this question must be very well aware of the most incalculable advantage that has followed in England from the use of the Plimsoll mark. That is simply a round mark upon both broadsides of each vessel with a line drawn through the middle, and any person, whether he be a seafaring man or not, who sees that vessel afloat can, at a glance from the shore, tell whether or not the vessel has been overloaded. A mark of that kind if it were rendered necessary to be used on our lakes would be fruitful of the very greatest possible advantage and would be the means of saving many a life and many a wreck. That is so far as sailing vessels are concerned. I do not know whether in the case of steamboats on the lakes it would have the same effect, because the difficulty there seems to arise, not so much from the overloading and not so much from the vessel being sunk too far in the water, as from the fact that the cargo is badly stowed. In many cases, as in the case of the Jane Miller, referred to by my friend the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), the loss did not arise there from overloading, but it arose from improperly loading the vessel. When the Jane Miller was lost she had hardly any cargo in her hold, and the whole cargo was in the upper works of the vessel. It was a deck cargo, and when she came to round to heading for the land in a breeze of wind a squall struck her and she simply turned right over. There was no sea on at the time, and it was not in rough water she went down. It was in perfectly smooth water, in an almost landlocked bay. That vessel was lost simply from improper stowage, and the Plimsoll mark would have no effect in such a case as that. The appointing of inspectors at each port, whose duty it would be to see that no vessel was allowed to leave the port unless her cargo was properly stowed, would meet that difficulty. I do not see why the Custom house officers in the different ports might not be utilised for this purpose. They cannot be expected to do the work unless they get extra remuneration; but in a case of this kind, when we remember the loss of life and the losses of property each year, the additional expense which would be incurred in that way is a matter which I think this House ought scarcely consider at all, because it would be infinitesimal as compared with the property which is lost, and compared with the loss of life it is a thing that cannot be weighed in the balance for a moment. I sincerely hope the Minister of Marine will take this matter deeply into his consideration, and that he will see that no relaxation in the rule shall occur, but that he will make the rules still more stringent than they are at present, both in regard to inspection so far as the construction of vessels is concerned, and in regard to the inspection of loading vessels.

Mr. TAYLOR. Let me say just one word in reference to a remark which dropped from the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Wilson) who stated that he had seen in the papers that deputation had been waiting on the hon. the Minister of Marine asking for a relaxation of the rule in reference to steamers on the lakes. Having been instrumental in moving in this matter, I may just say that the deputations that I accompanied to wait on the hon. Minister of Marine did not ask for any relaxation of the regulations in reference to the inspection of steamers or vessels on the great lakes or the minor waters. What we have asked and do contend for applies to a class of small steamers of twenty or thirty tons plying on the minor waters of Canada. Where I reside there are large numbers of small yachts of twenty or thirty tons that are engaged during the pleasure season, for a week or ten days, in taking out fishing parties. Before these steamers can engage in such pursuits, they must, under the present regulations, have a competent captain and a licensed engineer. On account of the scarcity of licensed engineers, there are not sufficient to fill all the places, and according to the law at present, a person cannot become a licensed engineer unless he has served three years in a marine engine shop, and one year on a steamer. We have many mechanics who help to construct engines, and who are just as competent as if they had served the required three years. What we ask is that a competent person may be granted a permit over a specified route for a limited time, and that legislation may be passed giving the Minister power, on the recommendation of the inspectors, to grant such permits. That has nothing to do with the motion before the House.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to correct one impression which I did not intend to convey with reference to the inspection spoken of by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule). It is not the duty of the inspectors to make more than one inspection yearly. When the owner of a boat has it ready for inspection, it is his duty to notify the board and have it inspected. If he does not do that, he is liable to a penalty. If the chairman of the Board of Inspectors refuses a request to go and see a vessel that is undergoing repairs, on the ground that it was not ready to undergo inspection, the letter of the law would justify him in doing that; and when I spoke of his having visited several of those vessels undergoing repairs, I did not mean that it was the rule that he should do it, but in a great many cases I have given directions for the inspectors to do it, being guided by the circumstances. As the information my hon. friend asks for has been brought down in the report of the Department, probably it would be as well, after having had this interesting discussion, that he should withdraw his motion.

Mr. DAWSON. I had no intention, in mentioning the vessels that had been lost, to cast any reflection on anybody. The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) has referred to the captain of the Oriental. I believe he was a brave and gallant man, as is proved by his having gone down with his vessel. I was very happy to hear the hon. Minister of Marine express his opinion that, notwithstanding the increased expense that would be involved, a more comprehensive system of inspection should be undertaken, if thereby life and property should be secured. As to the remarks made by the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Cook), in reference to Captain Harbottle, I quite agree with him that he is a very able and excellent officer; but certainly one man cannot do everything in the matter of inspection. Now that this discussion has taken place, and that this amount of interest has been excited, I would, with the leave of the House, withdraw the motion, as all that I wished to gain has been gained in drawing the attention of the Government to the matter.

Mr. LISTER. Before the motion is withdrawn, I wish to say a word or two with regard to the suggestion of the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor), as to allowing people without proper certificates to act as engineers. If such a course were adopted by the Government, we might as well abolish the system of granting certificates altogether.

Mr. FOSTER. I would just say that I intend to introduce a Bill dealing with the suggestion of the hon. member for Leeds, and the whole discussion will come up then.

Mr. LISTER. In that case, I will say no more on that point. But there is another matter that I want to bring before the hon. Minister of Marine; I brought it before the House one or two Sessions ago. It is this. The American Government will not permit a Canadian engineer to act as such on an American steamboat unless he has a certificate from the proper quarter on that side, and he must, in addition, be a resident of the United States. The consequence of that is that many of our Canadian engineers living in Sarnia and other towns on the border, have had to go and live in the United States so that they might take charge of American steamboats. I believe I am correct when I say that our law does not require engineers to be Canadians or British subjects before receiving certificates. If I am in error as to that I would like to be corrected. I know that our engineers complain very bitterly indeed that while the Americans protect their engineers, there is no protection granted to our engineers. If the legislation was the same on both sides, it would be an inducement to our people to go into engineering, and it would remove this well-grounded complaint. I am not complaining against the Government; I am merely pointing out the fact, and expressing the opinion that our engineers, who are a large and important class, ought to be protected. I hope the Bill the hon. Minister intends to introduce will provide for that.

Mr. BAKER. The discussion on this motion appears to be taking a very wide range. The subject of engineers and engineers' certificates, in my opinion, has nothing to do with the matter under discussion. That subject may come up at the proper time. We are talking of steamboat inspection, which may in an indirect way have some connection with it. To my mind, the disasters referred to must be attributable to one or two causes. Either the vessels were in themselves unseaworthy or they were unseaworthy from having been either overloaded or improperly stowed. As to the remedy, I think that would lie in the first place with the master of the vessel, who is responsible for everything connected, not only with the navigation of his vessel, not only with the discipline of his crew not only with the interest of the owner, but with the interests of the shippers of the cargo, and with the lives of all on board. It is his place to see that the vessel is properly equipped and manned, and that she leaves port in a seaworthy condition. In the first place, therefore, it is the duty of the master of the vessel to see that the vessel is in all respects seaworthy; secondly, at all the principal ports of the Dominion, there are harbor masters and port wardens, and if hon. gentlemen will refer to the Act of the harbor masters and port wardens, they will find that the port warden may, wherever he sees fit, initiate proceedings, when occasion may necessitate his doing so. Therefore, I think that with the master primarily responsible for everything pertaining to his vessel, and with the harbor and port wardens having general supervision of everything regarding the seaworthiness of the vessel, the ground is fully covered.

Motion withdrawn.

OWNERS OF BOTTLES AND VESSELS.

Mr. DENISON moved second reading of Bill No. 3—to protect the owners of certain bottles and vessels therein mentioned. He said: I do not see the object of the applause with which hon. gentlemen greet my rising to move the second reading of this Bill, unless it be that they have the idea that I am doing something in the way of legislating in the cause of temperance. There is no doubt this Bill is in the interest of the manufacturers of soda waters and aerated waters, of whom there are a great many in existence in this country, and the industry has become a very extensive one. It is with the object of protecting them that this Bill has been put in my hands. I may say that on account of the manner in which this business is carried on a great deal of loss is sustained by those interested in it. A soda water bottle, filled with its contents, is, we will say, worth a dollar. The contents alone are sold at the value of 25 cents and the bottles are supposed to be retained in the ownership of the sellers, and they are valued at seventy-five cents per dozen, or, in other words, the value of the contents, as compared with the bottles, is as three to one. The trouble is that second dealers or junk dealers, as they are called, purchase these bottles from any person who may bring them to their establishment. The ownership, as I have said, has not passed from the person who sells the soda water, and he has therefore to sustain very heavy loss on account of these bottles being dealt in by these junk dealers. The object of the Bill especially is to prevent, if possible, any traffic in soda water bottles or aerated water bottles. The bottles, it is proposed, shall have a trade mark upon them, and they have also a peculiar fastening at the top which makes them of considerable value. This measure, I may state, is somewhat similar to Acts of a like nature which have been passed in some twelve or fourteen States of the Union, so that it is not entirely legislation of a new character. Under clause one, the bottlers are to have a trade mark on their bottles. Clause two prevents trafficking in the bottles, and throws the onus of proof on the party in whose possession the bottles are found. It is proposed to make some alteration in that clause. Clause three provides that no one shall fill such bottles. Clause four deals with the proof in the case of unlawful traffic. Clause five provides that a record shall be kept of the bottles by the junk dealers. Clause six deals with lost vessels. Clause seven allows a search warrant to issue, so that the owner of the bottles may have an opportunity of searching the junk shop and recovering the bottles, which are sometimes found there in large numbers. Clause eight provides for an appeal. I may say that if it is considered by this House that it would be better to leave this Bill to a committee, I would be very glad to move one.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I do not wish to say much on the matter. I do not know that I want to prevent the hon. member taking the second reading of the Bill, but I think he is dealing with rather a difficult matter, and it seems to me that if it goes into committee it will have to be very carefully considered indeed.

Mr. THOMPSON. I was going to call the attention of the House to the Bill, with the same view that the hon. gentleman has just taken. I appreciate very highly indeed the reasons which the hon. gentleman who introduced the measure has for supporting it, and with an explanation of which he has favored me at some length privately. I understand pretty fully from those who are interested in the kind of business which this Bill is destined to protect, what the difficulties are in respect of it, from which they seek relief. It is stated that their bottles are manufactured in very large numbers, stamped with their names or their trade mark, and the liquids which they manufacture, soda water, ginger beer, and waters of that description, are vended and delivered in these bottles, the bottles themselves not being sold. It is stated—and this appears almost like an oversight or want of ordinary business precaution—that no record whatever is kept by them of the bottles they deliver to their customers or the public, and therefore they come and seek legislation of this kind to give them an extraordinary protection. The objections which must be taken to the Bill are fundamental and extend almost to every clause, and I could entertain no hope that, if the Bill had a second reading and went to a committee, it would be even curtailed in such a way as to make it at all safe. If the business in which these gentlemen are engaged requires protection to such an extent as to make it a crime to be the possessor of a soda water bottle, the business is a very dangerous one to the community. There is hardly a householder in Canada who, if this Bill should pass, would not be likely to be brought before a magistrate and sent to goal for at least ten days. Before calling the attention of the House to the principal features of the Bill, I will mention that it professes to deal with the subject from the point of view of trade marks legislation; and in that respect I would ask the hon. gentleman who introduced the Bill whether he would not consider that the measure which the Government introduced with regard to the fraudulent marking of merchandise is not sufficient to meet the whole purpose he has in view, in so far as that purpose can safely be carried out, or whether the Bill, in connection with that subject, introduced by the Government could not be amended so as to meet his view in so far as it is wise at all to carry out the precautions he wishes us to adopt. I think it would be unwise to deal with the subject of trade marks and the marking of merchandise in a general statute by which Parliament is asked to adopt the principle of recent English legislation dealing with that matter, and at the same time to pass an Act on different lines and to suit one particular business. I might call the attention of the House to what the remedies are which are afforded to these proprietors at present. They have the same remedies in this country as they have in Great Britain, and I have not heard that any legislation has been called for there by those that are engaged in this business. The remedies which are pursued in Great Britain by the manufacturers of these aerated waters are these: The junk dealers, or any one who has these articles improperly in his possession, is liable to be sued by the proprietor, and the value of the properties recovered. It is stated by the manufacturers that that is an insufficient remedy, because there is no means of ascertaining, without a search warrant, how many bottles the junk dealer has in his possession, but our own Statute in regard to junk dealers provides that they shall keep a record of every article they purchase. In our present Act there is a provision that if any person—

"Encloses, places or attaches any chattel or article, or causes or procures any chattel or articles to be enclosed, placed, or attached in, upon, under, with, or to any cask, bottle, stopper, vessel, case, cover, wrapper, band, reel, ticket, label or other thing having thereon any trade mark of any other person, he is guilty of a misdemeanor."

Let me refer to some of the clauses of this Bill. In the first place, the first section is purely trade mark legislation, providing that marks or devices may be registered. That is a feature of the present law and is unnecessary here, and will be more unnecessary after the Trade Marks Bill is adopted, if it should be adopted by the House. There is another provision which is already embodied in our statute. The third section reads:

"No person shall fill with soda waters, mineral or aerated waters, porter, ale, cider, ginger ale, milk, cream, beer, small beer, lager beer, weiss beer, white beer, or other beverages, or with medicines, compounds, or mixtures, any such vessels so marked or distinguished as aforesaid with or by any name, mark or device of which a description has been filed and published as provided in section one of this Act, or to deface, erase, obliterate, cover up or otherwise remove or conceal any such name, mark or device thereon, or to sell, buy, give, take, or otherwise dispose of or traffic in the same, without the written consent of the person whose mark or device is in or upon such vessel so filled, trafficked in, used or disposed of as aforesaid, or unless such vessel has been purchased from him; and the burthen of the proof of such purchase, or written consent, from the rightful owner or owners, whose registered mark appears on such articles, in the event of the defence of purchase, or written consent, being set up, shall be upon the person in whose possession such articles are found, who must strictly prove that such possession is lawful, and duly authorised by the person whose registered name, mark or device appears or did appear impressed on such articles."

It is made an offence punishable by imprisonment for not more than one year, and not less than ten days, to have violated that section, and the effect of those provisions is, substantially, that, if any person in Canada hereafter is so unfortunate as to have one of these dangerous soda-water bottles in his possession, and puts milk into it, he is liable to be sent to gaol for not less than ten days and possibly for a year. He may put whiskey into it, but not milk, cream, lager beer, or ginger ale or anything of that kind. Even if he puts it in for household purposes and not for sale, he is liable to these extraordinary penalties and the burden of proof rests upon him that he purchased the bottle from somebody who had the right to the trade mark. I think that is a very unnecessary provision and a very extreme one, to provide criminal legislation of this character, changing the burden of proof, and compelling everyone who has innocently in his possession articles of this kind, to show how he became possessed of them. We know how common it is for persons to possess these vessels, and this Bill makes it not only fraudulent, but criminal to have these bottles in possession, without proving the title by which they were obtained. We know from the vendors that these bottles are sold in carts in the street to anyone who chooses to buy them. The bottles are not sold, but the mineral waters are sold, and the bottles are delivered, and they come into the possession of the servants of the household and are not under the immediate supervision of the proprietor of the house, but the possession of these articles and the attempt to use them, even for household purposes, is here made a crime. It would be far more reasonable, if these gentlemen need this protection—and I admit that they seem to need some protection—that, before they come here to ask for this extraordinary legislation, they should take the ordinary business precautions to preserve their property. At present they do not; they do not even keep a record of the persons to whom they have delivered bottles, and they propose to remedy their neglect by making it criminal on the part of those who possess these bottles. Section 4 pursues the same line, and makes it punishable without authority to use a marked bottle; and then there is a provision which is in our present law, and is therefore unnecessary, that the junk dealers shall keep a record, and penalties are imposed upon them if they do not. Then there is a provision making it penal even to buy, or sell, or use any bottle of that kind even though the bottle has been lost, and therefore it puts upon a person having one of these bottles, innocently in his possession, the burden of proving the title to it, which is absolutely impossible, considering that tens of thousands of these bottles are issued every week in large cities, especially in the summer season; and, if the person fails to prove his title to every individual bottle in his possession, although it is an absolute legal impossibility that he could do so in any court of justice whatever, he is liable to these heavy penalties. Then section 6 provides not only that, but that any person who is so unfortunate as to have any of these bottles in his possession is liable to have a search warrant issued against him. We know that the provision of law in regard to such warrants is that oath must be made that property has been stolen, and is believed to be in the possession of the person referred to, but under this Bill it is only necessary to have these bottles in possession to obtain a search warrant. Then there is a provision for the recovery of the various penalties. I hope the hon. gentleman who has introduced the Bill, and he has done it, I know, from the sense he has of the injuries sustained by the people in this line of business, will not press the Bill, but will consider whether a provision in regard to the fraudulent marking of merchandise will not be amply sufficient to prevent what I admit we ought to prevent, that is, these bottles being made use of by other dealers who may have purchased them improperly from junk dealers, to prevent the bottles of one person being used by others in the same business. But I think to attempt to prevent by criminal penalties the innocent use and the household use of these bottles, and to impose such severe penalties would be exceedingly unwise and quite uncalled for, especially when we know how little care is taken by the proprietors themselves as to the bottles they use. I supposed that perhaps the Minister of Justice, in his many duties, had not been able to look at the Bill. I view it as a very extraordinary Bill, and I am glad to see that he has taken the same view of it. As I said before, I think it will have to be greatly curtailed in committee. I thought when on my feet before I would ask the mover if he could not cover all that ought to be covered by some amendment to the Act relating to trade marks, if it is not already covered. But the design of the Bill seems to me to be more than to prevent parties using other people's brands in order to sell their own goods, for the penalty in this, I see, is for removing, or erasing, or taking out the stamp, or the brand of the maker. The value of trade marks, as I understand them, lies in this. A manufacturer registers a trade mark, he is, perhaps, manufacturing a specialty, he has, perhaps, attained a name for the high quality of a certain kind of goods, and brands his name, or has it blown upon the glass and bottles, or brands it upon wood packages. All these packages are valuable because they have his name upon them. Another dealer, not as successful in business, with inferior goods, might secure the empty packages of this first manufacturer and fill them with his own manufactures and thus do the other man an injury. But the object of this Bill, it seems to me, does not cover that case, that should be covered under the Act. But it is made offence under this Act for a person having another man's bottles or boxes with his brand on them, to remove the brand, to deface or erase it. Therefore, the object is not to secure that a manufacturer's name being branded upon his packages they shall be filled only with the goods manufactured by him, but, as the Minister has pointed out, it seems that the effect of it will be, that however careless a manufacturer may be in the distribution of his goods and his empty boxes, they are to be taken care of by the community at large, and if they do not do so, they are liable to fines, imprisonment and penalties. I quite agree with what the Minister has said. I do not wish to oppose the Bill on its second reading if the hon. member is anxious to send it to committee, but I think that the work of the committee will be very formidable, because it certainly never could be allowed to pass in its present shape. I think, as suggested by my hon. friend, and as has evidently been suggested to the Minister of Justice, that if there be any difficulty by a party using the names of other manufacturers to sell his inferior goods, by using their empty packages, that they would be entitled to protection in that respect, if it is not already given to them in the Act relating to trade marks. But I think it is; if not, the Minister has said that he is willing to consider that matter.

Mr. EDGAR. I have looked over the copy of this Bill, as it has been amended in Committee of the Whole, and as it is proposed to be reprinted; and although it is proposed to remove some of the objectionable features from the Bill, I still agree with the Minister of Justice that there are many remaining. The provisions as to issuing a search warrant to find out whether a person has these in his possession, without proving that there has been some theft committed, is very unusual and unreasonable, I think. And so with regard to the provision as to penalty for parties having these bottles in their possession. Still I think something ought to be done, because surely it is desirable that we should encourage the sale of these cheap temperance drinks. We are desiring in this House to promote temperance, I think, in every legitimate way, and if we support legislation which will protect those who make and sell what is generally known as pop summer drinks, we will be doing a great deal for the cause of temperance. But it does seem not unreasonable that when bottles made by owners especially with their own marks upon them, and containing these cheap drinks, costing three or four times, I believe, as much as their contents—I think it is not unreasonable to throw around them some protection. I think that, at least, if the Minister of Justice can put in the Bill which he has before the House now, the Merchandise Marks Offences Act, taken, I believe, from the English Act of last Session, largely, if he can insert in that a clause which will not prohibit people from having possession of these things, and force them to explain all about it, but will prevent them from exposing for sale these bottles so marked, I think he will be doing a right thing, a fair thing, and a service to the country.

Mr. THOMPSON. I do not think there is any objection to that at all. I may say that the present Trade Marks Act makes it a misdemeanor to sell a bottle, for instance, that is trade marked, with compounds in it other than those produced by the person whose trade mark it has. While that will be a misdemeanor under the Act, it will be under summary conviction, and the penalty will be much more stringent. I think the object can be quite as well served by the Trade Marks and Registration Bill.

Mr. DENISON. The Minister of Justice stated a short time ago that apparently there was no effort made on the part of these people to keep any record of their bottles. Although I am not well informed as to the manner in which they conduct their business, I am told it is almost impossible to keep any proper record of the bottles, and to have the bottles returned; that on account of the competition being so keen, they have to let the bottles go with the contents, and trust—if I may use the term—to luck to the bottles coming back. The effect of that condition of things is, that these smaller dealers may buy up bottles belonging to large dealers, and use them to sell their manufactures at a cheaper rate. You can easily see that if the larger dealer has to pay 75 cents a dozen for bottles, and 25 cents for the contents, while the smaller dealer can buy up the empty bottles at half-price, it puts the latter in a better position to compete with the large dealer. I am informed that some of the large dealers lose as much as four or five thousand dollars a year in bottles alone, that are used by smaller dealers and other people. I would like to say a word as to the question of search. That has been struck out of the amended Bill; but it says: "No person shall buy, sell, expose or offer for sale, dispose or traffic in bottles." The object of this Act, I may say, is not to prevent any persons having bottles in their possession or giving them away, but it is to prevent the traffic in bottles. It is principally aimed at the junk dealers who make a business of dealing in those kind of articles. However, Mr. Speaker, what we want is not particularly this Bill, but we want relief, and although I think it would be a little more convenient if this Bill should go through in its present state, still, as the Minister of Justice has stated that he can see his way clear to give us some measure of relief in his Trade Marks Act, I think that I will be quite justified in letting this Bill stand in the meantime, with the permission of the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think the best plan would be to adjourn the debate, then the Bill can stand on the paper, and my hon. friend, after examining the Government Bill, can consider whether he will press his own. I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

DISCHARGE OF SECURITIES TO THE CROWN.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK moved the second reading of Bill (No. 4) to amend the Act respecting defective letters patent and the discharge of securities to the Crown. He said: I move the second reading of this Bill at the request of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). It is a Bill to remedy an old and anomalous state of the law, and it refers to transactions which occurred prior to Confederation and altogether in the Province of Ontario. Prior to 15th August, 1866, it was the law of Ontario that bonds given to the Crown either to secure debts or as surety for officials, postmasters, custom house officers or others, on lands were filed in the office of the clerk of the Court of Queen's Bench, ipso facto created a lien on the lands of the bondsmen without any further registration, any specific registration on the lands in the various counties where the lands were situated. This required so much searching that no man could get a clear title to his land or any parcel of land he was buying without having a search made in the office of the clerk of the Court of Queen's Bench. That was remedied by it being enacted in 1866 that those bonds should no longer be a lien on the lands unless specifically registered against them. The Legislature of the Province of Ontario, by the Revised Statutes have released the lands from those bonds, so far as that Legislature has authority to deal with them, that is to say, from any debts due to the Crown, which were within the provincial jurisdiction; and it is now asked by this Bill to release the lien on lands in all matters that come under the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada. The difficulty has been suggested by the Referee of Titles of the Province of Ontario, who says it is a matter of very great difficulty and expense now to pass a title without going back and searching over those old liens to the Crown, and difficulty arises if a man has acquired his title from a man, say named John Smith, because there are several registrations under that name, and it must be shown that that was not the John Smith whose title is now being searched or affected. This difficulty is so great that the Referee suggests that the Dominion Parliament follow the example of the Legislature of Ontario, and release the liens upon the land so far as they are subject to the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada.

Mr. EDGAR. I understand that this Bill is an exact copy of the section of the Revised Statutes of the Province of Ontario, changing the words "Provincial Government" to "Dominion Government," and I think it perfectly proper that it should pass. I suppose the blank date left in the clause will be changed, and it will be made to apply from and after the passing of this Act.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Yes, from 1st of May or some such date.

Mr. EDGAR. The title of the Bill is also defective. That, however, cannot be changed until the Bill reaches its last stage.

Bill read the second time.

PROTECTION OF RAILWAY EMPLOYEES.

Mr. DENISON moved the second reading of Bill (No. 5) for the protection of railway employés. He said: I have been requested by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) to move the second reading of this Bill, and in doing so I have only a few words to say in regard to it. I regret very much that the hon. gentleman is not present, as this is a very important measure for the protection of the lives of railway employés. I have before me a statement of accidents to such employés during the year 1886, and I find that in coupling cars there were 210 cases of injury and 12 deaths; walking, standing or lying on the track, 72 deaths and 63 persons injured, or in all 135 accidents on the track. I suppose a considerable portion of these have been due to one of the causes referred to in this Bill, frogs on railway tracks, with regard to which provision is made in this Bill. I have here a copy of a presentment sent by the Grand Jury of the County of Elgin, in which they pray for several matters in connection with this Bill. They pray that all boxed or covered freight cars that are run over the various railways shall by law be required to have a one and a-half inch plank or board on the centre of the top outside for the use of the brakemen as a walk, the plank to be not less than eighteen inches wide. Also, that iron railings shall be placed along the footboards at a convenient height for the further protection and safety of brakemen. Also, that the old system of couplings and brakes, being insecure, unsafe and fraught with danger and accident, should, at as early a date as possible, have a modern improved system substituted therefor. Also, that all engines shall have a steam brake and cylinder attached to them after due notice has been given. There are also other matters mentioned in the presentment which it is not proposed to cover by this Bill.

Mr. COOK. I also regret, as does the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, the absence of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). That hon. gentleman has given considerable attention to this matter, and I think he introduced the same Bill last Session. I have taken a very deep interest in this matter for a number of years past. While I had the honor of a seat in the Ontario Legislature I introduced a Bill similar to this, and, after introducing it, the Government appointed a commission, took the matter in hand, and passed the measure which is now the law in the Province of Ontario. But upon the passage of the Act, the hon. gentleman who now occupies the position of Finance Minister of this country, being at that time Minister of Railways, carried a Bill by which he took over all the roads of the Provinces; that Dominion Act rendered this Ontario Act almost worthless, because in that Province we have scarcely any roads that are not under that jurisdiction. The packing of frogs is a very important matter, but in my opinion the hon. gentleman has not gone far enough. There is one difficulty in the way, and that is the throwing open of switches. As switches are at present, they are thrown three inches apart, and the brakeman or man in the yard is as likely to be caught in the switch as in the frog. My former proposal was to have the switches so arranged as to be thrown open six inches, so that a man's foot could not be caught in them. It is from men having their feet caught that accidents occur, and they are crushed by the cars. The proposal respecting running boards is a very good one. On the whole, I approve of the Bill, and I hope it will pass into law. I trust the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), will be more successful this Session than he was last, and that the proposal to refer the Bill to a committee is not for the purpose of burking this very useful and important measure. The mover, on behalf of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), stated the great amount of accidents that have occurred in this way. I think it is nothing but right and just that the Government of the day should have an Act of this kind made law, so that protection can be extended to the people who are working on railways. There are such a large number of people now working upon roads in Canada that the danger has increased every year, because of the greater number employed. I think, Sir, that as this Government has passed an Act by which they took away from the Province of Ontario the large number of railways, formerly under the jurisdiction of that Provincial Act, that it is their duty now to afford railway employés, by Act of Parliament, the same protection that they had under the law of the Province of Ontario. I have an instance in my mind which bears on the question. Shortly after the passing of the Act, by which the railways were taken over by the Dominion, an accident occurred upon the Midland Railway, whose character was obtained from the Local Legislature and which was under the jurisdiction of the Local Legislature. The party to whom the accident occurred sued the railway company for damages, but the court decided that as the Ontario Act had no jurisdiction the complainant should be nonsuited. I contend, therefore, that the Government should see that protection is extended to that class of people in this country who richly deserve the same protection at the hands of this Government that they receive at the hands of the Ontario Legislature.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). This no doubt is a very important Act and there can be no objection to referring it to a special committee. At the same time it appears to me that an Act of such importance proposing to deal with interests of such a large extent and in such various ways should be taken charge of by the Government and that they should deal with a matter in which the public are so largely interested. I hope the Government will take that view of it and when it comes from the Select Committee propose the measure to this House and accept the responsibility of it.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Mr. Speaker, this I consider is one of the most important Bills that has been brought before the House during the Session and I agree with the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) that it being such an important measure the Government should take the Bill in their charge and in amending the Railway Act that they should have the principle of this Bill incorporated in it. No one who has had an opportunity to witness the number of casualties on railways to brakemen and others who earn their living by being employed on railways will deny that there should have been long before some provision made whereby the lives of these unfortunate individuals might be protected to as great an extent as possible. We know very well that the avocation of the railway employé is a dangerous one under any circumstances. We know that they have to endure hardships which perhaps in no other calling are people called upon to endure. That being the case it ought to be the duty of those who have charge of railways and railway companies to make provisions whereby the lives of employés may be protected. When the Dominion Government assumed the control of the railroads running from East to West and took them out of the hands of the Local Government thereby preventing the enforcement of the Provincial Act they should have made provision for a proper guard and proper construction in the passing of the frogs. They neglected to do so however and very many lives have been lost on account of this neglect. Perhaps the most dangerous work connected with railroading and in which more lives have been lost than in any other is by brakemen who are compelled to remain upon those cars and pass from one car to the other to set brakes, falling off and being killed. Although the packing of the frogs may be absolutely essential and necessary for the protection of parties employed in and about the yards, I consider the necessity of making suitable and ample provision for the running boards so as to protect the brakemen, of far greater importance. Any one who has witnessed the brakemen running from one car to the other can readily understand the danger those men undergo while performing their duty on those cars. They not only have to be at their dangerous work when the weather is fine and when the cars are in safe and proper condition for them to pass from one to the other but they have to be at their post at all times and at all seasons during the most inclement weather, when perhaps from cold they are unable to move. They have at all times to go from one car to the other and run the risk of a sudden jerk, or a sudden jar which might precipitate them along the rails or between these cars, when they would be crushed to atoms in a second of time. It is utterly impossible during the prevalence of a storm of sleet or snow to keep those running boards properly connected. They become slippery and the men who are compelled to step from one to the other are placed in the greatest danger. Yet we find that the country has been quite indifferent to the dangers and the hardships which those men endure. The running board is a particular necessity and should be considered by this House. I can understand that we cannot perhaps legislate in this direction immediately, and have all cars passing through the country properly protected in this way.

It being six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). When the House rose for recess, I was endeavoring to show the necessity that exists for protecting railway employés. I pointed out the absolute necessity of having the frogs thoroughly packed. I believe that it is in the interest of the companies as well as of the employés and general public that every protection should be afforded to the employés. The company would be less liable to damages in case of accident, and would have fewer maimed men on its hands. The Bill not only provides for the packing of the frogs, but also for improving the running boards. Everybody who has had an opportunity of witnessing the difficulties and hardships endured by brakemen in connection with their dangerous employment, will agree with me that if any device can be found for affording better protection to them, it is the duty of this House and the railway companies to see that such a device is employed. We all know that the present system of box cars with running boards is a very dangerous system, from which many lives have been lost. The space between the cars being considerable, when a sudden jar or jolt takes place, the brakeman, while coupling the cars, is very liable to be thrown forward, and having nothing to hold by to protect himself, is liable to be thrown between the cars and killed. Then, these boards are frequently wet, and frequently covered with ice or snow, so that it is almost impossible for the men to pass along them even during the day time. But consider for a moment the difficulties a man must experience during the night when passing over the cars with a lantern in his hand. If there is a jolt or jar when he gets near the end of the car, having nothing to take hold of to protect himself, he is liable to be thrown down between the cars, or thrown down on the top of the car and rolled off. Many lives have been lost by these accidents, which are constantly occurring. If we take the whole of the mortality in connection with railroading, I suppose there is no other cause that has produced as great a destruction of life and limb as this very cause. It may be objected that so long as our present close commercial relations with the United States continue, with cars coming from the American side to the Canadian side, and not constructed in the same way as our cars, the present system must continue. But this is no excuse. It is our duty to protect our own citizens. We all know the value of a life; we all know the value of a citizen of the Dominion of Canada; and those who are injured are generally young and useful men, who have arrived just at that time of life when they are going to increase the wealth of the country. They are those who have just started out in life, and they may have a wife and small family depending on them for their maintenance and support. If we can make any provision whereby the lives of these men will be more secure without injuring the railway companies, it is our duty to do it. Instead of injuring the companies, I think I shall be able to show that such a measure of protection for the men would be a material advantage and saving to the railway corporations.

Not only should the running board be improved, but the space between the two box cars should be overcome so that there would be, as it were, one continuous board from one car to another car, so that the brakeman would not be obliged, as at present, to leap from one car to another. I think this could be done without much difficulty. When the cars are attached a coiled spring could be so arranged as to allow the boards to come together when the cars are tense, and to spring back when necessary, so as not in any way to break the end of the running board. At present, when there is a considerable space between them, the ends of the running boards are frequently broken, thus increasing the space over which the employes have to jump when passing from one car to another. Then I think there should be a hand rail beside the running board, extending from one end of the car to the other. In the Bill it is proposed that there should be a side rail, either of iron or a chain, two and a-half or three feet high. Such a rail, placed on either side of the running board would give the brakeman something to take hold of in passing along the car. It could be made, say, of gas pipe, and when approaching the end of the car let the side rails turn to the right and to the left, so as to embrace the whole width of the car. If that were not done the brakeman would be obliged to step over the railing to apply his brake, and might be thrown from the top of the car. This device would I think very materially protect the brakeman in passing over the tops of the cars. As this is a question in which we ought all to feel an interest, I may be allowed to read you letters which I have received from men who are conversant with this subject, and who take a great deal of interest in it. One of these is Mr. Deyell who has written me as follows:—

"The old running board in general use by railway companies is still retained within a short distance of each end of car, this space being occupied by our device which consists of a casing, into this casing is placed a slide that can easily be moved in or out of casing and projects sufficiently over ends of car to fill up gap caused when two cars are coupled together, thus making a continuous running board whole length of car. It is made self-adjusting by coil springs back of slide and inside of casing allowing them to cushion into casing when two cars come together. It is likewise provided with a hinge in order to overcome unevenness of track or when two cars come together of different height."

He mentioned here a difficulty that I had not pointed out. Very frequently those cars are of different heights, some being from two to four inches higher than others. Of course there is less danger when they are of the same height, but when there is a difference in height, there is danger that a person running along the foot board would slip in jumping from one car to the other. This device is so arranged that it is on a hinge, and when one car is higher than the other the hinge will raise up, and allow one board to pass in such a position under the other as to keep continuous connection between the two cars. Now if such a device as this can be made applicable to freight cars, and it in no way interferes with the operating of the brakes, the cost of the end rail is of very little expense indeed; and I have made out a just case for calling on railway companies to comply with the request I am making. I have besides a letter from the secretary of the order of railway conductors. These men are constantly employed in railroading, and ought to be able to know what would be the best device in the interest, not only of the companies, but the men they employ. The following is the letter:—

ST. THOMAS, Ont., 18th March, 1888.

"I. DEYELL, Esq., St. Thomas, Ont.

"DEAR SIR,—We have this day been shown a model of running board and roof box car, as designed by you, and after thoroughly examining the same have found it to be a complete device which will fill a long felt desire of all railway men whose business requires them to go over the tops of trains, as it makes it impossible for a person to fall between the cars when in the act of stepping from one car to another, and we heartily recommend its adoption on all freight and box cars.

"Signed on behalf of the members of Union Division No. 13, Order of Railway Conductors.

"G. H. HILL,

"Secretary and Treasurer."

I have also another letter from the Brotherhood Brakemen, the men to whom, I am contending, this boon ought to be given:

"ST. THOMAS, 27th March, 1888.

"ISAAC DEYELL, Esq., St. Thomas.

"DEAR SIR,—I am instructed by our lodge to inform you that we, as a body, have inspected your automatic running board, and it was the opinion of the whole lodge that it is the best device for protection of brakemen that has ever been brought before us. The points that we look at are, namely, an unbroken run way, no leaping from car to car, and the hand railing which you have placed along the running board and encircling the brake, will make it as safe as it is possible to do. We feel grateful to you, and will say if your device had been in use prior to this, we would not mourn so many brothers who have met their deaths by falling between and off the sides of trains.

"Yours sincerely,

"F. W. COWLEY,

"Secretary."

Of course, not being a railway man, I cannot say positively that this device will be a success, equal to what these men anticipate it will be. But I can say that no one who has seen the model can fail to see what a great improvement, as regards safety, its principle will create. I feel earnestly in the interest of railway men that something should be done to protect them. There is another provision in the Bill which I heartily approve of. That is the provision making it compulsory on all railroads to have some means whereby the cylinders may be oiled from the cars. That system is the one adopted by the majority of the roads at present, but there are some which do not adopt it, and which compel the fireman or engineer to go out of the car and run along the running board forward to the cylinder and there to place the oil in a cup over the cylinder. This was the system followed to a great extent upon the Michigan and Central road until the last two or three years, and it was the cause of many accidents, the men being compelled to go out in the dark on these running boards, perhaps only six inches wide, carrying their can of oil in one hand and with the other raising the covering of the oil cup, without any means of hanging on to anything, so that often they were suddenly thrown from these running boards and killed. Now, although the majority of railroads are using the oil from the cab, yet it is not compulsory, and some roads still adhere to the old system. I think it is in the interest of the country, as well as it is in the interest of those who are employed upon the road, that this should be made compulsory on all railways, that they should have a device by which the cylinders may be oiled inside the cab, so as to prevent the necessity of the men going out at all seasons, at all hours and under all circumstances to oil those cylinders. I believe our railway system is a very important one in the interests of this Dominion. I believe it is something we ought to do our utmost to make as complete and efficient as we possibly can, and there is nothing that will conduce to that efficiency so much as to give that protection and assistance to those who are employed upon it. If we could possibly make railroading as safe as other employments, railway companies would be able to employ men at a more reasonable rate, perhaps, than they are now compelled to pay, and it would not only benefit the men by saving and protecting their lives, it would not only benefit the various insurance companies who now lose heavily by the accidents to the men employed on the roads, but it would protect the companies which are more or less liable for the accidents which occur to their employes while they are in their employ. It may be said that the company compels these men to sign an agreement that they will not expect indemnity when an accident occurs to them, but, if it is shown that this is caused through the negligence on the part of the company, I think they are liable in a court of law for damages for injury to the individual employed on the road; and, if that is not the case, it ought to be the case. If it is owing to the carelessness of the company that an individual who is compelled to remain in their employment in order to obtain his daily bread, is injured, the company ought to be held responsible and the time is not far distant when a compulsory law of that kind will come into force. Therefore, if you can make a provision to protect the company and the men, it is the bounden duty of the Government to consider the Bill carefully, to adopt its provisions and to incorporate them in the consolidation of the Railway Act, and to make it compulsory on every company to adopt the provisions of this Bill in every Railway Act which is placed on the Statute-book. Feeling this very strongly, I shall support the Bill with much pleasure.

Mr. SHANLY. I do not suppose there can be any special objection, at least I do not myself know of any special objection, to granting the special committee which has been moved for by my hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Denison), in the absence of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). But, as regards the Bill itself, it appears to me that it is entirely behind the times. I understand from some words which fell from the hon. member for East Simcoe that this Bill has been introduced from year to year to this House, and now it is simply what I would call a Rip Van Winkle Bill. It is not changed in any particular, and it is evident that the mover, in reprinting it from year to year, has reprinted it without any knowledge of what is going on in the railway world around him. I believe that the matters which this Bill proposes to deal with will never be settled by any legislation in this House, and my reason for so thinking is that the matter is now engaging the attention of a far abler parliament than ever assembled or ever will assemble for this particular purpose within these walls. That parliament is composed of men of the best brains and the best trained intellect in this direction that are to be found on this continent, or I might say in the world. It is a parliament composed of the master-mechanics of the continental railways, in which parliament Canada is represented, and it is a parliament in which every member knows exactly what he is talking about. You may ask perhaps what this parliament to which I refer has done. I will tell you what has been the outcome of it. Already the old-fashioned coupling, which has caused so much loss of life and so many accidents to limb, is a thing of the past. The decree has gone forth and an automatic coupling, which is to take the place of the old-fashioned coupler, is to be applied to all the railway cars of this continent, as well to those of this country as to the cars on the other side of the frontier; and what will compel us to use that coupling is not any legislation we may pass here, but a far higher law, the law of necessity, because we have to interchange with railways on the other side, and whatever improvements are decided upon by that parliament to which I have referred, and in which our own mechanical managers are consenting parties, will be used in Canada, without our legislating here in the crude fashion which is proposed in what I have called this Rip Van Winkle Bill. My hon. friend from East Elgin (Mr. Wilson) has given us a very long dissertation upon another matter which is a fruitful source of very sad accidents, and that is the necessity which exists for the brakemen on railway freight trains to run along the cars from end to end, be the night ever so dark, and the tops of the cars ever so slippery. The hon. gentleman did not exaggerate when he said that was one of the most fruitful sources of accident, and scarcely an accident of that kind occurs which is not fatal. But I do not think the remedy my hon. friend proposes, or which is proposed by certain correspondents of his, will be worth patenting, because, before he could patent his invention and apply it to the cars, before the running board that the Bill of the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) provides for could be applied to the millions of cars which are now travelling from end to end of this great continent, the necessity for the poor brakemen to run along the tops of the cars will have ceased for ever. The same parliament that I have spoken of are now providing for the adaptation, to freight trains, of the Westinghouse brake which has been so great a success in securing the safety of passenger trains, and on some of the western roads it has been so successfully adapted that a pattern train of some 30 cars has been sent, at the expense of the Westinghouse Company, to travel all over the Union and to show how easy is the adaptation of the Westinghouse brake to freight trains. That being so, my hon. friend's running board passes away. The patent is not worth paying for.

Mr. WILSON. I would ask the hon. member, even if you had that law, would it be possible to do away with the necessity of brakemen passing upon the top of the cars.

Mr. SHANLY. It will not necessitate the passing of brakemen from car to car at all, or along the tops of the cars. The object of the Westinghouse brake is to get rid of the necessity of employing brakemen to run along the tops of cars. Now, it is only by unanimity of plan, and by singleness of action, that we can obtain practical legislation of this sort, so as to do away with the dangers which now beset so many railway employes. I would ask, what can we expect from this Bill before us? It provides for a running board; but can we, with our few thousand miles of railway, legislate for the tens of thousands of miles of railway upon the other side of the frontier. Why, Sir, after you have put a running board upon our cars, you may find a car from 500 miles on the other side of the line without a running board, and you may find another car from 500 miles east upon the Intercolonial Railway, without a running board. We can not legislate here for all the roads who send their cars into this country. It is only by uniformity, and concert of action by all the railways of the continent, that we can bring about these great improvements. Sir, I say again, this Bill evidences want of thought, it evidences complete ignorance of current railway events. It may just as well be referred to a committee, but the conclusion which the committee will assuredly come to will be that our best plan is to wait for the improvements that are now being devised by the parliament of master mechanics; and when they are proposed and brought into use, as they will be, the higher law of necessity will compel us to adopt all the improvements that are suggested elsewhere. The interchange of cars is absolutely necessary for us. We can no more work our railways without interchanging with the American system, then we could work them if we used a different gauge, the inconvenience would be just as great. I may add that attempts have been made by almost every State in the Union by legislation to adopt just such a plan as that suggested by the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Wilson), and plans have been adopted by various states that such and such coupling shall be used, that such and such devices shall be adopted. But the law was inoperative, because the moment they got to the frontier of the State they came to a different system of coupling, to a different system of improvements, and their own became entirely useless. Therefore, while I do not object to a special committee amusing themselves over this Bill, the conclusion will be come to that they know very little of the matter indeed. The special committee will do that much good, the members will come to perceive their utter want of knowledge on the subject referred to them, and they will assuredly come to the conclusion that the true way to deal with this matter is to leave it in the hands of the great parliament composed of the master mechanics of the continental railways.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentlemen who have preceded me to-night have addressed their remarks almost exclusively to this running board. I do not know that the member for East Elgin (Mr. Wilson), has any particular object in advocating this running board, other than the interests of railway men.

Mr. SHANLY. Allow me a remark. I see no reason why my hon. friend from Elgin should not advocate it; I am merely putting him right upon this point, and telling him that something is going to happen that will render this running board useless.

Mr. LISTER. We agree about the running board, to some extent—I do not know anything about it.

Mr. SHANLY. I would suggest that my hon. friend's name be added to the special committee.

Mr. LISTER. It is very likely that there is something in the running board. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman for East Elgin was actuated by some sort of a motive in saying so much about that running board. It is probably a good thing, but there are other features of this Bill, Mr. Speaker, that deserve the attention of the House. In the first place, I think it is greatly to be regretted that the hon. gentleman who introduced this Bill, is not here for the purpose of explaining to the House its peculiar features, and the advantages to be derived from the passing of this Bill. We do know, however, that my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Cook) several years ago, when he was a member of the Ontario Legislature, introduced a measure of this sort for the protection of railway employés, and we know that the measure he introduced was, to a certain extent, adopted by the legislature of Ontario in 1881. Now, Sir, that legislation does not deal with this question of running boards, but it deals with questions which, I think, are of equal importance to the railway employés of the country, and which would not make it necessary that the railway companies should buy the patent that has been referred to by the hon. gentleman from East Elgin. In 1881 the Legislature of Ontario passed an Act for the purpose of making provision for the safety of railway employés and the public, and that Act only proposed to deal with the question of frogs, and with overhead bridges. Now, the whole legislation of modern times is to compel the employers of labor to provide, as far as is practicable and possible, for the safety of the people in their service; and if it is the duty of the manufacturers of the country to do that, it is equally the duty, if not more so, of the railway companies, so far as possible, to protect the thousands of men in their service from the dangers incident to the employment in which they are engaged. That legislation of Mr. Mowat was excellent legislation, so far as it went, and if that Act was copied by this Parliament and made the law of the Dominion, it would be excellent legislation, if it went no further. I think that this House, if they thought proper, could expunge the objectionable clauses of this Bill and compel the railway companies to protect, as far as they can, their employés by packing the frogs, and thus prevent many an accident resulting in death or injury to limb. If this House had not interfered with the railway charters granted by the Legislative Assembly of the Province of Ontario, if they had not confiscated the railways that we in Ontario have paid for with our own money, the employés of the railway companies would have the right, under this law, to compel the railway companies to compensate them for injuries they have sustained by neglect to comply with the provisions of this Act. But, Sir, this Legislature, in its wisdom, thought it was necessary that the railways we built in that Province, should be taken away from us and brought under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Dominion Parliament. Railways extending only a few miles, and that could by no process of reasoning be held to be for the general advantage of this Dominion, were taken from us. The result was that railways which cost the Province of Ontario well nigh the $30,000,000 have been taken away from the Province, and control over them has been assumed by this Parliament. The consequence is that thousands of men who were in the employ of those companies find themselves to-day without remedy or redress for injuries which under the law that incorporated those companies would have given them compensation. It has been held by our courts in more than one case, and in one case of a peculiarly painful character, that the Dominion Parliament having assumed control of the road, having declared them to be for the general advantage, the laws of the Province of Ontario did not apply, and men who would have been entitled to damages under that law were thrown out by the courts in consequence. If this Parliament takes control of these roads, I say in all fairness and honesty we are bound to give the workmen employed by those companies the same protection they had when this Parliament took control, if we go no further; and if there is one thing about railways more dangerous than another it is an unpacked frog. Year after year, almost month after month, life has been lost, men's prospects have been ruined by injuries which they have received. Within my own knowledge and within a year past a young man, the support of an old woman and several relatives, lost his life by having his foot caught in a frog. It was caught and he was unable to extricate himself before a train came along and he was killed. His friends had no redress. In another case a young man lost his leg; and these injuries are going on almost monthly. Shall it be said that this House, which poses as the protector and defender of the working classes, refuses to give to those men a measure of protection they had when we assumed control of those railways? I say it is unfortunate that the hon. member who introduced this Bill is not here to-night to promote it. If this Bill is referred to the special committee which has been proposed, what does it mean? Why, it is a delusion and a snare. The workmen are led to believe that the hon. gentleman who introduced the Bill is the champion of the workingman, and if it is referred to a committee it means that the Bill will never be crystallised into law during this Parliament and probably never. I am not here to attribute motives to any hon. gentleman. He may be interested in railways or he may not; but as a legislator, as a member here for the purpose of passing law in the interest of the community at large, I say that the interest of the railway companies should not for one moment interfere with the protection which the people of the country are entitled to receive as against those roads. We give the companies great privileges and great rights, and it is the privilege of the people to see that in return the companies give the people an ordinary measure of protection. That is what this Bill asks, and it will be compatible with the dignity of this House, with what we owe to ourselves, to strike out every section except the third section, and say that that section shall become law, and that the railway companies shall be obliged to pack the frogs as is provided in that section.

Mr. SHANLY. I did not at all touch upon the question of packing the frogs. I quite agree with my hon. friend in regard to that matter. I touched upon the points respecting which I said we could not practicably legislate, the interchange of trains between this country and the other side of the line. As regards protection with respect to frogs, we can do as we like. I quite agree that that clause should stand if it stands alone.

Mr. LISTER. I say, then, we should get legislation by degrees. If that clause is passed and becomes law we have done a great deal, because we shall make our law almost the same as that in Ontario, with the exception of the section relating to overhead bridges. I know nothing practically about running boards—of course, I know what they are, and presume they are exceedingly dangerous—but if some means could be devised for the purpose of reducing the danger it would be a very great benefit. But I can readily understand that, perhaps, the passage of this law immediately might throw burdens upon the railway companies and disarrange their affairs in a manner that would not be at all desirable. This matter should be referred either this Session or another Session to a committee which could hear evidence and consider the whole question, and devise some method to ensure the safety of the men on our railways; but so far as the third clause is concerned, I say again there should not be the slightest hesitation, we will be faithful to the duty we owe to the public if we do not make that the law during the present Session. That would not throw burdens on the railway companies and it is something that will add greatly to the safety of the railways, not only for the men employed, but the people who may be upon the track for business or otherwise. I trust so far as that clause is concerned, it will become law. I am glad beyond measure that the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Shanly) takes the view he does of this matter, because he is a man of great experience and his utterances are entitled to great weight upon such subjects. I think, as I stated a moment ago, we owe it to ourselves, to the people of Ontario at all events, to make the law as it was when the Dominion Parliament assumed control of the Provincial railways.

Mr. TISDALE. I think if the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister), had confined his enquiries with a view to arriving at practical conclusions, it would have been more desirable. In dealing with these matters, it should be the aim of hon. members to deal with them so as not to be adjudged as attributing motives, and thus be enabled to approach the subject in a proper manner. Surely we would then be able to approach subjects of this kind respecting which there is no shadow of partyism, and where no Dominion or Provincial rights would come into consideration. I regret this, because in a large part of the remarks of the hon. member I think the whole House will concur. I regret he should have deemed it necessary to speak as he did about the promoter of the Bill. As I understand, the promotion of a Bill of a public nature is this: as soon as a public Bill is introduced into the House it becomes the property of the House, and the introducer of the Bill must be considered as having discharged a greater duty than the balance of the House because he has taken the responsibility and trouble of putting it into practical shape and submitting the result to the House. I hold that the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) is now as responsible for this Bill as is the introducer, and if he is equally capable, as I believe he is to perfect it, then I think he should confine himself to improving the Bill, and if this course were followed we would get along a great deal better. In the few remarks that I have been called upon to address to the House I propose to try and act in that spirit. I do not agree with the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister), that referring a Bill to a special committee means burying it. If the hon. gentleman is not satisfied that the members named on the committee will do their duty and report promptly to the House, it is within the right of the hon. member, and I would support him in it, to change their names and substitute a committee who will report. I know that in the Railway Committee and in the Banking and Commerce Committee when special committees are appointed they report in a day or two. If these gentlemen who have been named are not of that sort he can move, and I will second him, that members be appointed on the committee who will discharge their duty. As I understand it, the reason for appointing a special committee is to expedite and not to delay the proceedings of the House, and I have no doubt that the gentlemen named on this committee will take that course. I fully concur in the very practical remarks of the member for Grenville (Mr. Shanly) as to the care which should be taken in endeavoring to legislate upon a matter which we understand so little of. I think it would be a great mistake for this House to endeavor to deal with the subjects mentioned in this Bill in any other way than by a special committee. There, the practical men connected with the railways should be given an opportunity of informing us from their experience and from their practical knowledge as to their views upon these subjects. They need not rule nor control the committee but hon. gentlemen must all admit that those who spend their life time in the management of such matters are those best capable of giving information on which we can form our ideas. Let me say this, that although I have nothing to do with railways, no more than most hon. gentlemen here, if you take this continent and this country and see the great progress that has been made in the safety and all other appliances of railways, we ought not to insinuate and I do not like to hear it insinuated as it were, in the House that the railway companies are against those improvements. Look at our Patent Office or go to Washington and see the thousands of models of patent rights, such as the hon. gentleman from East Elgin (Mr. Wilson) mentioned, and you will wonder how railway men know what to choose from, there are so many things which come under the notice of railway managers, enlightened, intelligent, as a rule merciful as they are, which it would be their own interest to adopt, or as the hon. member for East Elgin said, it was a matter of pounds, shillings and pence to them if those appliances could be adopted. There is no doubt that all those approved appliances if found practical when put on a railroad are a saving of money to the companies, because they are in some way or other liable for compensation for loss of life or property. I believe that the special committee is the only proper way to deal with those questions, except perhaps the question of improved frogs. I think it is wise that a special committee should, as far as they can, investigate it and report to the House. With regard to running boards I venture to say that if you ask a brakeman on one of those mixed trains whether he would like a change of this sort or not, it is doubtful if he would say that he would like it. I will tell you why. If you get a man used to one set of appliances with a broad running board and supports he gets as it were to trust in them, and the first thing he knows, if the night is dark or in a moment of danger or excitement, when he has all he can do to manage the brakes, he strikes another car that has not got the same appliances, and he is sure to go down at once. He had relied upon the appliances upon one car and this led him to trust to them when he got on the car they were not on. Those are matters that should be considered. I am not speaking against the principle of the Bill. I believe we ought to get such light as will enable us beyond peradventure to legislate in a way that will make our legislation an improvement and not simply an experiment. For instance oil cups are theoretical things, and in my opinion some of the railway companies will not put them in the cabs. If you enter into any railway furnishing shop in this country, or in the States where there are so many thousands of miles of railway, you will see all kinds of patent oil cups, but the trouble with them is that sometimes they won't work, and the machinery on which the safety of not only the engineer and fireman on the train, but the lives of the passengers and the property depend will get out of order. Within my own knowledge in running a small private railroad we had those oil cups, and we found that we had to take them off, because they would not work. The men never could tell whether the oil went into the machinery or not, and although great expense had been incurred we had to remove them and return to the old-fashioned way. I mention that as an illustration why our Parliament should not exercise its power—and it is all powerful—in legislating about matters without having sufficient knowledge of them to legislate upon. It would be well, I think, that a special committee should examine this matter and let us have prompt action and report on which we can decide whether we should take the responsibility of recommending some of those appliances. If we say to the railway companies that this thing should be done it is a very serious matter. Suppose for instance that this Parliament should say those oil cups should be put on the trains and suppose the oil cups do not prove effective and lead to a disaster we take the responsibility of this by relieving the railway companies. We should not touch anything except simple matters about which there can be no discussion without having the opinions of the people who are responsible for the management of those great railways. It is a most dangerous thing to interfere in those matters without a proper knowledge of the subject and I think it would be highly improper for us to take any action without a special examination before a committee who understand what legislation should take place upon the matter.

Mr. BARRON. I have listened carefully to the remarks of the hon. member of South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) and I was a little disappointed to find that he made no reference to the fact of the Dominion of Canada confiscating the railroads of Ontario. I think, Sir, as the representative of an Ontario constituency he should have dwelt somewhat on that fact.

Mr. TISDALE. I would ask the hon. gentleman if he thinks that that is part of the discussion. If he does I can say a good deal about it, because I think the matter was not fairly put by the hon. member who preceded me. I said I proposed to discuss the matter in question without bringing anything into it which might stir up feeling on the opposite side of the House so long as it is not pertinent to the question before us.

Mr. BARRON. I will agree with my hon. friend, who sits to my right, in saying that it is a pity the Dominion of Canada confiscated the railways bonused by the Province of Ontario.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question.

Mr. BARRON. I am coming to the question. Because by their so doing they deprived the employés and the workmen of the railways of Ontario of a law which gave them certainly more protection than they have under any Dominion Act. As my hon. friend to my right says they have no protection at all under any Dominion Act. I agree with my friend to my right that it is a pity that the hon. gentleman who has introduced this Bill is not in the House to-night to promote it. I recollect last Session a similar Bill was introduced by the hon. gentleman towards the end of the Session. Why it was not introduced till late in the Session cannot be understood, except for the reason that it was not desirable it should become law. It does appear to me that by referring the Bill now to a committee, such as is proposed, that the intention is that it shall not become law this Session, and that employés on railroads shall not have that protection that they had under the Provincial Act before the railways of Ontario were confiscated by the Dominion. Now, Sir, different gentlemen who have spoken have pointed out some defects that exist in the Bill as introduced. One thing that the Bill does not provide for at all is overhead bridges. It is a fact, I believe, at all events the cases in the Province of Ontario have shown, that in the case of probably one-half of the railway lines the brakemen have no protection from overhead bridges. Take for instance the Midland Railway. The Grand Trunk Railway Company is the lessee of that road, and has escaped the obligation to raise the overhead bridges to the proper height above the tops of the cars by reason of the statute requiring the owner of the bridge to do so. Then again the statute requires the railway company to raise the bridge to its proper height within twelve months after the passing of the Act; but that provision does not meet the case of the Midland Railway, because the Grand Trunk acquired that road more than a year after the passing of the Act. Thus we find that a cause of serious injury and sometimes death exists on the great lines of railway in the country, and there is no remedy provided by law. Therefore I think it is a pity that the hon. gentleman who introduced this Bill this Session, and the same Bill last Session, is not in the House, because he would have recollected that I drew his attention to this matter last Session in order that he might introduce into the Bill some legislation to meet the serious case I have spoken of. I find that the Bill is also defective in not providing for a sufficient space in the switches. I believe that the Bill provides that they shall be opened three inches. It must be apparent to any hon. gentleman that danger is as likely to result from these switches as now results from frogs. We know how numerous railway employés are at the present time. Our whole country is honeycombed with railroads, and there are necessarily a great many employés, and their occupation is a very dangerous one indeed. Therefore, I think that this Bill, involving as it does such an important matter as the safety of human life, should be taken up by the Government. Let them follow the example set by the Government of the Hon. Oliver Mowat, as they have done on other occasions, and let them take control of and assume all responsibility for this very important measure.

Mr. TISDALE. The General Railway Act regulates all the bridges.

Mr. BARRON. If my hon. friend will take the trouble to read the case of McLaughlin vs. the Grand Trunk Railway Company—

Mr. TISDALE. I am not speaking of cases; I am speaking of the law. The hon. gentleman has induced the House to believe that we have no law to regulate the height of overhead bridges; and he is finding fault with this Bill because he claims that it should do that. The General Railway Act provides that bridges must be so built as to be free from danger.

Mr. BARRON. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that the General Railway Act does regulate overhead bridges, but unfortunately that Act has been held not to apply to the Grand Trunk Railway as lessee of the Midland, for the reasons I have stated. Thus it was that in a case where the Grand Trunk Company was morally responsible for the loss of a man's life, it escaped that liability by reason of our legislation not being sufficient to meet the case.

Mr. TEMPLE. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down has not spoken to a single section of this Bill. The hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Wilson), I think is the only one on that side of the House who has spoken to any section of this Bill. He speaks in favor of having the frogs closed up to a certain extent. I agree with him and with the Bill on that point, and I had that done myself years ago when I was connected with a railroad. With regard to the running boards, I think the hon. member for South Grenville (Mr. Shanly) is perfectly right. I do not see how you are going to have running boards with all the different cars that are in use. There are thousands of cars passing backward and forward over the international boundary for thousands of miles; and though you might have all the cars in this country built with the running boards in one form, all the cars from the other side of the boundary would have another kind, and these cars are mixed together in almost every train. Therefore, it is a matter of impossibility to make any change in the running boards, and there would be more danger and more loss of life in having different systems of running boards on different cars in one train than there is at the present time. Therefore we should condemn that part of the Bill. With reference to the oiling of the cars, it is done by this system with a great deal of danger, and the system is in fact not practicable, so that it is given up by different railways. You cannot tell by this system whether the lubricator is working or not, and all the machinery may be broken up for the want of oil. There is therefore only one section of this Bill that can be recommended, and I think the best plan would be to refer the whole Bill to a special committee.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I did not understand the hon. member for West Lambton to cast any reflections on the promoter of the Bill for his absence to-night. I understood him simply to say that he regretted it, and I say that I regret it too, because I believe that hon. gentleman has made a special study of the matter, and it would be to our advantage to-night to have the result of his study and information. For that reason and no other, we regret his absence. The hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) has told us that there were plenty patents of invention in the patent office to secure everything wanted. I know there are numerous inventions there, but I know also that not one in fifty, in railway matters as in others, is practicable, and the best evidence of this is that they are not adopted for use. It is time that we were doing something in this matter. I was happy to hear that a far higher parliament than this has taken the matter in hand and that we might expect to see the whole thing settled. It is refreshing to know that the highest intellect in the land are considering this matter, and that when they see fit, they are going to remedy all the evils; but I would simply say they have been a mighty long time about it. Thousands of lives have been lost within the last thirty-five years. In fact not a week passes but we hear of the death or the wounding or maiming of some railway employé, yet these demi-gods have been asleep or on a journey all that time, and it is only now, when there is an attempt to do something, they tell us to keep quiet, and that they will soon settle the whole difficulty. I cannot help thinking that it will not do for us to shelter ourselves behind their gigantic intellect. Although our intellects may be limited and our experience small, yet we have a great responsibility resting upon us, and that responsibility becomes the more apparent when we consider the difficulties that require protection. These men whom we desire to protect are the employés of rich and powerful companies; they are men who have not the means nor the influence to protect themselves, they are men who are exposed to the greatest dangers. So well known is this that insurance companies charge the highest premiums to brakemen of any class in the community, and it is a well known fact, established by statisticians, that the average life of a railway brakeman is the shortest of that of any class. It is therefore high time that this House took some action in the matter. Reference has been made to the fact that the Dominion Government has taken over almost all the railway lines in the country. In most of the Provinces, in Ontario I believe, they have passed laws to protect the employés of railway companies. By the taking over of these railways by the Dominion, these Acts have become inoperative, and it seems strange to me that the Government should have neglected all this time to make some provision for the protection of these people. In view of this fact, I think it is a great pity that the matter was left to be dealt with by private members of the House. It certainly was one with which the Government should have dealt, if only for the reason that they have access to more sources of information than have private members.

Mr. TEMPLE.

Mr. SPROULE. The Bill before the House is too important to be dropped, even though the hon. gentleman who proposed it is not here. I am sure he is as much disappointed as any hon. gentleman here can be having to be absent. I had a conversation with him for some time about this measure, and I am quite satisfied that some of the amendments suggested by hon. gentlemen were intended to be introduced at the proper stage by the introducer of the Bill. I think there would be a better outcome for the Bill if it were referred to a special committee with power to call witnesses and papers. I do not think any hon. gentleman who has ever given consideration to the question, or has ever gone into the yards where a large number of cars are standing and seen the narrow spaces men have to travel on in fair weather and foul weather, in daylight and darkness, will fail to admit that in the interest of humanity it is important some change should be made. When we remember that these railway employés are obliged to travel in daylight and darkness on these freight cars, with a very narrow board, in some cases not more than twelve or fourteen inches wide, and often covered with a sheet of ice, and that these narrow spaces on the tops of the cars are not guarded by any railing to which the brakeman can possibly catch on, we cannot wonder that the number of accidents is so large. It is therefore of great importance that we should, if possible, devise some means of removing this evil and saving a large number of lives. One clause of the Bill provides for making the board of a certain width, sufficient to allow a man to pass along conveniently; in addition it provides a railing and also for the running boards coming as close together as practicable, so that men can pass from one car to another without running the risk which they must now run. If there was nothing else in the Bill, it is important that it should become law, but there are other important amendments that could be introduced in the select committee, and that select committee should be enabled to take evidence and to look into the matter more closely. There was another question brought up by hon. gentlemen opposite, and they seemed to hold that it was a drawback in connection with our control over railways in this country, and that is the fact that the Dominion Government has said that certain railways are in the interest of the Dominion, and therefore come under Dominion control. If I understand anything about law, I think that is an advantage to the employés on the roads, because they are passing constantly from one Province to another, and an accident may happen in one Province to-day and in another Province to-morrow. That necessitates carrying on the action under different laws. The law in one Province may be different from the law in another. Now, no matter in what Province the accident occurs, the prosecution is always conducted under the same law, and therefore the people are able to understand and to interpret the law and are able to understand the responsibilities of the company and what redress they may have in the event of accidents. I believe it was intended to go further in this law and to provide also for compensation for all accidents to employés on the road no matter from what cause. Some may hold that it would be unwise to make such a provision, but other countries have adopted it and have found it to be not injurious to the railways and to be beneficial to the employés; and I think, remembering the large number of accidents which occur from year to year and the causes of the accidents and remembering the careless indifference which is generally exhibited by railway companies as to the safety of their employés, it becomes all the more important that the Legislatures of the country should take up the subject and pass some such imperative law to compel them to provide for the safety of human life where provision for it can be made.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have listened with very great attention to the very interesting and important dis-ussion we have had. I am quite certain it would be very difficult to find any question which would appeal more to the feelings of members on both sides of the House than this, which is a matter of vast importance. I regret exceedingly that the promoter of this Bill is not present. The very fact that he has from time to time moved in it shows that his attention has been drawn to it and that he has given a very considerable amount of consideration, but I am certain that every member of the House must have been very much impressed with the very practical observations made by the hon. member for South Grenville (Mr. Shanly). It is a great advantage to this House, when questions of this kind come up, to have gentlemen whose profession has directed their attention to matters of this importance, and whose great ability is recognised throughout the country as fitting them to give advice to the House on questions of such transcendent interest. I feel the force of what has been said by several members on both sides of the House as to the great responsibility that must necessarily devolve upon the Government in relation to a matter of this kind affecting the safety of human life and the prevention of a great number of very deplorable accidents, and, I think, under the circumstances, in the absence of the promoter of this measure, and in view of the fact that the Minister of Railways has an important Bill on the paper, which I trust his restored health will enable him in a short time to present for consideration, the best course to take would perhaps be to adjourn the debate, and allow the question to rest on that adjournment until the railway measure for which the Government is responsible is laid before the House. Then this Bill can be brought forward, and gentlemen who have taken an interest in it, who have investigated the subject and who may be prepared to offer valuable suggestions, will have the opportunity of presenting those views, and we would be in that way enabled to incorporate any feature of this Bill or any suggestion, having in view the attaining of the important object at which this Bill aims in the Bill for which the Government is responsible. I trust, therefore, I shall meet with the approval of gentlemen on both sides of the House if, with that object, I move the adjournment of this debate.

AID TO WRECKED VESSELS BILL.

Mr. HAGGART (for Mr. KIRKPATRICK) moved second reading of Bill (No. 7) to permit American vessels to aid vessels wrecked or disabled in Canadian waters. He said: The object of this Bill, as I understand, is to give similar privileges to American wrecking vessels to those which are allowed us on the other side. I believe legislation has been passed in the United States which allows our vessels to assist wrecked vessels in United States waters on condition that similar legislation is passed in our country which will allow American wrecking vessels to enjoy similar privileges.

An hon. MEMBER. Reciprocity, is it?

Mr. HAGGART. True reciprocity.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am sorry that the mover of this Bill is not present. It is a Bill of very great importance, and one which, I think, ought not to be proceeded with by the House on the very brief statement of the hon. gentleman who has been kind enough to move it in the absence of the hon. gentleman who is responsible for it. The measure is one of great public importance, which I think should not be hastily or summarily dealt with. The question has been before the House, it has been made the subject of a good deal of diplomatic intercourse between the Government of the United States and the Government of Canada. A measure somewhat similar to this has, I think, been put on the Statute-book of the United States, providing that, in a certain contingency, there should be reciprocity in regard to this matter. It is very well known that the Government of Canada have for a very long period been extremely anxious to expand that reciprocal action between the Government of the United States and the Government of this country, and to place it upon a very broad basis in connection with the coasting trade. A standing offer, as the House is well aware, is upon our Statute-book inviting the reciprocal action of other countries, and a number of countries have taken advantage of it. We stand in the position that we are quite prepared to offer the great advantages of the enormous coast which we possess and the very valuable coasting trade of Canada to any country in the world which is prepared to give to Canada the like privileges in its waters. I hope the time will come when the great country to the south of us will be prepared to meet us on that question, and when we shall have an opportunity of registering Canadian built vessels in the United States of America and giving similar privileges to vessels built in the United States to have registry in Canada, and that under the same arrangement vessels under the flag of the United States will have the same coasting privileges that our own vessels have, while we on the shores of the United States will enjoy the same privileges which we are prepared to extend to them. I think, Sir, under these circumstances, we have reason to look forward to a much larger measure of reciprocity than the limited one involved in this question of wrecking. But apart altogether from the general question of reciprocal trade between the United States and Canada, there is the coasting trade of the inland waters. I believe it is very well known that the Government of Canada have again and again proposed to the Government of the United States, that if they were not prepared, on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of the two countries, to have mutual reciprocity in coasting, we have invited them to have reciprocal action in regard to the coasting trade of inland waters; and reciprocal action in regard to the coasting trade of the great lakes and the inland waters, would at once dispose of all the difficulties connected with this question of wrecking. I did not intend to offer a single remark upon this subject until I had heard what was to be said by the advocates and the opponents on this measure, if it has any opponents; but I could not allow the second reading of this Bill to pass accompanied only by the few observations of the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart) who was not responsible for the Bill. I therefore rose simply to prevent the question being put to the House until we could have an opportunity of hearing what was to be said for and against this measure. Therefore, if it is intended to proceed with the Bill, as the promoter of the measure is now in his place, I would like to be allowed to rest my observations at this point, until I hear what that hon. gentleman has to say in regard to this question.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I am sorry I was not present to relieve my hon. friend of the duty of moving the second reading of this Bill. I intended to listen to what was to be said by hon. gentlemen, and to offer some remarks at the close of the debate; but as the Finance Minister has asked me now to explain the object of this Bill, I shall take the opportunity of doing so. The Bill, Sir, is a very simply one in form, but it is far reaching in the principle it involves. The question of reciprocity of wrecking is one which interest a very large number of our citizens. When I tell the House that the number of vessels navigating the inland waters of Canada is upwards of 4,000, that there are 35,000 seamen employed on those vessels, and that the capital invested in our inland marine amounts to many millions of dollars, the House will perceive the great importance of the subject dealt with by this Bill. The question of preventing vessels, either American or Canadian, from assisting others which may be stranded, or in distress, or wrecked in the waters of either country, seems to have been of somewhat recent date. I believe it is only within a few years that any attempt was made to prevent Canadian vessels from rendering assistance to American vessels or Canadian vessels in American waters, and vice versa. In 1842, the question of the free navigation of the inland waters was dealt with by the Ashburton Treaty, as stated by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) the other day; but whether that gives the right to aid vessels wrecked or distressed, I do not think can be doubted. It does not give that right explicitly, and it is only the common law of humanity which would compel us to claim that right. But the customs law as enforced now, distinctly says that American vessels cannot afford assistance to Canadian vessels or American vessels in Canadian waters. The law was so interpreted by the late Government in 1878, and the then Minister of Customs issued a circular to all the custom houses informing them that American vessels were not to be allowed to render assistance to vessels wrecked or disabled in Canadian waters, and that if any American vessels did so, they were liable to be seized. In consequence of that circular some American vessels rendering assistance to vessels wrecked or disabled in Canadian waters, were seized, and now application has to be made to the customs authority for permission. The hon. Minister of Customs stated the other day that such permission was never refused if it was shown that no Canadian tug or Canadian wrecking vessel could go to their assistance. But, Sir, I submit that before that information can be obtained, before it can be ascertained whether there are any Canadian tugs that can go to the assistance of a vessel in distress, great injury to life and property may occur, and the critical moment may have passed when assistance could be of any avail. The American Government seeing this, and having such a large number of vessels—because American vessels far outnumber Canadian vessels on our inland waters—desirous of having reciprocity in this matter, they passed a Bill in 1878, declaring that Canadian vessels of all description :

"May render aid or assistance to Canadian or other vessels wrecked or disabled in the waters of the United States contiguous to the Dominion of Canada, provided that this Act shall not take effect until proclamation by the President declaring that the privilege of aiding American or other vessels wrecked or disabled in Canadian waters contiguous to the United States, has been extended by the Government of the Dominion of Canada, and declaring this Act to be in force."

Now, Sir, that Act has remained on the Statute-book of the United States ever since 1878, and no action has been taken by this Government. An opportunity now offers for us to put in force the principle which was recognised by both sides in this House the other day, one side asking for unrestricted reciprocity with the United States in everything. If they ask for unrestricted reciprocity, surely hon. gentlemen will be glad to take partial reciprocity as a means towards that end. Every hon. gentleman, I take it, on that side of the House who voted for unrestricted reciprocity, will be prepared to vote for this very important measure of partial reciprocity. Those hon. gentlemen on this side of the House who voted for a resolution declaring that they always has been in favor, and were still in favor, of reciprocity with the United States, provided it did not interfere with the National Policy, must, I think favor, this Bill also; because the National Policy is not in any way affected by this Bill. In fact it helps the National Policy. The National Policy was adopted for the purpose of fostering the shipping industry, among others, that large interest which we want to develop and strengthen; and everything that would tend to the prosperity of that interest ought to receive favor at the hands of the friends of the National Policy. We find all the shipping men of the country in favor of a measure which will render them assistance and help to protect their property when in jeopardy. The insurance men, who derive a large income from our marine interest, are all in favor of this measure. Every facility should be given to parties who will invest money in wrecking appliances and in bringing, as quickly as possible, wrecking vessels to the aid of vessels in distress. I think, therefore, both sides of the House should favor this motion. I said that this stipulation or restriction upon the right of common humanity to render assistance to vessels in distress and to save life and property was first passed by the late Government. I have here a copy of the instruction issued, and I will read it. It is a circular issued on 8th March, 1878, addressed by the Commissioner of Customs to collectors of Customs throughout the country, and is as follows.—

"SIR,—I am now instructed by the Minister of Customs to call your attention to the bearing of the customs law upon the treatment of wrecked vessels or property in Canadian waters, which provides in effect that no vessel, foreign or Canadian, has legal right to interfere with vessels or material in Canadian waters, unless permitted by the collector of customs at the nearest port after reporting to him. And no foreign vessel should receive such permission, as it is contrary to customs law, and should be placed under detention in case of violation."

I can hardly believe the statement I read in some of the papers published from the Secretary of State at Washington alleging that actually where an American tug went to an American vessel and removed the frozen bodies of the captain's wife and boy from the wreck and saved part of the cargo she was actually fined for rendering such assistance.

Mr. CHARLTON. What case was that?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. That was the case of the Augustus Ford driven ashore near Grand River in December, 1874. The vessel Brian which was passing near the place at the time took off the frozen dead bodies of the captain's wife and boy and saved part of the cargo of the wrecked vessel, and was fined for doing so. It is true that part of the fine was remitted afterwards, but the fact remains that for rendering that service in the hour of distress an American vessel was actually subjected to the laws of this country and was fined. It is hard to believe that there should be such a want of common humanity and neighborly feeling between these two countries as to permit such a thing to be possible. I hope now that the United States has shown a desire to have a reciprocity treaty in this matter, that she has held out the hand of neighborly good feeling, we will have a similar law placed on our Statute-book to that in the United States. It has been objected that we would be giving away a great deal by doing so, that we should insist upon some other reciprocal right being given to us, for instance, that of the free navigation laws or the free right of towage. But if the United States will not give us this, let us not insist in dragging in something not germane to the subject and which will destroy its whole effect. Let us in the cause of common humanity, as they term it, provide that the first person that shall come to the aid of life and property in distress shall have the right to do so. It has been stated a large portion of the wrecks are in Canadian waters. I hold in my hand a statement which disproves it, a statement of the wrecks of last year, and it will astonish hon. members, I am sure, to know that last year there were 204 lives lost in our inland waters and not less than $4,500,000 worth of property was destroyed; the total losses comprise 73 vessels, representing over 20,000 tons. Out of those 73 vessels which became a total loss only 11 were lost in Canadian waters. We have been told that the reason for enforcing the customs law was that the wrecks were in American waters as four or five to one; but here is this statement that of 73 vessels that proved a total loss only 11 were wrecked in Canadian waters, and of 100 vessels that were a partial loss only 12 were in Canadian waters. This shows that we will not be giving up a great right for the benefit of Americans. We are opening up to our own wreckers and those who have wrecking vessels and appliances a large territory in which to ply their vocation.

Moreover, it must be remembered that of those vessels which are navigating the lakes the largest and most valuable of them are American vessels, and they ply more especially in American waters. The wrecks that are most valuable to the wrecking companies are American vessels and the great losses are in American waters. I contend, therefore, that it would be a distinct advantage to our Canadian wrecking companies and wreckers if we had in this matter a reciprocal right of free wrecking.

Mr. COOK. What proportion of the mercantile marine of the great lakes belongs to Canada?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. A very small proportion at present. Out of four thousand vessels a very large proportion are American and they are the most valuable. But I may tell the hon. gentleman that I have good reason to believe that this is going to be rapidly changed owing to the opening up of our North-West and the large crop of wheat which is coming down to Fort William and Port Arthur to be shipped from those ports either to the St. Lawrence or by Buffalo to New York, which will require Canadian vessels to bring it to the St. Lawrence. That has caused a great demand for Canadian tonnage, and to-day we know there are two large vessels coming from England across the Atlantic to be employed in this grain trade. Mr. Marks, of Port Arthur, and Messrs. Corwall & Grasset of Toronto, have each ordered a large steam vessel of over two thousand tons burthen, and these are only the forerunners of the large fleet that will be required to carry the grain crop from Fort Arthur and Port William. In a very few years the Canadian tonnage will bear a very fair proportion to that of the United States, but at present American tonnage is much larger and altogether out of proportion to Canadian tonnage. When the Americans not only offer reciprocal wrecking to us but press it upon us, and in the dispatches received from Washington which have been printed and brought down in the papers, it appears they express a very great desire that the common right of humanity, as they express it, should be accorded by this Government and we should have free wrecking, and that the right to render assistance to life and property when in distress should be as free as the air we breathe or the sunlight. If the House will give it a second reading and when the Bill comes up next week I will propose that some changes can be made which shall make it applicable to all the points that may be raised. It now does not provide I think sufficiently to meet the wants of the case, but I would prefer to make those amendments later on and I hope the House will give it a second reading.

Mr. SHANLY. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance just now referred to this Bill as limited in its scope. It certainly is very limited, but the cases for which it is proposed to provide are almost certain to be of a very urgent character indeed. When our house happens to be on fire we do not generally ask where the firemen came from with their engine before we allow them to couple on the hose. Therefore I hope when the matter comes up for debate again the Government will not ask that this Bill should be postponed until a larger scope of reciprocity in other cases will be decided upon.

Mr. CHARLTON. Before the Bill receives its second reading, if it does receive its second reading, I desire to address a few remarks to the House in connection with the consideration of this question. Reciprocity in wrecking is rather a convenient term and upon the surface it would seem that the proposal made by the American Government in their statutory offer of 1878 that there should be reciprocity in wrecking between the two countries was a reasonable question. But I think, Sir, when we examine into the question a little deeper that facts will present themselves for the consideration of the House which are not apparent on the surface of the question. We have a very skilful use made of the humanity cry, and I shall be able to show a little later on that the course of the Canadian Government in that respect cannot be called into question at all, and that the action of this Government has been invariably humane and that in every case of emergency. In every case where there was danger of loss or imminent danger of loss of property that could be averted by prompt action, the Canadian customs authorities have always promptly granted a permit for American vessels to act. I will come to that more fully later on. This policy of restriction, with regard to wrecking upon the coasts of our great lakes, whether right or wrong, is a policy that was not inaugurated by this Government, but it was inaugurated by the American Government. They initiated the orders of which my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) complains, and our Government was simply forced, in self-defence, to issue orders of the same character protecting our own interests from the attack made by this order of the American Treasury Department. This course, Sir, which was rendered necessary by the American action happens to have proved to be a course which has redounded very largely to the advantage of Canada, and in consequence of that fact we have the American Government applying to us through its statutory offer of 1878, and making applications in various ways, to induce us to give reciprocity in wrecking, while they are going back on their own proposition, retracing their steps and asking us in point of fact to enter into an arrangement that would give them the whole business, which I shall proceed to show later on. The way the thing has worked has been this: It is true as my hon. friend says that the greater part of the tonnage on the lakes is American tonnage; it is also true as is shown by the report made by Mr. Lewis (which unfortunately was lost between some two departments of this Government and never was published and which is alluded to only in the records) that up to that time a large portion of the wrecks on the great lakes had taken place on Canadian coasts. It is this fact that leads the American Government, the American shipowners, the American insurance companies and wrecking companies to desire the alteration which my friend from Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) also desires should be made in reference to this policy. The hon. gentleman tells us that surely if we cannot get all we want in unrestricted reciprocity it would be a good thing to take a little. Well, that depends entirely upon the circumstances of the case. If that little is something entirely to our disadvantage I am not in favor of taking it. If I may be permitted to refer to the matter, I may say that the hon. gentleman referred to the little we took the other day in the shape of the admission of trees and fruits and so forth. So far as I am concerned I think we took that little with rather a bad grace and had it not been for the unfortunate offer which we had made which forced us into rather an unfortunate position and rendered it expedient to take these, I think that most of the members of this House would not have taken that small measure of reciprocity we took the other day. I am not much in favor of taking another dose of the same kind when the circumstances are so much different. Now, the business of wrecking of course pertains to the coasting trade. Wrecking is an incident of that trade. We have upon our Statute-book an offer, which is also a statutory offer, made in the year 1870—eight years before the American offer was made—which is contained in chap. 14, 33 Vic., sec. 2, and in that section we extend to the Americans this offer. The statute goes on to make provisions with regard to the coasting trade, prohibiting in the first section any but British vessels carrying passengers or freight from one part of our coast to the other. The second section contains this offer:

"The Governor in Council may, from time to time, declare that the foregoing provisions of this Act shall not, while such Order in Council is in force, apply to the ships or vessels of any foreign country in which British ships are admitted to the coasting trade of such country and to carry goods and passengers, from any port in such country to another, and may, from time to time, revoke or alter such Order in Council."

As I said, wrecking is an incident in the coasting trade, and I am not in favor of allowing the American people or Government to select that particular incident in the trade, of which reciprocity will be a great advantage to them, and drop all the rest where reciprocity in trade may be of some advantage to us. If they desire reciprocity on the great lakes let them give us reciprocity in the coasting trade as well, of which wrecking is an incident, but to allow them to select this one thing in which we had the advantage over them; an advantage acquired by their own act, for their own act forced upon us the course that we took, and which resulted to our advantage. If they desire that incident of the coasting trade let them open the whole question as to trade on the waters of the great lakes. Now, Sir, with regard to the orders issued by the Customs Department in this country, and with regard to the assertion that the policy pursued by this Government has been an inhumane one, and one not characteristic of the spirit of this age of civilisation, I wish to point out what those regulations have been. I have here No. 9 of the Sessional Papers of the year 1880-81. This subject of wrecking had been made a subject of communication between the Governments at that time, and Sessional Paper No. 50 of this volume contains the correspondence in relation to that matter. I have selected from this correspondence some portions which will clearly show in what spirit our Government had treated this question. The first paper is the copy of a report of the Committee of the Honorable the Privy Council for Canada, approved by His Excellency on the 6th of June, 1879:

"The Committee have had under consideration a despatch from Her Majesty's Minister at Washington to Your Excellency of 18th December last, and enclosures, relating to the regulations in force on the lake coast of Canada, respecting the treatment of wrecked vessels and property in Canadian waters.

"The Honorable the Minister of Customs, to whom the above mentioned despatch and enclosures were referred, reports that the question appears to be misunderstood by the authorities at Washington, owing, he believes, to the fact that the action of the Customs Department has been presented to them not only in an exaggerated but a very erroneous light.

"That as it respects the Department circular of 8th March, 1878, a copy of which he submits, it was, he states, addressed to collectors of customs only, and was intended to remind them of the proper bearing of customs law upon wrecked property actually stranded upon the Canadian shores, and this they thoroughly understood. That no Canadian officer ever interpreted the circular or the law, as justifying interference with the efforts of vessels of any nationality to succor any vessel in distress and save human life or property, while there was a possibility of preventing their loss, nor has any case of such interference ever occurred.

"That in the matter of the steam tug Sarah Bryant, wrecked in November, 1874, alluded to by Mr. Evarts, it is plain that the circular could have had no influence upon the officers concerned, as it was not issued until about 3½ years after the occurrence, and that the assertion made by the master of the Bryant that he took off the frozen dead bodies of the captain's wife and others is not justified by facts, there being living witnesses and documentary evidence, of the most unquestionable character, to prove that the living and the dead were taken from the wreck by a Canadian boat crew, before the tug arrived at the scene of the disaster. The correspondence upon what point he also submits.

"That in the case of the Champion it has been freely admitted that the officer who seized her, did so under a mistaken impression as to the nature of the Act, and that he was simply, as he supposed, enforcing the law prohibiting foreign vessels from towing in Canadian waters. That this description of work has never been allowed by the United States customs to Canadian vessels in their waters. That the vessel, however, was not detained an hour, and the only inconvenience suffered was leaving a deposit for a short time with the collector of Customs of the sum of $400, which was promptly returned as soon as the Commissioner of Customs became acquainted with the facts of the case.

"That the desire of the Government of Canada has always been, and still is, to effect a mutual arrangement by which the coasting laws might be so ameliorated on both sides, as to enable them to dispense entirely with the present unpleasant and inconvenient restrictions upon the movements of the vessels of either nation, but that in the meantime the laws must be respected, and while the claims of humanity have been, and always will be duly recognised, it is the special duty of the Department of Customs to protect the rights and interests of the Canadian commercial marine against the encroachments of all parties.

"That the Government of Canada is not only willing but anxious that the most liberal interpretation shall be given to laws relating to the navigation of the inland lakes and rivers, and are ready to enter into negotiations with the Government of the United States, with the view to the adoption of a more liberal policy in this respect, but that they cannot consent to any measure which would give United States ship owners privileges in Canadian waters not secured in equal proportion to Canadian ship owners in United States waters, nor can any partial system of reciprocity be accepted, which in its practical operation would favor the latter at the expense of the former."

That is exactly what is asked here, a particular system of reciprocity that will favor the United States at the expense of Canada; that is the partial application of the system of reciprocity that is asked by my hon. friend. Then, we have in a circular, No. 231, the following addressed to the collector of Customs:

"CUSTOMS DEPARTMENT,
"OTTAWA, 19th September, 1879.

"Sir,—Referring to the Departmental circular No. 210—3, of 5th of March, 1878, on the subject of wrecking by foreign vessels in Canadian waters, I am desired, by the Minister of Customs, to inform you that the circular is not to be understood as having any application to cases wherein life may be endangered, or where property may be jeopardised by delay, such, for instance, as the grounding of a vessel in circumstances in which immediate assistance would prevent a wreck. Nor is there any possible case in which vessels of any nationality should be prevented from going to the rescue of persons in peril of their lives, or of vessels in danger of being lost.

"You will understand the terms 'wrecked vessels or property in Canadian waters' as referring to vessels and cargoes cast upon the Canadian shores, and stranded or wrecked requiring apparatus for their removal or discharge of cargo into other vessels, and to goods which may have been discharged or floated off therefrom and cast upon the coast, and in either case coming within the provisions of the revenue laws.

"I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
"J. JOHNSON."

In reply to this we have the following from State Department at Washington, dated 2nd October, 1879:

"Sir,—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 30th ult, transmitting a copy of circular issued by the Customs Department of Canada, defining the terms of circular No. 210, of 5th March, 1878, in relation to wrecking by foreign vessels in Canadian waters, and to express to you the gratification with which this Government has learned of this measure of relief."

So that we see that the character of the interpretation by the Customs Department of their regulation was satisfactory to the authorities at Washington. Then, we have later on in this correspondence some facts such as the matter referred to by my hon. friend with regard to the wrecking of a vessel at the mouth of the Grand River, in which the tug Sarah Bryant figured. That was one of a series of misrepresentations which had been made to the American Government. The facts are rather dim in my memory, but I believe that those dead bodies were taken from that schooner by a Canadian tug, that all the relief that was rendered to it was rendered to it by a Canadian tug, and that the Sarah Bryant only came from Buffalo after all danger to life or property was past, and had to be warned off. Now, I have here some other documents to show the nature of the charges made against the customs authorities of Canada. Here is one, referring to the case of the Jane McCloud, addressed by Mr. W. Evarts to Sir E. Thornton on the 3rd of February, 1880:

"The case of the Jane McCloud is, in particular, notable. That schooner went ashore at the mouth of the Six Mile Creek, near Wilson, on the morning of 2nd November last, and was towed off by a Canadian tug, which later was not only detained and heavily fined, but was permitted to accomplish her humane work without her name being even ascertained. I need scarcely advert to the treatment which an American tug might, under similar circumstances, have met with in the waters of the Dominion, inasmuch as past correspondence has served to familiarise both of us with the aspect of the subject and to make clear the difficulty which in such a case might attend the exercise of the discretionary power of deciding whether life or property was or was not imminently endangered within the meaning of the recent explanatory circular of the Dominion Government."

In reply to this we have this communication contained in a copy of a report of a Committee of the Honorable Privy Council on the 19th November, 1880 :

"The communication of Mr. Evarts to Sir Edward Thornton, of the 3rd February, refers to former correspondence on the same subject, and transmits for Sir Edward's information a copy of a letter from the Secretary of the United States Treasury, with reports from the customs officers of the United States stationed at Wilson and Oldcott, in the district of Suspension Bridge, in the State of New York, relative to the cases of certain Canadian vessels which went ashore on United States coast of Lake Ontario during the month of November, A.D. 1879, and to the assistance rendered on those occasions by Canadian tug boats, calling special attention to the case of the Jane McCloud, which went ashore on the 2nd November, 1879, at Six Mile Creek, in the State of New York, and was towed off by a Canadian tug boat without, 'Mr. Evarts observes,' the tug boat being detained or heavily fined by the authorities, but permitted to accomplish her humane work without her name or nationality being ascertained.

"The Minister submits that the aid in this case afforded to the vessel in distress without the nationality of the tug boat which accomplished the 'humane work' being enquired into, was an act which, if performed by a United States tug boat towards a vessel in like distress on the Canadian coast, would be treated in the same manner and with the same consideration as was shown on the occasion referred to by the custom house officers of the United States.

"The Minister observes that the cases of Canadian schooners, Gold Hunter and Wave Crest sunk in harbor of Oldcott seem, from the statement of the deputy collector of Oldcott, to have been substantially as follows :—These vessels having been sunk were respectively raised and floated without any assistance having been rendered by Canadian tug boats, but they were afterwards towed to ports in Canada by Canadian tug boats, towing in this character being by usage a recognised right of vessels of either nationality, being quite consistent with the coasting regulations both of the United States and Canada."

So much for those charges. Upon examining into them, we find they are without foundation. Then a very serious charge was preferred in the case of a raft of 2,000,000 feet of timber in the tow of the tug John Owens which was driven ashore on a point below Pelee Island. Representations were made to the Department of State that this raft was in imminent peril, that the American tug having it in tow was not allowed to do anything for the relief of the raft, that other American tugs were not permitted to engage in the work of relief, and that the raft lay in a position of imminent peril for thirty hours before aid could be obtained. We have a communication from the State Department to the Canadian authorities on the subject, dated 13th June, 1879. I will not take the time to read it, but will show that the charge was entirely without foundation. In the first place, the assertion that a timber raft would be in imminent danger after going ashore was preposterous. It would make no difference in danger to the raft whether it lay there thirty hours or thirty days, and there could have been no emergency or danger or loss of life on that score. But in a report by the hon. the Minister of Customs, contained in a report of the Committee of the Privy Council, the following facts are set forth :—

"First, that the raft was actually in the condition of being towed by the two United States tugs above named at the time it was injured. Second, that the cause of the injury was a heavy storm which prevailed, combined with the fact that the two United States steam tugs exerted too much force in endeavoring to prevent the raft from being driven on shore by such storm, the consequence was that the raft was torn to pieces by the said tugs.

"Third, that no Canadian officials refused to allow any United States tugs to proceed to the assistance of the raft.

"Fourth, that no application was ever made to any custom house officer in Canada for permission to allow any United States vessel to give assistance in the case, and that at the date of the occurrence there was no Canadian custom officer located on Pelee Island.

"Fifth, that the masters of the tugs 'John Owens' and 'Kate Williams' submitted that they were not interfered with, and that Mr. S. P. Bliss, the owner of the raft was not only no party to the complaint, but repudiates the idea of his knowing any complaint or cause of complaint against Canadian customs official in that case."

That was all there was of that case. Then we had another very serious complaint in the matter of the seizure of the American tug Relief with a raft in tow, by the Canadian tug Prince Alfred, and it was asserted she was seized in American waters nearer the American shore than the Canadian, at the head of the River St. Clair. When that complaint was examined, it was found the tug Relief had gone contrary to law to a Canadian harbor without reporting at any Canadian port, and had taken a raft of timber at Georgian Bay, and was trying to escape the payment of export dues and of timber dues. She was seized in consequence of contravention of the Canadian law. When we examined the charges against the Canadian Government, they proved to be entirely baseless, and I repeat the Canadian customs authorities have dealt with this question in a broad, humane spirit from first to last, and that the American Government and vessel owners have no cause of complaint against us. The system is one inaugurated by themselves and which we have simply followed; and the regulations of the Customs Department, Ottawa, throughout have been of a character to compare most favorably with the conduct of the American Government, as I will proceed to show. I have here the Executive Document No. 204, 50th Congress, 1st Session, which contains the correspondence with regard to the wreck of the Algoma, and the application of the manager of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for permission to use their own plant in rescuing that steamer, and which shows the course pursued by the American authorities in reference to that matter. The case was briefly this: The Algoma was wrecked upon Greenstone Island, near Isle Royale, during a snowstorm in November. The manager of the line, Mr. Beatty, of Port Arthur, applied to the collector at Duluth for permission to send for the plant belonging to the owners of the boat, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, to rescue the boat, and the tugs of the company were sent to recover the dead bodies and the purser's safe; but they were not permitted to pursue their work. Then formal application was made for permission to use the company's wrecking plant, and the fact was set forth in the application that Duluth was 200 miles distant while Port Arthur, where the company's plant lay, was but 50 miles distant and almost within sight. The correspondence then shows that the Duluth collector informed the authorities at Washington that there were no means procurable at Lake Superior for the performance of this work except the means in possession of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and after a correspondence extending over a number of months, the Canadian Pacific Railway were finally compelled with their own plant in sight of the wreck, to go, not only to a distant point, but to go beyond Lake Superior to the other end of Lake Huron, to the city of Port Huron, Mich., to get plant. There cannot be a case pointed out in the history of the Customs of Canada in which so rigid an interpretation of the law has been insisted on, and the owners of wrecked property compelled to go such a distance to obtain relief, when relief from the other side was near at hand. I shall read a report on the correspondence because it places our own Department of Customs in the most favorable light in contrast with the Department at Washington. The first letter is from Mr. Henry Beatty, manager of the traffic lines :

"TORONTO, 27th November, 1885.

"DEAR SIR,—Upon the morning of the 7th November, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company's steamship Algoma was wrecked upon Greenstone Island, off Isle Royale, Lake Superior. The survivors were brought into Port Arthur the evening of the 9th, and it became necessary to take immediate steps to secure the mail, the purser's and ship's books and papers, and the bodies of the drowned. It was impossible to make arrangements for American tugs, and I therefore ordered the company's tug Liskievt to the scene of the wreck, with instructions to spare no pains to find all the bodies possible and return with them to Port Arthur. I also telegraphed my chief clerk in Port Arthur to be particularly careful to do nothing to contravene the United States Customs regulations. The tug returned on the morning of the 22nd, having succeeded in finding four of the bodies. I am anxious to make arrangements to raise the boilers, machinery and such cargo as may be secured, consisting of steel rails, bridge material, &c., early in the spring. Will you be good enough to let me know if boats belonging to this company may be employed, or, failing this, if I may arrange for boats belonging to Port Arthur which may be suitable. I desire, of course, to secure what remained of the vessel worth saving at as little expense as possible, and shall feel extremely obliged if you can consistently with existing regulations, favor me with the necessary information.

"Yours obediently,

"HENRY BEATTY,

"Manager Lake Traffic.

"Hon. DAN. MANNING,

"Secretary of the Treasury."

Here is the reply from the Commissioner, Mr. Patten :

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF NAVIGATION,

"WASHINGTON, D. C., 11th December, 1885.

"DEAR SIR,—This office received on the 9th instant, by reference from the Secretary of the Treasury, your letter of the 27th ultimo, relative to the wrecked steamship Algoma, and the employment of certain vessels to raise the boilers, machinery, cargo, &c.

As an answer to your enquiry whether the tugs of your company and boats belonging to Port Arthur, which are suitable, may be employed in the business, I transmit, herewith, a copy of a letter dated the 4th instant, addressed to the collector of customs at Duluth, instructing him in regard to the matter.

"It is suggested that you communicate with him on the subject."

Here is the communication to the collector :

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF NAVIGATION,

"WASHINGTON, D. C., 4th December, 1885.

SIR,—This office is in receipt of your letter dated the 24th ultimo, stating that you have noticed that two or three Canadian tugs from Port Arthur have been engaged about the wreck of the steamship Algoma in picking up bodies, &c., and inquiring if vessels have the right to collect the cargo and what action shall be taken by you in regard to the matter.

"No authority of law exists under which they can pursue their business in waters of the United States, and the masters or the persons employing the vessels should be advised accordingly.

"It is understood that, in this case, the tugs were employed in the first instance by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

"A notice from you to Manager Beatty, of said company, that the employment of the vessels is not in accordance with the regulations upon the subject, would probably serve to cause the persons responsible for the vessels to refrain from any violation of the law.

"Please give him notice without delay, and take such other measures as on further investigation you may find to be necessary in the premises."

Then we have, following this, a letter from Mr. Beatty, dated the 14th December, addressed to Jarvis Patten, making further application with regard to the desire to obtain permission to obtain Canadian wrecking plant, and in reply to that on 16th December, we have another letter from Jarvis Patten, refusing the application. Then, on the 18th February, we have a letter from Mr. W. C. Van Horne, to which I call particular attention, because Mr. Van Horne relates instances where the Canadian Government have permitted the use of American vessels in the case of wrecked vessels in Canadian waters.

"CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY CO.,

"MONTREAL, 18th February, 1886.

"SIR,—I beg to inform you that on the 7th November last the steamship Algoma, belonging to this company, and laden largely with steel rails and fish plates, the property of the company, was wrecked on Greenstone Island, near the eastern extremity of Isle Royale, in Lake Superior. The wreck lies in such a position that the engines and other valuable parts of the steamship may be recovered, as well as the rails and splices above mentioned. The nearest American port from which tugs and wrecking outfit can be obtained is Duluth, about 200 miles distant from the wreck, while this company has tugs and wrecking outfit of its own at Port Arthur, only 50 miles from the wreck, and almost within sight of it. I beg, therefore, to ask permission to use the tugs and appliances of the company in recovering its property from the wreck; and in doing so I would respectfully direct your attention to the fact that in numerous instances permission has been accorded by the Canadian Government to use American tugs and outfit, among which the following comparatively recent cases may be recited :—

"May 22, 1883, schooner Ellsworth, ashore near Sarnia, was permitted to use American tugs.

"September 12, 1883, schooner Winslow, ashore near Point Edward, was permitted to use American tugs.

"October 18, 1883, International Wrecking Company were permitted to use American tugs at Southampton.

"November 13, 1883, International Wrecking Company were permitted to use the American tugs Baltica and Smith, wrecking at Southampton.

"November 21, 1883, schooner Carter, ashore near Kincardine, was permitted to use American tugs.

"May 7, 1884, American tug Smith, with wrecking outfit, was permitted to work at the wreck of the steamer Manitoba at Southampton, and schooner Carter at Kincardine.

"April 9, 1885, permission was given to American scow, with wrecking outfit, to raise the tug Heron, sunk in Georgian Bay.

MR. CHARLTON.

"March 18, 1885, permission was given to one J. Donnelly to use American tools, &c., in relieving propeller Owen Sound, above Sault Ste. Marie, in Canadian waters.

"May 30, 1885, permission was given to J. Donnelly to use United States tugs to relieve the City of Owen Sound, above Sault Ste. Marie.

"October 10, 1885, permission was given to the steam barge J. H. Fairwell to relieve the schooner Godfrey, ashore at Stag Island.

"I have the honor to be, Sir,

"Your obedient servant,

"W. O. VAN HORN,

"Vice-President.

"Hon. DANIEL MANNING,

"Secretary of the Treasury of the U.S.,

"Washington, D.C."

Now, Mr. Van Horne cites these numerous instances, among many others which he might have cited, where the Canadian Government had allowed the use of American wrecking plant, American tugs and American lighters, to relieve vessels which were ashore on the Canadian coast, and yet we have the refusal of the American Government to allow the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to use its own plant 50 miles distant to relieve its own vessel. We find it was driven, not to Duluth, 200 miles away, but to Port Huron, 600 miles away, to get the plant to relieve that wreck. On the 19th April, 1886, the following communication was sent to the Collector of Customs at Duluth, from Jarvis Patten, the Commissioner of the Bureau of Navigation at Washington :

"SIR,—This office is in receipt of your letter dated the 13th inst., transmitting a communication from the United States' consul at Winnipeg relative to an application by George A. Priest, in which he requests permission to use certain wrecking plant owned in Canada, in raising railroad iron and machinery from the wreck of the steamer Algoma, now lying on Isle Royale. You are doubtless aware that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company made a similar application, and that special exception in its favor to the regulations upon the subject was not authorized. This office is not advised whether reasonable facilities can be obtained at your port or elsewhere in the vicinity, in the United States, for doing the work. Where such facilities exist, it has been the practice to require their use in ordinary cases. It does not appear, therefore, that any special additional instructions to you in regard to the matter are now necessary. In this connection, reference is made to the communication addressed to you on the 4th of December last relating to the vessel.

"Respectfully yours,

"JARVIS PATTEN,

"Commissioner."

Then we have Mr. Patten's letter to Mr. Van Horne :—

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF NAVIGATION,

"WASHINGTON, D.C., 28th April, 1886.

"SIR,—This office received on the 26th instant your letter dated the 18th of February last, relative to the use of certain wrecking material in the case of the steamship Algoma. The matter has been considered by the Acting Secretary. It does not appear, however, that, as the regulations now are, special instructions can well be given to the collector of the district in which the vessel lies. A copy of your communication has been forwarded to him, for such action as may be requisite under the general regulations upon the subject.

"Respectfully yours,

"JARVIS PATTEN,

"Commissioner.

"W. O. VAN HORNE, Esq.,

"Vice-President of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company,

"Montreal, Canada."

Then we have this communication from the collector at Duluth to Mr. Patten, the Commissioner of Navigation, on the 24th May, 1886, and I call particular attention to this communication :

"SIR,—In reply to yours of 19th instant, relating to the wrecking of the steamer Algoma, would say that upon enquiry I cannot learn that reasonable facilities exist on Lake Superior for doing the requisite work. There are no such facilities here or near here.

"Very respectfully,

"H. B. MOORE,

"Collector."

And we have a letter on the 8th June from Mr. Patten, the commissioner to the collector at Duluth, as follows :—

"WASHINGTON, D. C., 8th June, 1886.

"SIR,—Referring to previous correspondence, I have to state that the manager of lake traffic of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company informs this office that facilities for wrecking in the case of the steamer Algoma have been found at Port Huron, Michigan"—

600 miles away from the wreck

"and that a contract has been made accordingly."

The owners of that steamer were driven to Port Huron, though they had their own wrecking apparatus within 50 miles of the wreck, and the commissioner was informed by the collector at Duluth that there were no appliances on or near Lake Superior fit to perform that work. Then, on the 8th March, 1887, we have an enquiry answered by the Commissioner of Navigation:—

"SIR,—In reply to your letter of the 5th instant, you are informed that this office is not aware of any law preventing foreigners wrecking in American waters, subject to the disabilities imposed by the tariff and navigation laws; that is to say, articles imported by them or vessels brought by them, would be subject to duty in the usual manner"

The foreign vessel could engage in wrecking if the owner would pay duty on his vessels and on his wrecking plant which he took in just for the purpose of engaging in the operation at that particular time. I have here besides a communication from Parker & Millen, of Detroit, enquiring of the Treasury authorities at Washington, and, as this correspondence is short, I may as well read it:

"DETROIT, MICH., 27th September, 1887.

"DEAR SIR,—Can a Canadian steamer clear from a Canadian port and go to an American vessel which has run aground in American waters and release her, either by pulling her off, or by lightering a portion of her cargo, and take her to a Canadian port? An early reply will much oblige.

"Yours respectfully,

"PARKER & MILLEN.

"Hon. C. S. FAIRCHILD,
"Secretary of the Treasury,
"Washington, D. C."

And this is the answer:

"WASHINGTON, D. C., 30th September, 1887.

"GENTLEMEN,—This office is in receipt of your letter dated the 27th instant, stating a hypothetical question relative to the rights of certain foreign vessels in American waters. The answer to your enquiry would depend upon the facts surrounding the case, which are not fully stated by you, and you are informed that it is the practice to decline answering hypothetical questions. If you have any particular case in view, in which there has been a violation of law the bureau will give the matter full consideration on receipt of a statement from you showing the facts in detail.

"Respectfully yours,

"C. B. MORTON.

"Commissioner."

"Messrs. PARKER & MILLEN,
"15 Atwater St., West, Rooms 3 and 4,
"Detroit, Mich."

"15 ATWATER ST., WEST, ROOMS 3 AND 4,
"DETROIT, MICH., 10th October, 1887.

"DEAR SIR,—Your letter of 30th September is received and noted. It is to avoid violating the law that we ask a question. We want to know what the law is relative to Canadian tugs wrecking and towing in American waters. The facts are these: We have a large fleet of steam vessels navigating the lakes, and they very often get aground in Detroit and St. Clair Rivers and Lake St. Clair. The majority of those grounding are in Canadian waters, and in order to release them quickly, we have provided ourselves with a Canadian steam lighter which is capable of lightering a portion of their cargoes and then putting them off the bottom. Now, it sometimes happens that they ground in American waters, and we want to know if this same steam lighter can clear from a Canadian port, go to these vessels aground in American waters and pull them off and tow them to a Canadian port, and it unable to pull them off without lightering, could she lighten a portion of their cargo and replace it again when the vessel got into deep water?

"Respectfully yours,

"PARKER & MILLEN.

"C. B. MORTON, Esq., Comr., Treasury Dept.,
"Washington, D. C."

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF NAVIGATION.
"WASHINGTON, D. C., 13th October, 1887.

"GENTLEMEN,—This office is in receipt of your letter of the 10th inst., stating that you have a large fleet of steam vessels navigating the lakes and enquiring whether you can use, in connection therewith the Canadian steam lighter which you own, in lightering and wrecking said vessels should they get aground in American waters. In reply, I have to state that this office is not aware of any authority of law for such a proceeding. These questions are usually acted upon, in the first instance, by the collector of the district in which the work is to be done.

"Respectfully yours,

"C. B. MORTON,

"Commissioner."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I leave it to the House to say whether the American regulations, as shown by this correspondence in reference to the wreck of the steamer Algoma, and as shown by this correspondence with Parker & Millen, of Detroit, and another letter that I omitted to read, to a collector on Lake Ontario in answer to the enquiry, which stated that permission had never been given in that district for Canadian tugs or vessels to do any work upon the American coast—I say I submit to the House, in view of these facts, whether the regulations of the American Government have not been more stringent than the regulations of the Canadian Government, and whether their conduct in matters of wrecks has not been, if we may use the term, more inhumane than the conduct of the Canadian Government; and I hold that the conduct of our Customs Department contrasts most favorably with the conduct of the Treasury Department at Washington in regard to this matter. Now, Sir, the investments made by Canadians in wrecking plant and outfit, with amounts to a large sum, would, on the upper lakes, be rendered practically valueless from the passage of the Bill of the hon. member for Frontenac. The effect of this species of reciprocity would be to give to American wrecking companies the entire business. In brief their position is this: We ask you to rescind a regulation which you passed in retaliation for a similar regulation passed by us; we ask you to rescind that regulation which you passed in self-defence and to abandon the advantage which that regulation gives you, and to abandon to us the entire wrecking business of the upper lakes, of which you have now a large portion. That is simply what it amounts to. It may be a question whether the result would be as I state. Now, Sir, while appliances for wrecking are just as good upon this side as upon the American side, and while the prices for relieving vessels are just as low as those quoted by American companies. I wish to draw attention to this fact, that the principal part of the tonnage is American tonnage. The underwriters insuring these vessels have their offices chiefly in Chicago, Detroit and Buffalo. Now, in case of the wreck of an American vessel, when information is received at the underwriter's office, or in any office where she is insured, the most natural thing in the world is for that underwriter to make arrangements with the wrecking company who is, perhaps, at his door. There is a system of commissions, not exactly bribes, which the underwriters receive from these companies, that make it to their pecuniary interest to give these contracts to American companies, and the result would be, I repeat, that if this proposition of the hon. member for Frontenac is accepted, the entire wrecking business upon the upper lakes would pass into the hands of American companies and the large investments made by Canadian citizens for tugs, for diving apparatus, steam pump, hydraulic jacks, chains, and pontoons, and for the various appliances in wrecking, would be rendered practically valueless. I have pointed out, Mr. Speaker, that no necessity exists for this step; I have pointed out what our customs regulations distinctly say, that in case of danger of loss of property or loss of life, the utmost latitude is given, that applications are never refused. And I can testify from personal knowledge that applications of that kind are never refused. Not only is that the case, but the Customs Department have gone still further, and have dealt in a most liberal spirit, as was shown by those cases quoted by Mr. Van Horne, in granting application for the use of American tugs and appliances on the upper lakes. Now, Sir, my position in this matter is this: I say that the advantage we enjoy in the matter of wrecking is a very great advantage; I say that advantage does not accrue to us from the inception of a policy by ourselves, but that advantage was thrown upon us by the action of the American Treasury Department; that they inaugurated themselves the system for the purpose of protecting their own interests. They are placed in the position of the Irishman who was crossing a pasture one day, and was attacked by a bull. He got the better of the bull, in running around a stump, and took his shillelah, and beat the animal until he bellowed and was glad to get away. The Irishman said: "Bellow, you smithering old villain, who commenced this scrimmage?" Now, we did not commence this scrimmage, the Americans commenced it, and it has worked against them, as most of the wrecks occur upon our coast, and they are excluding from the wrecking of their own property. They complain, it is true, but this alleged advantage accrues to us in consequence of their own act, and I am not in favor of giving up the vantage ground we possess unless the Americans will make further concessions. Now, we have a standing offer of reciprocity contained in chap. 14, 33 Vic. made in 1870, in which we offered to the Americans, or any other nation, reciprocity in the coasting trade. Now, if the Americans want reciprocity in wrecking upon the great lakes, let them go further and propose reciprocity in coasting in toto, and I shall be very much in favor of it. If they will open the coasting trade on waters contiguous to Canada, on the great lakes, wrecking and all, that is all right; but if they want to select one instance of coasting in which they can work to their advantage and retain all the rest, where some little advantage would accrue to us, that is not reciprocity, gentlemen, and we will make the proposition either to go the whole thing or nothing. That, I think, is a reasonable position to take. These are my views, I think reasonable and common sense views, with reference to this question. As I said before, I repeat again, that we are not in the position with regard to a statutory offer here that we were the other day, when we felt compelled, to avoid any semblance of bad faith on our part, to accept an offer from the United States that was not much to our advantage. We are not in that position now. We have here a statutory offer that does not say "any or all," but it says all coasting trade, and of wrecking it does not say "any or all" but it says all, and if the Americans want to come to that statutory offer, all right; and if they don't want to come to that, let them stay where they are. That is the proposition I have to make. I believe we are entitled to stand upon that proposition, and if we do we will get concessions from the Americans that otherwise we would not get. They are actuated generally, I think, by considerations of their own interest, and we may as well be actuated by the same considerations in dealing with our own interest, and perhaps by following that policy we may get more than we otherwise would. I shall not trouble the House longer at this time. I was intending to offer an amendment, but I shall not do so at the present moment.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I have never in my short parliamentary experience listened to anything with so much pleasure as to the remarks of the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). It certainly is something new in our parliamentary experience when a leading member of the Opposition comes forward, and in such glowing and sensible terms defends a department of this Administration from attacks made upon it by one of his own supporters. And it is still more delightful after the very contradictory opinions we have heard on the subject of reciprocity to find the hon. member taking precisely the same ground with respect to this matter that the First Minister took with regard to the reciprocity treaty. I think the ground he has taken is a perfectly correct one, and I hope the same ground will be taken throughout whether it is in regard to reciprocity in wrecking or in natural products or in anything else. The hon. gentleman has just said we are not to take one particular thing and agree to reciprocity upon that, simply because it happens to suit the Americans. That is precisely what was said at the beginning of the reciprocity debate by the First Minister, and I wish the same contention had been kept up throughout on this side of the House. I am not in favor of reciprocity, I think that the country can manage its own affairs and can do what we think will suit us best whether in regard to wrecking or natural products or anything else. That is a subject I shall not discuss, but I could not resist the temptation to congratulate my hon. friend upon the remarkable spirit which has been manifested by him in the speech he has just made, and of which, I hope, we shall have many instances before the session is drawn to a close.

Mr. CASEY. I can agree with a great many of the premises advanced by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) and those advanced by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), but I cannot agree in their conclusions. I have to confess that I am in favor of reciprocity pure and simple, and in favor of reciprocity in wrecking as well as in other matters. There are two sides to this question. There is the position of the man who owns wrecking plant, and that of the man who owns a vessel that may be in distress, and I think, taking the two together, the chances of injury to Canada are more by refusing the privilege of American vessels assisting Canadian vessels than by admitting that assistance. I think Canadian interests would gain more by supporting the Bill of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) than by opposing the Bill, that it would be more to our interests to allow American wreckers to assist Canadian vessels in distress in Canadian waters and allowing Canadian vessels to assist American craft in American waters than by the present system of non-intercourse. I have always held that position. The present system is not due altogether to the Government in power. If I am not mistaken, it came into existence before this Government obtained office. I have always held, and I hold now, that reciprocity in wrecking is to the interest both of the American marine and our own marine, and for that reason I am in favor of the principle of the present Bill and will therefore vote for the second reading. When we come to consider its present details in committee I may have something to say, but so far as the principle is concerned I am in favor of it, and I believe that the interest of those who own the vessels which may be in distress and which may have an opportunity of being assisted by United States wrecking tugs is to be even more considered than the interests of those who own wrecking crafts on our own side of the lakes. I do not like to differ from the hon. gentleman for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) and other hon. gentlemen who have laid before me powerful arguments in favor of their view of the case; I do not like to appear to be acting against the interests of my own section of the country. It is well understood that on Lake Erie, at all events, most of the wrecks occur on the Canadian shore. It has been urged upon me that because most of the wrecks occur on the Canadian shore we who live on the shores of the lake and represent the counties bordering on the lake should not support this Bill. I say that is the reason why we should support the Bill, because the interests of owners of Canadian vessels likely to be wrecked on our shores should be considered before the interests of those who own wrecking craft which would be called into requisition. The present system is a purely protectionist system, it involves protection to those who own wrecking craft, it involves protection of the most odious and unpleasant kind, a protection which involves possibly loss of property and life to Canada. Consequently I feel bound by my duty to my constituents, who are to a considerable extent owners of vessels navigating the lakes, and by my duty to other Canadians who own vessels navigating the lakes, to support the principle of the Bill, which provides that whenever a Canadian vessel is in distress a United States tug may be solicited on the condition that the Americans will allow our American wrecking tugs to enjoy the same right in their waters. In regard to Lake Erie I believe the extension of this privilege will be rather in favor of the American owners of wrecking craft. In regard to Lake Ontario it might be in favor of the Canadians. I do not care whether these wreckers should gain more or ours should gain more, but I am of the opinion that our people interested in lake shipping would gain more by the adoption of the Bill than by its rejection and the continuation of the present system. For this reason I support the Bill in principle, and I reserve my opinion as to details until we go into committee.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). I observe by the remarks of the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) that the effect of the Bill is misunderstood by him as it is misunderstood by several members of the House. In order that fuller information may be placed at their disposal, and that the Government may be prepared to deal with this question in the manner in which they deal with all questions that come under their consideration, I hope they will assent to adjourn the debate. In making this suggestion I refer to one point. The hon. gentleman is entirely in error if he supposes that at any time the operation of the existing wrecking regulations interfered with assisting vessels in distress. I have never known a case where the Department of Customs has refused permission to American tugs to work in Canadian waters when there was a question of imminent danger to life or property. I would therefore not go into the question to night if the Government would consent in compliance with my request to agree to the adjournment of the debate in order that fuller information may be had for their own satisfaction and the satisfaction of members of this House so that the question may be intelligently discussed on its merits. I move the adjournment of the debate.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I must say that I think the course proposed by the hon. gentleman will meet with the views of gentlemen on both sides of the House. It is a very important question of public policy as I ventured to remark in the few words I said before the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) addressed the House. I am sure after the very interesting discussion that we have had it will be considered only desirable that in a question of such an important policy the Government should have an opportunity to carefully consider the statements made on both sides of the House before the matter is disposed of.

Mr. EDGAR. I understand the hon. member for Essex moved the adjournment of the debate, and not the adjournment of the House, because I have something to say on this question.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). Yes, the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debated adjourned.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 11.10 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 13th April, 1888.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

CHIGNECTO MARINE RAILWAY COMPANY.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved that on Tuesday next the House do resolve itself into committee to consider the following resolution:—

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that the time for the completion of the works of the Chignecto Marine Railway Company, shall, as respects their title to receive the subsidy heretofore authorised, be the 1st July, 1890, instead of the 1st July, 1889; also that the company may be accorded a further delay of twenty-four months for such completion, on the condition of the payment of a monthly penalty of $5,000 for each month during which the works remain uncompleted after the first above-mentioned date, and also that the amount of capital mentioned in section 2 of the Act, 49 Victoria, chapter 18, as that on which the payment of the subsidies limited so as to make up the net earnings to seven per cent. per annum, shall be $5,500,000 instead of $5,000,000.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE—NEW YORK, WADDINGTON AND OTTAWA RAILWAY.

Mr. HICKEY. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to draw the attention of the House to a portion of an editorial in last evening's Evening Journal, speaking of a railway charter which I have before the House. After a good deal of nonsensical verbiage, this paragraph occurs:

"In this new scheme, Dr. Hickey has associated with himself, several members of the Dominion and Local Houses, the applicants being J. F. Wood, M.P. for Brockville, George Taylor, M. P. for South Leeds—"

Along with others. I wish to say that neither Mr. Wood, nor Mr. Taylor, nor any other M. P. has anything to do with this charter. They are not applicants at all. These two gentlemen signed the petition out of courtesy to me, with others, for leave to introduce the Bill into the House, but they have no association with it whatever.

REPORT OF THE RAILWAY COMMISSION.

Mr. HOLTON. I wish to enquire of the Government if it is intended to distribute among members of this House, copies of the report of the Royal Commission upon Railways, and the evidence taken before that commission? It seems to me that we cannot pretend to consider intelligently the Railway Bill that has been introduced by the Minister of Railways, without having these papers in our hands.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The other day another hon. gentleman called the attention of the Government to the fact that this report had not been printed or circulated among the members. Upon enquiry I found that although a printed copy had been brought down, it had been printed by the action of the Railway Department, which had had a number of copies printed some time before, and one of those copies was laid on the Table as the return, to be printed in the ordinary way. I have enquired as to the reason of the delay in the printing of that return, but I have had no satisfactory answer. I will call the attention of the chairman of the Printing Committee to the matter.

Mr. LAURIER. If that report has been laid upon the Table, it has been printed, I suppose, and there is no use of having it printed again.

THE BEHRING SEA FISHERIES.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like to ask the Minister of Public Works when we may expect the correspondence in reference to the American claims of sovereignty in Behring Sea, and the seizures of Canadian whaling and sealing vessels in that sea?

Mr. FOSTER. I may say with reference to the Behring Sea papers, that in the present state of diplomatic negotiations it is not thought advisable to bring them down.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Charles Tupper: "That the Bill (No. 65) An Act respecting a certain Treaty between Her Britannic Majesty and the President of the United States, be read a second time."

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, in resuming the adjourned debate on the Bill now before the House, asking us to give effect to the treaty lately passed at Washington between the Dominion of Canada and the United States of America, I desire to discuss it in the sense in which the hon. Minister of Finance recommended it to the consideration of this House. I desire to say that in a matter of so much importance to the people of this country in which the peace and welfare of 70,000,000 of the people are concerned, there are two considerations involved. The first is in its national character, the second is in its commercial character and the aspect which it bears with respect to the commercial interests of the people on this side of the line. I am free to admit at the outset that a measure of this kind calling forth settlement of some of those questions which have been vexed questions between the British Government and the American people for so many years, was highly desirable. I am prepared to admit that as composing part of the Empire the people of Canada might be called upon, if necessary, to make a certain amount of sacrifice to bring about a satisfactory settlement in that regard. If the hon. Minister of Finance, in introducing his Bill, had brought it down with the statement that it was purely in the interests of the Empire; if he had made the statement, which we all believe to be the case, that, if not at the dictation of England, at least in compliance with the strongly expressed desire of England and her representative at that congress, concessions were made to the American people which the Government of this country had previously refused, that we were called upon in fact as part of the Empire to make those concessions in the interest of peace and good neighborhood, I think he would have fairly laid the ground of his action before this House. In that case we would perhaps have been able to discuss it in a different line, yet at the same time we would have been compelled to point out to the Government, to Parliament and to the people how the changes which had been made under that treaty were going to affect the people most immediately concerned, that is to say, the people of the Maritime Provinces of this Dominion. Looking at the Bill from the beginning to the end and regarding it very carefully in the light of the explanation given by the hon. the Minister of Finance, and the hon. the Minister of Justice, I have arrived at the conclusion that every concession which the Americans demanded in 1886 under Mr. Bayard's proposal to Lord Salisbury, has been granted. Those demands made by Mr. Bayard in that year were indignantly rejected by the Canadian Cabinet in language strong and emphatic, as has already been read to this House by the member for Queen's, P.E.I., (Mr. Davies). We sustained the action of the Government on that occasion, we sustained them in defending the fisheries, and in every word I ever uttered in this House or out of it I guarded myself against using any language which might be used by the Americans or their advocates in depreciating the value of our fisheries. The Government we felt, and I felt, were dealing with a question of so much importance in the general interests of the country that they required and had a right to be sustained by every person who was in a public position, who by his voice or by his influence could strengthen their hands in the negotiations, and therefore in this House and on public occasions elsewhere I always, I repeat, guarded myself so far as to use language which the Americans never could use against us when the fisheries question was considered. The questions which were submitted by Mr. Bayard in 1886 were of a character which formed part of the present treaty and negotiations. We find that under this treaty all those demands made by Mr. Bayard have been yielded. The hon. Minister of Finance asked us the other day not to press him in this discussion to compel him to say anything in defence of the treaty which might be used against its adoption on the other side of the line. The hon. gentleman need not have been laboring under any anxiety on that account. Ingenious as the hon. Minister of Finance is in his public discussions, with all the fertility of his imagination and resources, and I admit they are great, the hon. gentleman was not able, during that long and able address with which he favored the House on that occasion, to point out one single or solitary advantage which the people of Canada would gain if this treaty was put into effect, except that it removed doubts on certain points for which the Americans were contending, but which we on this side, and the British Government behind us, had always as steadily maintained. If it was negotiated to surrender points in favor of which we had been contending, which international law and treaty obligations showed we had a clear right to demand ever since 1813, if it was to give up those treaty rights to the Americans under the operation of this treaty, I do not think the Minister of Finance could point to them as any advantage to the people of Canada in this direction. He need not have been afraid of using any language which could have injured it. He pointed to the Treaty of Washington in 1872, and he said that the language which he and the leader of the Government used in defending that treaty in this House had been cited in the American case before the Halifax Commission. That was quite true, because in their great anxiety to carry the Washington Treaty, they made statements which could not be corroborated and which were in contravention of the actual established facts of the case. Moreover, he said that all things come to him who waits, and the Washington Treaty which was assailed by parties in this House, and by myself among the number, was now looked to as a measure to which we would gladly resort. There was just this difference. I opposed the Washington Treaty on the ground that the right hon. gentleman who negotiated that treaty had been untrue to the interests of the Province which I represent. The right hon. gentleman during the negotiation had been for free admission of coal and lumber and salt, in addition to free fish, but in his anxiety to obtain other advantages and not being able to gauge the American plenipotentiaries, he threw away the offer which was so advantageous in the interests of the people of Nova Scotia for the moment, and when it came to be brought up again, the American plenipotentiaries withdrew the offer altogether. Subsequently he was obliged to accept a treaty much less favorable to the people of Nova Scotia than the one which had been previously offered by the American people. Now, Sir, it was on that ground, and on that ground alone, that I opposed the Washington Treaty, and if it were to be renewed to-day under similar circumstances, I have no hesitation in saying that my course would have been the same. The hon. the Minister of Finance says that Mr. Bayard and the Government in 1885 made a proposal for a commission to consider the whole position of their relations with Canada. It was not solely with regard to the fishery question alone, but with the prospect of negotiating for the development and extension of trade between the two countries. Mr. Bayard said that:

"Entering into a temporary arrangement whereby the American fishermen were allowed the privilege during the remainder of the season of 1885, that the President would bring the matter before Congress next Session and recommend a Joint Commission of the Governments of the United States and Great Britain to consider the question in the interests of neighborhood and friendly intercourse between the two countries."

Then we had the prospect of negotiating for the development of trade between the United States and British North America. Mr. Bayard's idea, it will be observed, at the very commencement of the negotiations seemed to look not only to a settlement of the fishery question, but to look to some arrangement whereby the commercial intercourse of the two countries could be extended and enlarged. The second commission, which was so happily inaugurated by the hon. the Minister of Finance and suggested by Mr. Wiman, led to a similar expression on the part of Mr. Bayard. In that letter, which has been so frequently quoted during the recent discussion, Mr. Bayard again renewed the same idea when he said:

"He was confident that we both seek to obtain a just and permanent settlement—and there is but one way to secure it, and that is by a straightforward treatment on a liberal and statesmanlike plan of the entire commercial relations of the two countries."

Here, again, we have Mr. Bayard's reiteration of his desire to consider the whole trade relations of the countries, as well as the settlement of the fishery dispute. The hon. the Finance Minister, in reply to that, expresses his desire in very nearly the same language. He expresses his willingness to negotiate in that spirit, and when this position was arrived at and the Washington plenipotentiaries met, the Minister of Finance, as he has told us, and as we knew before, made the proposal to the American plenipotentiaries. Now, there is something very suggestive in this letter of the hon. gentleman, because, when you come to read it and read it carefully, you will see it contains more than would appear on the face of it. He says:

"Sir Charles Tupper begged leave to submit, that with a view of removing all causes of difficulties in connection with the fisheries, it is proposed by Her Majesty's plenipotentiaries that the fishermen of both countries shall have all the privileges enjoyed during the existence of the fishery articles of the Treaty of Washington."

That is to say, that we were to have free fish for free fisheries, although it will be remembered by hon. gentlemen that the hon. the Minister of Justice, in his remarks the other night, most indignantly denied the idea and repudiated the idea—and I suppose he spoke for the Government of which he is such a distinguished member—that he would be willing to resort to the old principle of free fish for free fisheries. But the hon. the Minister of Finance goes on to say that:

"They were to have enjoyed during the existence of the fishery articles of the Treaty of Washington, in consideration of mutual arrangements for greater freedom of commercial intercourse between the United States and Canada."

Therefore the hon. gentleman, as he frankly said, seemed to have had in his mind the idea at the very earliest stage of the negotiation, that the fishery question was one by itself, but it was desirable to use the fishery question as a means whereby we were going to secure a greater freedom of commercial intercourse between the United States and Canada and Newfoundland. In pursuance of this idea the hon. gentleman told us with frankness that he made the offer of unrestricted reciprocity. He made that offer to the hon. gentleman, and he said:

"The offer was unrestricted reciprocity and I intended it should be so. I intended to give the Government of the United States the fullest opportunity to state just how far they were prepared to go in reciprocity of trade with Canada."

Was the hon. gentleman in earnest? I would be sorry to say that he was not. Was the hon. gentleman sincerely desirous of testing the opinion of the Government of the United States when he made the offer of unrestricted reciprocity? I hope he was. But, Sir, if we may gauge the opinions of his Government and his supporters, who during his unfortunate illness and during the long debate, which I hope it is not improper to refer to, that idea of unrestricted reciprocity which was only asked for by the motion of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), was repudiated by every speaker on the other side of the House and by every member of the Government who spoke on the question, although the hon. the leader of the Government did not commit himself further than by his vote. I say that the idea of unrestricted reciprocity which the hon. the Minister of Finance made was either in earnest or was in jest. It would be a poor compliment to the Minister of Finance to suppose that he went to Washington to jest on such a serious subject. I shall not do him the injustice to suppose that he would be so far regardless of his own dignity and the dignity of the country and of the Government he represented on the commission, as to have asked that the Government should have considered the proposition, which remember if they had met in a fair spirit, if they had turned around and said: Yes, we will meet you in a spirit of unrestricted reciprocity; would have compelled that hon. gentleman to have brought down this Session a measure of unrestricted reciprocity similar and in accordance with the resolution of my hon. friend from Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) which he and his party have just voted down. In that connection I cannot understand the position of the hon. the Minister of Finance in making that proposal. And I should be very unwilling to suppose for one moment that he was not serious in doing it. He replies over and over again that he did Canada great service in ascertaining the views of her Government in regard to a matter in which we were all materially interested. Well, Sir, what did the resolution call for which has been voted down by the Government and party to which the hon. gentleman belongs? It only said this:

"That it is further expedient that the Government of the Dominion should take steps at an early date to ascertain on what terms and conditions arrangements can be effected with the United States for the purpose of securing full and unrestricted reciprocity of trade therewith."

I ask any fair-minded man if there is any difference between that resolution which hon. gentlemen opposite voted down the other night and the declaration the hon. Minister of Finance has made here, that he offered unrestricted reciprocity to the American plenipotentiaries when he was at Washington? But the hon. gentleman would say that Mr. Bayard gave an answer adverse to his proposal. That is quite true; but he should have stated with equal frankness the grounds on which Mr. Bayard based that refusal. He might have stated to the House, so that it might form part of his very able speech when it went to the country, that the reason and the only reason assigned by the American plenipotentiaries for not considering his proposal for unrestricted reciprocity was that it was not consistent to do by an executive act that which was the peculiar power and privilege of Congress alone. Congress alone could deal with a matter of revenue and tariff; and while the American plenipotentiaries gave that as an explanation why they could not entertain the hon. gentleman's proposal, because it was beyond their power to deal with a question of revenue and tariff, yet, so far as we can gather from the information that has been laid before us—and I regret that it was not more full—they do not appear to have expressed themselves as hostile to the proposition of my hon. friend for unrestricted reciprocity. Therefore, we may, perhaps, gain this consolation from the discussion that has taken place between the hon. gentleman and the American Government, that that question may still be considered in abeyance, and that we may hope at no very distant day—perhaps when those changes are brought about which the hon. gentleman intimated to us the other day—to see the hon. Minister of Finance come down with a measure of unrestricted reciprocity as large and full as any member on this side of the House during the last three weeks has called for. But, Sir, it was not very consistent, I think, in the hon. gentleman to cover up the ground in the way he sought to do, and it does not reflect any great credit on him in the distinguished position he filled on that occasion, to come back to this House, and after having made this proposal for unrestricted reciprocity, and after having read it to the House, to tell us, with regard to the debate that took place here, that for nearly three weeks we had wasted the time of the House and the time of the country in discussing a measure that was about as practicable as the idea of building a railway to the moon. I say, after the hon. gentleman had proposed unrestricted reciprocity at Washington, and because we were seeking to give effect to the same idea through the representatives of the people in this House, the hon. gentleman would come down here and almost say, I was only jesting, I was not in earnest, and you are wasting the time of the House in discussing a matter which is just about as unreasonable as a proposal to build a railway to the moon, I think it was not a very dignified position for the hon. gentleman to assume. The hon. gentleman says he was instructed to obtain a renewal of the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854 for reciprocity in natural products and a renewal of the Treaty of 1871 relating to our fisheries. In this connection the hon. gentleman said that he found that the Americans did not want our inshore fisheries. I was very sorry to hear it. I do not wish to undervalue our inshore fisheries at all. On the contrary, I am disposed to attach a great deal of value to them; but the value of an article in a market is always just that much that you can obtain for it in open competition; and if the Americans do not value our inshore fisheries to the extent of desiring the use of them, it is pretty strong evidence to my mind that our inshore fisheries are not quite as valuable as I had always hoped and still hope them to be. The Americans are pretty good judges in these matters; they have as large an interest in the fisheries as we have; and they knew very well, from the information they had been able to obtain, how valuable our inshore fisheries would be to them, and if they were not anxious to obtain them it only shows that they did not regard them as being as valuable as we had hoped. I look upon this as very unfortunate—as the more unfortunate, because we thought them of such a valuable character that they would form the most important factor in future negotiations. But it seems that the Americans have taken a different view and they came to the conclusion that they only wanted the privilege of purchasing bait, the use of our ports, and the privilege of transshipment for their cargoes; and they have got all these by the provisions of this treaty. And now, in any future negotiations we may have, looking to further trade relations with them, we have nothing whatever to offer them in return for any concession we may ask from them. Therefore, the moment the hon. gentleman found that the Americans did not value our inshore fisheries, from that very moment he should have held on with a firmer grip than ever to those privileges which they did value, such as shelter and transshipment of cargoes. The hon. gentleman said he found that there were 65,000,000 of people embittered against us, the people and press of both sides of politics, in consequence of the action of this Government in defending our fisheries. That was a very unfortunate condition of affairs, no doubt. It was a very unfortunate condition of public opinion in the United States, and I have no doubt that, to a certain extent, the hon. gentleman is right; but the hon. gentleman is well aware, as are other hon. members of this House, that that was not the primary cause of hostility against the people of Canada. The real cause and the beginning of the trouble arose when the Tory party, in 1878, led by the right hon. gentleman, laid down a policy of retaliation against the people of the United States. From day to day, in this House, by hon. gentlemen opposite, and in the public press of this country favoring their views, and in public speeches in all parts of the Dominion, by their supporters, it was represented that we could force the Americans into trade relations by means of the National Policy; the people were misled into believing that if we adopted the National Policy, that policy would have the effect of keeping out American products from the Dominion and would force the Americans to adopt reciprocity in a very short time. I repeat that that was the commencement of irritation on the part of the United States; and in order that there may be no doubt as to the views entertained by the leaders of the Government, I will quote a speech made by the Minister of Finance, in 1878, at Charlottetown, P. E. I. The hon. gentleman was then dealing with the position of the country; he knew how anxious the people of Prince Edward Island, and, in fact, the people of all the Maritime Provinces, were to secure a renewal of the Reciprocity Treaty; he knew there was no other subject which would go home so directly to their individual interests and into their everyday life; he knew, when addressing the farmers of Prince Edward Island, whose produce found a market in the United States, and in the United States alone, that there was no argument he could address them so potent and so likely to lend them to favor his policy as the argument that, by adopting it, we could secure a renewal of the Reciprocity Treaty, and on that occasion the hon. gentleman said:

"All that you have to do is to support the protective National Policy of Sir John Macdonald, in order to obtain reciprocity with the United States within two years."

All they had to do, he said, was to sustain the national protective policy of Sir John Macdonald in order to obtain in two years a renewal of the Reciprocity Treaty. The people were suffering for want of communication with the United States, and it was not unnatural that when they were listening to a gentleman of the persuasive eloquence of my hon. friend, and believing that the American people were crowding our markets with their products, while at the same time they were shutting out our products from theirs—I say it was not unnatural, under these circumstances, that they should have taken him at his word. But years passed by, and the National Policy, instead of having the effect of bringing Americans to their senses, as was predicted by its authors, had the effect, as we have seen,—and as the hon. gentleman has admitted, though he gave some other reasons—of embittering the public mind of the people of the United States against the Dominion of Canada, and they said: Here are four and a half million people on our northern border who are going to adopt a fiscal and commercial policy of their own which is going to teach sixty five millions of Americans how to conduct business of their own country; we will let them severely alone. They did so, and probably, but for Mr. Wiman's interference, we would be let alone until the present moment. But time went on, and we come to 1886, and again the Minister of Finance spoke at Charlottetown, on 7th September of that year. The hon. gentleman no doubt felt that he was called upon to explain to the people, whom he had addressed eight years before, the reasons why this reciprocity treaty, which was to have been the result of the National Policy, was not obtained. He said:

"Since the expiration of the Washington Treaty we have shown our American neighbors that we intend to stand up for our rights and interests, by adopting that policy which will obtain a commercial treaty with the Americans at no very distant day, and I have every reason to hope that within two years we shall have such a treaty."

The hon. gentleman here again had to explain to them that by the continuance of such a policy we were going to bring the Americans to their senses. I did not, and I do not now blame the Government for carrying out rigidly the harbor regulations, except when they were carried out by incompetent men in an offensive manner. If we had our fishing rights under treaty, I hold it was the duty of the Government to insist upon their being carried out in a dignified manner. But what I found fault with was that the irritation, which was constantly growing between the American fishermen and the incompetent men who had charge of our small cruisers along the shore, added to the irritation which arose under the threat of the National Policy crystallized public opinion in the United States against us and was the cause of that hostility to the people of Canada which we always regret. I say that I have always been anxious for a renewal of the treaty, and on more than one occasion I have been spoken to with reference to it. While the commission was sitting at Washington, I was interviewed with reference to the possibilities that might result from it. I saw the difficulty the commission might have to encounter with regard to coal and wheat, and I suggested that if by leaving coal and wheat out of the question, an arrangement for other natural products might be arrived at, it would be satisfactory. I said:

"If by leaving coal and wheat out of the question, you could conciliate the coal and wheat interests of the United States, is it not possible that a treaty embracing all other natural products might be made acceptable to both countries. The Americans want our fish, lumber, potatoes, barley, and possibly oats, which, after wheat, are our chief products, and they also take many articles, such as cordwood, &c., which even now find a market across the line. This appears to me a reasonable and a rational modus vivendi, and if commercial union is found to be impracticable at present, such an arrangement as indicated might, for a time, be satisfactory. The commercial intercourse in this exchange of natural products would doubtless pave the way for larger concessions on both sides in the future, and lead in a natural way to commercial union, which, in the opinion of so many of our people, it is desirable to obtain as soon as possible. Any concessions to the Americans giving them the use of our ports for shelter, bait and transport, without concessions from their side of a satisfactory character in return, would, I feel confident, never prove acceptable to our people or be ratified by Parliament."

I was then apprehending just what has taken place. I was then fearing that the hon. gentleman was pressed, as I believe he was,—for it is all very well for him to stand up here and say that he was nobly sustained by his co-plenipotentiaries from Great Britain,—I believe that he was sustained so long as he kept in the line of their desires; I believe that there was a strong, steady, persistent desire manifested by those plenipotentiaries for the settlement of this question, and I believe that the hon. gentleman was forced to yield to an arrangement which, under other circumstances, he would never have given way to. I say, with all due deference to that hon. gentleman, and without any desire to exalt him in the opinion of this country, that I would rather have had one Sir Charles Tupper at that commission alone than ten Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlains that England ever produced. The one was familiar with the wants of our people. He understood the condition of affairs, and, if he could have acted independently in regard to Canadian interests and Canadian sentiments, alone, I believe he never would have conceded these points, which are all the Americans want, and obtained nothing whatever for the fishing interests of Canada in return. I repeat, with all due respect to those distinguished gentlemen who were on the commission with the Minister of Finance, that their desire was and their sole desire was, to bring about a settlement of questions which had been of an irritating character between the United States and England; and we have been told by Mr. Chamberlain publicly since his return to England, that he came out here to make a Treaty that he had effected it and had brought about a peaceful solution of a difficult question which he believed was going to extend for many years between the two countries. The view I take from this evidence is that the hon. gentleman was pressed to yield these points which otherwise he would not have done. Now, referring to the Treaty, we are told in Article X that:

"United States fishing vessels entering the bays or harbors referred to in Article I of this Treaty shall conform to harbor regulations common to them and to fishing vessels of Canada or Newfoundland. They need not report, enter, or clear, when putting into such bays or harbors for shelter or repairing damages, nor when putting into the same, outside the limits of established ports of entry, for the purpose of purchasing wood or of obtaining water; except that any such vessel remaining more than twenty-four hours, exclusive of Sundays and legal holidays, within any such port, or communicating with the shore therein, may be required to report, enter, or clear; and no vessel shall be excused hereby from giving due information to boarding officers. They shall not be liable in such bays or harbors for compulsory pilotage; nor, when therein for the purpose of shelter, of repairing damages, of purchasing wood, or of obtaining water, shall they be liable for harbor dues, tonnage dues, buoy dues, light dues, or other similar dues."

There is a difficulty in this matter which I think must have escaped the notice of the hon. gentleman, and which I hope it is not, though it may be, too late to remedy. I have gone very carefully over the Treaty, and I do not find that, while the Treaty gives to the American fishermen the right to enter our ports without paying any harbor dues or light dues or other similar dues, or pilotage, the same privileges are extended to our fishermen in the ports of the United States. That is a very important omission, if I am right, because our fishing vessels visit Portland and Boston very frequently, and they should at least have the same privileges in American ports that American fishermen have in our own. I speak with reserve, but I have looked over the Treaty pretty carefully. I know it says:

"Fishing vessels of Canada and Newfoundland shall have on the Atlantic coasts of the United States all the privileges reserved and secured by this treaty to United States fishing vessels in the aforesaid waters of Canada and Newfoundland."

But it does not say that there is any exemption from harbor dues or light dues.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Would that be a privilege?

Mr. JONES (Halifax). No, it would be an exemption.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Would not that be a privilege?

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Whether it would be a privilege or not, this provision is indefinite. I hope I am wrong, but this should be so distinctly understood that there should be no difficulty about it. Then, the other day, I noticed that the Minister of Marine, in reply to a question put by the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), with regard to the duties paid by our fishermen, lays down the law on that occasion, and says:

"In Halifax, harbor masters' dues or not paid by any vessels under twenty tons, nor by coasting vessels, which include fishing vessels. At Pictou and Sydney, harbor dues are, by Acts of Parliament, exacted from all vessels over forty tons register; whether in practice fishing vessels are exempt when over forty tons cannot be stated without correspondence with the harbor masters of these ports."

I call attention to this because, while the Treaty would exempt American fishermen from these dues in visiting the harbors of Pictou and Sydney, the Nova Scotia fishermen would be obliged to pay the dues if the hon. gentleman's answer is according to the law. These are important places. Pictou is often visited by American fishermen en route to the North Bay, and to Prince Edward Island, and Sydney harbor is also an important place of call, and if our fishermen are obliged to pay all those dues which the hon. gentleman says they are on all vessels over 40 tons register, and the American vessels are exempt under the operations of the Treaty, it follows as a matter of course that our own fishing vessels are placed at a very considerable disadvantage. The question with regard to bait is one of the greatest possible importance. It is one which lies at the root of the fishery question, and the Americans justly understood and appreciated its value when they secured the privilege of obtaining bait under this Treaty. The result of the operation of this will be that the bankers going to the Western Banks commonly use clam bait, but those going to the Grand Banks, where they get the fish which are suitable for the larger markets, cannot expect to catch those fish without the use of fresh bait. They are a long way away from their own home, and their fresh bait will only last a short time, and if they are compelled to return to their own ports to get fresh bait if they can, and the supply is doubtful, and they cannot always get it, they would, practically, be almost compelled to give up the business altogether. But, now, all they have to do is to run into any near port on the Nova Scotia coast, from Cape Breton all along the coast to Halifax, and they will get their bait and be out on the fishing grounds again in a few days competing with our own people. This is still further a disadvantage to our own fishermen, though I do not say it is a disadvantage to our people, because they double the price of bait to our own fishermen.

Mr. FOSTER. Do you say they get that privilege under the treaty?

Mr. JONES (Halifax). They would. They get it under this proposal.

Mr. FOSTER. In what way?

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Under the modus vivendi and under the Treaty also. We are discussing both. They can to-day come into Nova Scotia coasts and ports and buy bait from our fishermen along the coast, and in consequence of their coming there, the cost of that bait is nearly double to a Nova Scotia banker. Now, I repeat, there are two interests in this matter. There is the interest of the man who sells bait, and there is the interest of the Nova Scotian or American who buys bait; but I am, in this connection, only discussing the way in which it affects our fishermen. I say, therefore, that the bait alone, which is a very important item in that connection, will be largely increased in expense to our Nova Scotia fishermen. These people then go out on the banks again, they return just as often as they like and get bait. Now, Sir, I was interviewed two years ago by the representative of a Boston paper on this very subject. Of course, I endeavored, as I always do, to maintain our own view of the subject, and to show our rights and the value of our privileges in this connection, and generally in regard to our position. I said to the reporter of that paper :

"Another very important point that should not be lost sight of in this connection is that under this treaty the American fishermen could enter our harbors and bays, set their own nets and catch their own bait. The value to them of this privilege can scarcely be overestimated. As some idea of the value I may adopt their own view. It will be remembered that, some five or six years ago, the fishermen of Fortune Bay, Newfoundland, forcibly prevented American fishermen from taking bait for one day. Of course, under the treaty, the American fishermen had the right, and the Newfoundland fishermen were wrong in attempting to prevent them, and the result was an immediate demand from the United States Government for compensation for interference with their rights. This interruption was continued for a day or so, according to my recollection, and the American Government estimated the damage done the interest of their fishermen at $15,000 to $25,000. I do not at this moment remember the exact amount, though I am pretty confident it was the latter sum. But adopting the lower sum for one day's interruption, it would show conclusively the vital importance of the privilege of the Americans. The English Government settled the claim for very nearly the amount claimed, and although at the time it was generally regarded as a most preposterous demand, still looking at the effect it would have upon the interests of the fishermen lying there for bait, I scarcely think that the amount was more than it ought to have been."

Now, I was speaking at that time of the right of the Americans to set their nets and take bait themselves, which is not permitted under the present regulations, I admit, but the principle still applies. If they can come in and buy bait it is just the same thing to them, although it may cost them a little more—probably not very much, however. If they can come in, I repeat, and buy bait, and go out on the banks, and compete with our own people, the privilege to them is just as great as was estimated by themselves, at from $15,000 to $25,000, for one day's interruption in securing bait, at only one point, remember, along the extensive coast of Newfoundland and Nova Scotia. Therefore hon. gentlemen must see that in this matter the question of bait was one of life and death to them. The exclusion of Americans from the privilege of obtaining bait was having its natural effect, together with the protection of our fisheries, and one only has to take up the report of the Boston Fish Bureau for 1888 to see what a gradual decline has taken place in that great industry in the United States since 1883. In the year 1883 the total catch of fish was 1,061,698 quintals; in 1884, it was 1,001,303 quintals, a gradual decline; in 1885, 902,455, still declining; 1886, 828,572, still further declining; 1887, 676,723, showing an enormous decline. That is to say, that whereas, in 1883 the catch was 1,061,698 quintals, in 1887 it was only 676,723. The number of vessels employed decreased proportionately from 746 in 1883, showing a gradual decline through all the years to which I have referred, down to 1887, when there was only 560 vessels engaged in that business. In the same way the number of men employed gradually declined from 8,601 in 1883, down to 7,700 in 1887. Therefore hon. members will see that under the operation of the protection of our fisheries, and the exclusion of the Americans from our ports for the purpose of buying bait, they suffered to a very great extent. Now, if the plenipotentiaries had had that report of the Fish Bureau in their hands when they were negotiating this treaty, and been able to point out to the American plenipotentiaries that under the operation of this treaty it was a question of life or death to them whether they have a right to enter our harbor and take our bait—I say that our plenipotentiaries would have been able, in my judgment, humble though it be, to obtain a very different result from that which they ask us to accept now. Then, again, take the mackerel fishery during the same time. In 1878, the catch amounted to 196,468 barrels; in 1879, 220,599; 1880, 349,674; 1881, 391,657; 1882, 378,863; 1883, 226,000; 1884, 473,076; 1885, 329,943. In 1886, remember, under the operation of the exclusion, when it became most effectual and rigid, the number of barrels of mackerel instead of being at the point of 1885, during the time they had the privilege of entering our ports, amounted to only 79,998; in 1887, it was 88,382.

Mr. JONES (Halifax).

Therefore, again, in respect to their mackerel as well as their cod fishery, this book shows incontrovertible evidence, produced by themselves, that under the operation of this treaty and their exclusions from our ports, their fisheries were gradually declining in the number of vessels and the number of men employed, and in the number of quintals of fish and barrels of mackerel that were taken. So, I say, that if hon. gentlemen had been in possession of a book or a table like that, from American sources, and had been able to point that out to the American plenipotentiaries, I think it would have been as strong an argument as they could use. Now, Sir, article 11 provided :

"United States fishing vessels entering the ports, bays and harbors of the eastern and north-eastern coasts of Canada, or of the coasts of Newfoundland, in distress of weather, or other casualties, may unload, reload, tranship or sell—"

I need not read the whole of that paragraph. The next paragraph says :

"Licenses to purchase in established ports of entry of the aforesaid coasts of Canada or of Newfoundland, for the homeward voyage, such provisions and supplies as are ordinarily sold to trading vessels shall be granted to United States fishing vessels in such ports promptly upon application and without charge, and such vessels having obtained licenses in the manner aforesaid, shall also be accorded upon all occasions such facilities for the purchase of casual or needful provisions and supplies as are ordinarily granted to trading vessels; but such provisions or supplies shall not be obtained by barter, nor purchased for re-sale or traffic."

It will be observed that in this section it says they should be offered facilities, for the purchase, not that they shall purchase. That is to say, that the authorities cannot interfere with them, and the authorities will not be able to interfere with any fishing vessel coming in there, as was stated by the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Finance, in explaining that section, took a very different view from that of the Minister of Justice, who was disposed, the other night to be rather facetious in regard to this matter, indeed he was rather facetious all though, and I thought treated a very important subject in a very jocular manner. However, the Minister of Finance says that they could purchase any supplies, including salt. The Minister of Justice said, the other night, we could not for a moment allow them to purchase bait, because bait was not an article usually granted to a trading vessel. I would ask the hon. gentleman what is the difference between bait, which the Minister of Justice says they may not obtain, and salt, which the Minister of Finance says they may obtain? They are necessarily supplies under the circumstances, and equally necessary for the prosecution of their industry and their voyage. The Minister of Finance said he would be glad to believe that the article would meet with the hearty approval of the House and the country :

"Would feel that he only acted with wise judgment and due regard to the best interests of Canada, for the sake of removing an international unpleasantness in putting those provisions into this treaty."

The whole thing seems to have been a sacrifice to peace, not a sacrifice in the interests of our people, but a sacrifice to conciliate the Americans, who raised their hands after all that had taken place and after they have been irritated to such an extent that they threatened—that is the word—the Dominion of Canada if we did not withdraw what they thought interfered with their people along the coast, that they might retaliate in a manner which would be unpleasant to us. I say this clause with regard to purchasing supplies is one that is likely to lead to a great deal of misconception. I contend that under the operation of that clause vessels may come in, as the Minister of Finance says, and may procure their provisions, including their salt, and if they take salt, why not take barrels, and if barrels, why not take bait? We have the word of the Minister of Justice, it is true, but I am disposed in this matter to accept the opinion of the Minister of Finance in preference, because the Minister of Finance doubtless is aware what was the intention of it, and the intention evidently appears to be that the Americans are to get those supplies under those circumstances. I say that Mr. Bayard asked for all those privileges two years ago. In a schedule attached to his proposal for the settlement of all questions in dispute in relation to the fisheries on the north-eastern coast of British North America, he lays down certain propositions. First, he asked to have the headland question settled in favor of the Americans. The Government have yielded, and have given up a contention which the British Government have made for the last 70 years, and which the Americans have practically admitted under the treaties which have been made since that time, and which they practically confirmed by the decision in their own courts with regard to the seizure made by a Confederate vessel in the mouth of one of their own bays,—all of which bore out the contention which the British Government put upon the headland question. I am not saying whether it was right or wrong to have yielded it, but it was asked by Mr. Bayard in 1886, and the hon. gentleman has yielded it and has given the Americans just what they asked. The Government on that occasion answered in very strong and very emphatic language. The Government, in a paper called "observations on Mr. Bayard's memorandum" on page 251 of the Fishery papers, say:

"Article 2 would suspend the operation of the statutes of Great Britain and of Canada, and of the Provinces now constituting Canada, not only as to the various offences connected with fishing, but as to Customs, harbors and shipping, and would give to the fishing vessels of the United States privileges in Canadian ports which are not enjoyed by vessels of any other class, or of any other nation. Such vessels would, for example, be free from the duty of reporting at the Customs on entering a Canadian harbor, and no safeguard could be adopted to prevent infraction of the Customs laws by any vessel asserting the character of a fishing vessel of the United States."

Section 3 of article 15 of the treaty provides with respect to bait that it shall be secured by barter. I think the hon. gentleman will find it difficult to enforce the Customs laws under such an arrangement. The Minister of Finance and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries are well aware that all along the coast of Nova Scotia from one end to the other, there are ports frequented by our own fishing vessels as well as the American vessels. Take the port of Sambro, twenty miles from Halifax. An American fishing vessel will come there for bait, and under the privileges of this treaty it may secure that by barter. To what will that lead? Will it not lead to a violation of the Customs laws, in fact to smuggling? Will the Government be able to have custom house officers at all these different points to watch American vessels and see that the Americans do not smuggle when they come in for their supplies? The privilege given to them of giving barter for bait will lead, in my judgment, to an immediate, open and direct violation of the Customs laws every time such a transaction takes place. This treaty was undoubtedly undertaken with a view of settling difficulties on various points, of explaining away difficult points in the Treaty of 1813. I would ask anyone in reading this present treaty carefully to compare it with the old one. If there was one uncertain expression, or one point that could be taken advantage of in the old treaty, there are fifty in the present one. There is nothing but what may lead to future trouble, and so far as I can see the cause of irritation between the United States and Great Britain, so far from being removed will, in effect, be more likely to be increased year by year. Take for instance the privilege of entering our ports for bait and for reshipment. What does that mean? It means simply that you cannot seize an American vessel when she is within the three-mile limit. If she is fishing or preparing to fish of course she is subject to seizure, but there may be a dozen cruisers there, and though they may go to that vessel and ask her what she is doing there she can reply simply: We are going to enter for bait, or supplies, under the provision of the treaty. I say that that very clause will lead to complication of a most serious character, and not only that, because if our inshore fisheries are of any value—and I contend they are—these American vessels going in and out of port under the sanction of the treaty, will violate that treaty whenever they get the opportunity, within the three-mile limit. Does anyone imagine that an American vessel, going in or out of one of our ports along our coast, and meeting shoals of fish, is going to sail through them, out of any respect for treaty obligations? Not at all; they do not know the fishermen if they think so. Fishermen will take fish whenever they come to their net, and those American fishermen, as they go in and out of port and find our fish, whether inside or outside of the limit, unless there happens to be a cruiser there—and it is impossible to have a cruiser in every port,—those people will practically have the whole use of our own inshore fisheries, valuable as the hon. gentleman says they are. In effect, you concede to them the right to enter our ports, you concede to them the right to obtain supplies, you concede to them the right of transshipment of their cargoes, which is a most important one, and I say, Sir, you have given up your whole case, you have given up the whole value of your fisheries to the American people. Let us understand it, for if that is the object the hon. gentleman has in view, if that is what the Government desire to give to the Americans under the operation of this treaty, not directly, I admit, but practically, the value and privileges of our inshore fisheries, let them say so, and let us understand it, because that and no other will be the result in reality. I say it is utterly impossible for the Government, by their fishery and custom house officers and by their cruisers, to watch along our Atlantic coast and keep American vessels off the three-mile limit, when they have a right, under the treaty, to go into port through that very water which is contraband for the purposes of taking fish. Take the privilege of reshipment. That is one of the most important privileges that you can give to the Americans. I confess that I always thought it was very hard, on the face of it, that our vessels could go into the United States and reship their cargoes, when the American vessels had not the privilege of coming in and reshipping their cargoes in this country. Still that was the treaty; those were the words of the treaty and they could not do so. But understand now what the advantage of this is. If one of those vessels is bound to the North Bay, up the St. Lawrence, for mackerel fishing and she has been successful she can tranship her cargo in Canada. Before this treaty she had her full cargo on board and she had to go back to the United States and land it there. She could not land it in Prince Edward Island, or in Canso, or in Halifax. And the time that she occupied in making the voyage from the fishing ground to a port in the United States and back to the fishery ground again, exhausted a large portion of the season, which is very short on that coast. Now, in the privileges granted by hon. gentlemen the American vessels can land their cargoes in Charlottetown under the operation of this treaty, and put their fish on board a steamer going to Boston, or she can run into Canso and put it on board a steamer bound for Boston, and the fish is in the market at once. This I contend is a most important concession to the fishermen. We have only to look at how the Americans themselves regard it to see this. The hon. gentleman fairly stated that the treaty was opposed for political purposes by a certain political section of the American people, and in this connection it appears to me that the question naturally arises whether we are doing a very wise thing in passing this treaty before we know what is to be its fate in the United States. It appears to me, Mr. Speaker, that if this Parliament deliberately accepts the treaty, that our hands for all future time will be tied and we never can in any future negotiation go beyond the points which have been yielded in this treaty. We never can raise any objection to any demand which is conceded under the operation of its various clauses. But if the Parliament of the Dominion did not in its wisdom ratify this treaty, or if the Government did not ask Parliament to ratify it until it receives the sanction of Congress, then the Government and the people of this country will be able to say: It is quite true a treaty was agreed upon by plenipotentiaries from Great Britain and Canada embodying certain concessions to the people of the United States, but that treaty never received the sanction of Parliament. It will then stand in a very different position in the future from what it will if the Americans in any future negotiations are able to point to the fact and say that the treaty under which we yielded those concessions was deliberately accepted by your people. In any future negotiations between us those concessions must be taken as the starting point, and although I know the hon. gentlemen will not adopt my suggestion I do think that it is a matter of policy which it would be wise for them to consider, whether they would not be acting in the interests of the country to let this matter stand for a latter stage in the Session and see what action is taken in the United States,—whether it is merely passed over for reconsideration in December, or whether, as it is stated it may be, thrown out of the United States Senate altogether. If it is thrown out of the United States Senate altogether, I think our position would be a very unenviable one. If it is only carried over to the December session of Congress, then I admit it would not be quite in the same position; but if we pass the treaty here, and if the Senate throws it out, I think we will feel rather cheap at the offers which we have made and which the Americans have not for political reasons, it may be thought, fit to accept. The fishermen of this country are those who are most interested, and my anxiety is on their account, for I see plainly that having yielded to the Americans all that they wanted we have no prospect, and we have no probability, nor does it seem within the range of probability in the very near future that there is any chance of our having fish admitted free into the United States. They have the use of our ports for their operations, for purchasing their bait, and for landing their cargoes; and under these circumstances our fishermen will continue to labor under the disadvantages which they are under to-day. A large portion of their catch must go to the United States, because we have no other market. That is well understood by the hon. members of this House, and was very fully explained by Sir John Macdonald in 1871, when he spoke as follows:—

"It seems to me that, in looking at the treaty in a commercial point of view, and looking at the question whether it is right to accept the articles, we have to consider mainly that interest which is most peculiarly affected. Now, unless I am greatly misinformed, the fishing interests in Nova Scotia, with one or two exceptions for local reasons, are altogether in favor of the treaty. They are so anxious to get free admission for their fish into the American market, that they would view with great sorrow any action of this House which would exclude from them that market; that they look forward with increasing confidence to a large development of their trade, and of that great industry, and I say that that being the case,—if it be to the interest of the fishermen, and to the advantage of that branch of national industry, setting aside all other considerations, we ought not wilfully to injure that interest. Why, Sir, what is the fact of the case as it stands? The only market for the Canadian No 1 mackerel in the world is the United States. That is our only market, and we are practically excluded from it by the present duty. The consequence of that duty is, that our fishermen are at the mercy of the American fishermen. They are made the hewers of wood and the drawers of water for the Americans. They are obliged to sell their fish at the Americans' own price. The American fishermen purchase their fish at a nominal value and control the American market. The great profits of the trade are handed over to the American fishermen, or the American merchants engaged in the trade; and they profit to the loss of our own industry and our own people. Let any one go down the St. Lawrence on a summer trip—as many of us do,—and call from the deck of the steamer to a fisherman in his boat and see for what a nominal price you can secure the whole of his catch; and that is from the absence of a market, and from the fact of the Canadian fishermen being completely under the control of the foreigner. With the duty off Canadian fish, the Canadian fisherman may send his fish at the right time, when he can obtain the best price, to the American market, and thus be the means of opening a profitable trade with the United States in exchange."

The right hon. gentleman there most correctly interpreted our position. But what position are we in to-day? We are still shut out of that market, and have no prospect of getting into it. The concessions made in this treaty, I might almost say preclude all possibility of the Americans ever opening their market to our fish; and how are we to compete with them in the same sea when they have all the advantages of our ports and of our proximity to the fishing grounds given to them, and when in addition to that, they can take their thousand barrels of mackerel to the United States and sell them for $4,000 more than our fishermen can get for a thousand barrels in the same market? It is only by opening the markets of the United States that our great fishing industry can be extended. Our market is there, and the Americans know it as well as we do. They have been told it by the hon. First Minister and by others again and again. All our fish must go there, and we have to pay the duty on what we send, because their fishermen take the largest portion, and our fish must go in at the market value minus the duty they impose on us. I say, looking at the position of our fishermen at the present moment, I regard this treaty as a most fatal blunder and as an injury to our fishermen which they will not be able to survive very long. They have been hoping year after year that as soon as they gave up those advantages which they possess in the fisheries, they would be placed on an equal plane of competition with the Americans; but they see all these advantages swept away, and they are obliged to compete with the Americans with these disadvantages against them. Under these circumstances, I am very sorry I cannot give the hon. gentleman that credit which has been given to him from Imperial as well as colonial sources. If, in the interest of the Empire, it is absolutely necessary that we should make these concessions, let us understand it, and I shall be prepared to make them and to take my share of the responsibility. But let us not put the matter under any false pretences—and this treaty has been submitted to this House under false pretences, if I may use such an expression, and if it is not unparliamentary.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. JONES. I do not think it is out of order. This treaty has been submitted to this House with the representation that it is in the interest of our own people, and I say it is against the interest of our own people who are engaged in that industry. It is in the interest of peace, I admit, and I admit that as part of the Empire we are obliged to make some concessions; and if the hon. gentleman will put it on that high level and appeal to the people on the ground that we are obliged to make sacrifices for the sake of Imperial interests, and to maintain a good understanding between two great peoples, I would be with him to a certain extent. But he has taken another ground; he has defended the treaty on the ground that it is in the interest of our own people, which is not the case. I repeat that if it would bring about a better understanding between the United States and the people of this country, which is very much to be desired, that is one point in its favor. It is the only point in its favor. If there was no other point that would commend this treaty to me, but if it would remove all causes of difference between the Americans and ourselves—if it would remove all those causes of irritation which have been brought about by the unwise fiscal policy of the present Government—if the Americans are led by it to see that there are five millions of people in this country who are anxious to establish trade relations with them which would be of mutual advantage to both countries, and are willing to make concessions under this treaty in order to obtain unrestricted reciprocity, then I say the sacrifice, injurious as it is to the fishermen along our coasts, if it leads in the future to those greater advantages of wider commercial relations between the two countries, will possibly not have been made in vain.

Mr. KENNY. Mr. Speaker, the question now under the consideration of this House is to my mind the most important one that has been under discussion since I had the honor of a seat here. The measure now before the House provides for the settlement of an important question which has ever caused a misunderstanding between the people of Canada and the people of the United States. It contemplates the removal of the barrier which now stops the way to freer commercial intercourse with the people of the American republic; it heals all old sores, and will lead to a more healthy condition of feeling between the people of the two countries; it establishes friendly relations between them; and I believe, Sir, if the treaty is adopted by both countries, they will go hand in hand, each under their own flag, in the paths of peace, prosperity and progress. Believing that, I think I am warranted in saying that the question now before us is the most important one we have had to consider during the present or past Session of the Parliament. It must be remembered, in considering this Fishery Treaty, that it was not the fault of the people of Canada that the happy relations which existed between the countries, while the Treaty of 1854 and the Treaty of 1873 were in force, that is from 1854 to 1866 and from 1873 to 1885, ceased after the abrogation of these treaties. These treaties, which disposed, for the time being, of the conflicting opinions that existed on both sides of the line as to certain sections of the Treaty of 1818, were both cancelled by the Congress of the United States, so that the people of Canada are not responsible for the retrogression from 1885 to 1888, and for the altered state of public feeling existing since 1885 between the two countries with reference to fishery matters. For that retrogression, from 1885 to 1888, the Congress of the United States is, in my opinion, solely responsible. The Treaty of 1854 was evidently more in consonance with the spirit of the age in which we live and with the changed condition of both countries than was the ancient Treaty of 1818. It disposed of the troublesome fishery question, and also permitted the interchange of certain commodities on terms fair and reasonable and advantageous to both countries. I find, on looking into this matter, that during the existence of the Reciprocity Treaty, from 1854 to 1866, there was a large trade between the two countries. That was before Confederation, and to arrive at the exact figures, I have had to take the trade of each Province. I find that the imports of Canada, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island, during those years, from the United States, amounted to over $319,000,000, and that the exports of those Provinces amounted to some $252,000,000, leaving a balance of trade in favor of the United States of over $67,000,000, and yet, notwithstanding that very favorable financial result of the working of the treaty, the treaty was abrogated by the United States in 1854, and we were compelled to revert to the Treaty of 1818. Subsequently, under the fishery clause of the Washington Treaty, the disputes or differences of opinion which existed between the people of Canada and the people of the United States, as to the clauses of the Treaty of 1818, were silenced, to the very decided advantage of the people of both countries. That amicable arrangement was also brought to a close by the action of the people of the United States, and we were again driven to the Treaty of 1818. At the termination of the treaty in 1885, it will be remembered that Canada, at the suggestion of the Executive of the United States, and to show her friendliness and sincerity in the negotiations for the renewal of the Reciprocity Treaty, refrained for six or seven months from enforcing the conditions of the Treaty of 1818, and waited until the President of the United States submitted his Message to Congress. When Canada found that the Senate of the United States refused to act on the request of President Cleveland, and refused to appoint a commission to consider this question, Canada adopted the only course opened to her, and that was to revert to the Treaty of 1818. It was the only course consistent with her own respect and with the interests of her fishermen. I contend, therefore, that for the ill-feeling to which the hon. the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) has referred, as existing in the United States toward Canada since the abrogation of the treaty in 1885, the Congress of the United States is alone responsible. That ill-feeling originated, of course, in the enforcement on our part of the conditions of the Treaty of 1818, and yet that was the only course open to us; and it seemed to me a mockery and an absurdity, that after we had those relations with our neighbors under the treaty which expired in 1885, we should have to go back to the ancient Treaty of 1818. It is not creditable that two friendly nations, two adjoining peoples, who have so much in common, should be wrangling and quarrelling over a document that was brought into existence over 70 years ago. No matter how clear the conditions of that agreement may be, it is not creditable that in the present age we should be wrangling over it. It is much more sensible that we should come together, discuss the points in dispute, arrive at some practical solution, and then make a fresh start. That has been accomplished, the representatives of all the parties interested met at Washington, and after long and careful deliberations placed their labors before us in the form of a treaty, and submitted that treaty to us for approval. We know that the treaty has also been sent to the Senate of the United States by President Cleveland, accompanied by his own recommendation in favor of its adoption, and he has pronounced it a fair and an honorable agreement. I admit that Canada, in negotiating this treaty, has made certain concessions. As regards the value of those concessions, it is impossible to-day to estimate them, but we knew, when we submitted this matter to a commission and an arbitration, that palpable and inevitable concessions must follow. And I was a little surprised to find my hon. friend and colleague, the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), complaining of these concessions. I was under the impression that he had himself recognised that it was absolutely necessary that some concessions should be made on both sides in order to arrive at a happier state of feeling than has existed during the past twelve or eighteen months, because I find that my hon. friend is reported in the Halifax Chronicle of July 1st, 1886,—I believe he quoted a portion of the interview, but I did not catch his exact words—as having said:

"Nothing but mutual concession and a determination on the part of both Governments to avoid cause for open disagreement can prevent the most irritating consequences; and our friendly relations might be strained to a degree that could scarcely bear further tension."

I think my hon. friend there has laid down the doctrine that mutual concessions are necessary even to preserve peace between the two countries. As regards the matter of concessions, we all know that, in the ordinary affairs of life, if there is a dispute between neighbors the most expeditious and satisfactory way of settling it is to call in parties acceptable to the disputants and to ask them to consider the matter in dispute and adjudicate upon it, and what is beneficial in private life is equally beneficial in public life.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Not for one to give up everything and the other nothing.

Mr. KENNY. I never interrupt, but I do not object to the interruption. The hon. gentleman knows well that as soon as a matter is submitted to arbitration or to a commission, that is a recognition of the fact that concessions are necessary on both sides. Now, looking at this question nationally, I say that, when I am called upon to vote on it, I consider that I am called to vote upon the most important question which has been submitted to Parliament since I have had the honor of being a member, but, as my hon. friend and colleague has mentioned, it is especially important to the people of the Lower Provinces, and notably to the Province of Nova Scotia. The whole fishery product of Canada in 1886 amounted to $18,679,288, and of that amount Nova Scotia's share came to $8,415,361. Hon. gentlemen will recognise at once how much more concerned we are in that Province in all that relates to fishery questions than is any other Province of this Dominion. It will also be found that whilst in the whole of Canada, there were 55,731 men engaged in fishing, of these 27,485 belonged to the Province of Nova Scotia; and while the tonnage engaged in that industry amounted to 44,000 tons, 29,000 belonged to Nova Scotia. While the total value that Canada had invested in fishing boats, ships, nets, &c., amounted to $6,814,295, of that amount Nova Scotia possessed nearly $3,000,000, or almost half. Of the whole fishery product of Canada, it will be found that we exported some $6,843,388, and that Nova Scotia exports of fish amounted to $3,899,077. I find that, of that amount, although my hon. colleague says the American market is the only market for our fish, of our exports of $3,899,077, only about one-third, or $1,358,024, went to the United States. As regards the condition of our fishermen, in whom we all take a very great interest, and who form a very large and important factor in our population, their condition to-day is, in my opinion, more satisfactory than it has been for many years. I believe that, at least as far as the fishermen of Nova Scotia are concerned, and I do not presume to speak for the fishermen of any other part of the Dominion, their condition as a whole is more satisfactory at present than it has been for many years. My hon. colleague has referred, in the course of his remarks, to the inshore fisheries of Canada, and has also called attention to the retrogression which has taken place in the general fishing interest of the United States of America, and he instanced the small product of mackerel for the year 1887. I think he could not have given us a better proof of the value of the inshore fisheries than that instance, because, if he had taken the trouble to enquire—and there are few gentlemen better informed on the subject than my hon. friend—he would have discovered that the last season was a poor mackerel season, especially for the Americans. The fish was caught principally inside the three-mile limit. The fish would not school off shore, so our fishermen caught mackerel by the old method of hook and line, and they did well, and that fish was almost all caught within the three-mile limit. My hon. friend knows that the Americans have exhausted their own fisheries by improper and injudicious fishing, and that there is certainly a risk of their doing the same, if they are not prevented, in our waters. The United States fishermen ignore entirely the Canadian regulations, as far as they are permitted to, and have the habit of throwing overboard fish they do not want, and thus help to destroy the inshore fisheries. I regret that, when this treaty was under consideration, some means were not adopted to put a stop to purse-seine fishing. That is more destructive than any other mode of fishing, and, if it be persevered in, will destroy the fishing on our coasts. It is known that, by the system of purse-seining, large quantities of fish are caught which are considered valueless by the fisherman, because he only wants the mackerel, and he throws the others overboard, to the great injury of our fishing banks. I regret exceedingly that it was not possible to arrive at some international mode of putting a stop to this injurious system of fishing. While it is adopted by the Americans, our own people, to a certain extent, are almost compelled to adopt it in self-defence. My hon. colleague, in the course of his remarks, has referred to the fact that under the modus vivendi, the Americans are permitted to come into our harbors for the purchase of bait. The hon. gentleman must be aware that they can only exercise that privilege by paying for it, and that under the modus vivendi, they can frequent our harbors, on paying a tax of $1.50 per ton, for the purchase of bait and other supplies. Why, Sir, it was only a few days ago that the Halifax Morning Chronicle, with which the hon. member is familiar, found great fault with the conditions of the treaty, because it did not permit their fishermen to come into our harbors for bait. That is one of the charges brought against the Minister of Finance, of excluding the American fishermen from our harbors and preventing them from acquiring bait. My hon. friend says that Mr. Bayard considered the fishery question as one by itself, and he found fault, as I understood him, at least, with the hon. Minister of Finance for not going further and using this opportunity for negotiating a reciprocity treaty. Well, Sir, as I have understood the state of feeling which prevails among the statesmen and politicians of the United States, it is their desire and determination that the first question that shall be disposed of is this fishery question, and they will not entertain any trade negotiation on the part of Canada, any offers on the part of Canada, for freer commercial intercourse with them, until this fishery question is disposed of; therefore my hon. friend is right in saying that the fishery question is one by itself, and that it must be disposed of before any other negotiations can be opened between the United States and Canada. And I notice, also, that my hon. friend has found fault in respect of the headland question; he says everything has been given away in the headland question, and that Mr. Bayard got exactly, in that matter, all that he asked for. Now, Sir, I suppose I can hardly expect my hon. friend to praise the Government for this treaty, or for anything else they do; but I find that he took an interest in this headland question many years ago. In the Globe of May 16, 1872, I find that my hon. friend, in addressing the Parliament of Canada when the Washington Treaty was under discussion, found fault with the right hon. gentleman who was then leading the Government and advocating the treaty, because the headland question had not been settled. On that occasion he was reported to have said:

"The first question the arbitrators would have to decide would be the headland question, whether from headland to headland, or along the coast. It was, therefore, of the greatest importance that the High Commissioner should have settled definitely the question of headlands, so that the arbitration would have a basis on which to make their valuation."

Now, Sir, my hon. friend found fault in 1872 because the Government had not provided for a settlement of the headland question, and now he finds fault with them because they have settled it. The hon. gentleman, in the course of his remarks, states that in order to judge of the merits of this treaty, we should see how it is considered on the other side of the line. Well, my hon. friend knows that this very opinion which exists in the United States, and to which he has referred, as to the value of our inshore fisheries, gained importance and gained notoriety in the United States from the fact that a commission was held, and that certain of the public men of the United States visited the districts that were interested in fishing matters, Massachusetts especially, and held their commission in Boston and Gloucester, and received the evidence of those who were interested in the trade, and the undoubted consensus of opinion in those places was that the inshore fisheries were comparatively of little value—that evidently seemed to be the opinion. He must also have noted that this fishery treaty has been frequently assailed by people of the United States, an those who are most interested in fishery matters in that country, because, they say, that it concedes every thing to Canada, while my hon. friend takes the stand that everything has been conceded to the United States. Now, Sir, I think that impartial people will arrive at the conclusion that has been pronounced by the President of the United States, that this treaty is a fair and honorable settlement of the difficulty. My hon. friend has not told us whether he is going to vote against the treaty or vote for it. He reminds me very much of what I read in the Biglow papers, of a man that he cooled off when he came to understand it. Now that my hon. friend and some of his neighbors have come to understand the question, they very likely have cooled off. But the organ of opinion which represents him in the lower Provinces, the Halifax Chronicle, informed us the other day that the House should be divided on this question, and that the treaty should not be ratified by this Legislature. Now, with that I cannot agree. I regret exceedingly, Mr. Speaker, that it was not within my power to arrive at Ottawa in time to have heard the very able, the very eloquent, the very exhaustive speech with which the hon. Minister of Finance introduced this important measure to the Parliament of Canada. I may say, Sir, that the criticisms which I have read of that speech in the public press, and the comments which I have heard from hon. gentlemen who had the pleasure of listening to it, very much add to my regret. I was also sorry that I had not an opportunity of hearing the very brilliant and very incisive speech of the Minister of Justice on that occasion. After those two distinguished statesmen have discussed this question, I think I almost ought to apologise to the House for taking up its time in discussing it, but the importance of this question to Canada, and to Nova Scotia particularly, must be my excuse. Now, Sir, assuming that there will be a division of the House, I am prepared to say that I will vote for the treaty for several reasons. I will vote for it because I believe it is the best answer this House can give to the retaliatory Edmunds Bill of the United States, because Mr. Bayard says this treaty grants to American fishermen all they can reasonably ask from Canada. I will vote for the treaty because I believe, when it is calmly and dispassionately considered and judged on its merits by the people of Canada and of the United States, it will recommend itself to their sober judgment and approval. I believe that the adoption of the treaty will improve the relations between the two countries and establish such friendly relations as ought to exist between us, and which will be lasting. I believe that the adoption of the treaty will remove every possible cause of misunderstanding between the people of the United States and the people of Canada, and that it will unite in the closest ties of esteem and respect all the members of these great English-speaking races. For these reasons I will vote for the treaty.

Mr. EISENHAUER. As the treaty now under consideration will very largely affect the county which I have the honor to represent, I desire to offer some remarks on the question. I think it will interfere very seriously with the rights of a large class of our population, especially the fishermen, and I am of the opinion that it will press most unjustly on our fishing interests. Several hon. gentlemen who favor the treaty have endeavored to lead the House to believe that it will in no way press injuriously on that class of our population. I, however, think otherwise. We have a very large fleet of vessels engaged in what is called the deep-sea fishing. The fleet from the town of Lunenburg alone comprises from 80 to 90 sail averaging 80 or 90 tons each, besides that half as many more which come from other ports in the county. Most of these vessels are engaged in the trawl mode of fishing and are obliged to use fresh bait, in fact that is the only bait they can use. During the years of the treaty when American fishermen were allowed to come on our coasts and purchase bait, the price of bait to our fishermen was very much enhanced. I know that in some seasons our fishermen were obliged to pay as high as $5 or $6 for a barrel of herring. During the two or three years that have elapsed since the abrogation of the treaty, they have obtained their bait for 50 per cent. less, and in some cases at even a greater reduction. The cost of bait for one of these vessels for a season during the existence of the treaty would average from $600 to $800, and in some cases it has cost a vessel as high as $1,000. During the last two years, however, the cost of bait for a vessel has not averaged more than $300 or $400. The price of bait again will be enhanced to what it was during the operation of the Washington Treaty, if the Americans are allowed to come in and purchase bait. It has been stated by hon. gentlemen opposite that no surrender has been made by Canada, and that any concessions made were of a very trivial character. I should like some of those hon. gentlemen to come down to my county and endeavor to make the fishermen believe that such is the case. Those hon. gentlemen, even the Minister of Finance, have sought to lead the House to believe that Canada has made no concessions. For what, then, were we contending; for what reason were the Government so rigidly enforcing the fishery and customs laws and regulations? Nothing is to be gained by ratifying the treaty at the present moment. In case the treaty was ratified by us and not ratified by our neighbors across the border, we would stand in a very much worse position than we would occupy if we allow the matter to drop. I think the Government would be acting in the true interests of the country, and the fishermen especially, if they would consider this matter seriously before the treaty was ratified. The chief reasons given for the arrangement arrived at are that it was entered into to prevent the United States carrying out their policy of retaliation. I cannot help saying that, in my opinion, the Government are somewhat to blame for the irritation that has been aroused among our neighbors across the border. In my humble opinion the Government have been too rigid and too severe. I may give an instance or two in which I was somewhat interested to show how very rigidly the Government have enforced all the regulations. The master of a vessel in which I was interested happened to fall in with an American vessel 14 miles distant from any headland. The American schooner was short of provisions and the men had scarcely anything left to eat, and the captain of the Nova Scotia vessel supplied the American with a barrel of flour and other small articles. The vessel, which was the Scylla, was seized and a fine of $400 imposed for what I consider was only a humane act. The Government were, however, obliged to retract and refund the amount. In another case the master of a vessel in which I was interested loaned 12 or 15 barrels of salt to a brother in command of an American vessel the year previous to the abrogation of the treaty, and in 1886 those vessels fell in with each other and my captain returned the salt. That vessel was again seized and fined $400, of which the department remitted $300. I think that hon. gentlemen will admit that this is severe and rigid, but these are only a few of the examples which have come under my own personal knowledge. I think there is a good deal of truth in what the hon. the senior member for Halifax (Mr Jones) stated with regard to the treaty, for there are many points in it that will be open to contention and dispute, and instead of the treaty settling all those disputes I think it will just be the reverse. The hon. gentleman is also correct in his view with regard to several charges from which American vessels are exempt under this treaty, and which our vessels are obliged to pay. I think that is very unfair and bears very harshly on our fishermen. In my view it is impossible to carry on the fishing industry of our country, especially as regards pickled fish—mackerel and herring—when we are met with a heavy tariff of $2 in the United States. It seems to me that under this treaty we have given away the key of the whole situation. It is said by some gentlemen on the other side that this treaty will be the means of removing all difficulties between the two countries and will gradually lead up to wider trade relations. I hope that that may be the case, but I very much fear we have given away the key we had in our hands and which we could use in order to bring about this very desirable result. As was pointed out by the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), the provisions of the treaty will enable American fishermen to secure larger quantities of fish for their market, and it will consequently reduce the price for our fish. The privilege of transshipment of their fish in our ports enables those vessels to catch larger quantities of mackerel than they were formerly able to do, because the time they lost in going to ports in the United States with their fares and coming back to the fishing grounds will be saved to them. I do seriously think, and believe, that this treaty will work very injuriously to our fishermen. I must say that I anticipated the result of this Washington commission all along. I knew very well that the Home Government was very anxious to have this matter settled, and that they would be quite ready to settle it in a manner very much contrary to our interests, so that I am not at all surprised at the result. That is very unfair to us; we were the weakest party of the three and we got the worst of it. It has been very properly stated here by a number of gentlemen that the American market was the only market for our best qualities of mackerel. We have four qualities of mackerel that find their way to the United States, besides a large portion of all the poorer qualities. During the year 1886 I think it was, the price for our best qualities of mackerel in the United States was very low, as low as $3 or $3.50 a barrel. On this fish we were compelled to pay a duty of $2, as well as commission and other charges, so that the poor fishermen had not enough remaining to pay for barrels and salt, while the Americans had, at all events, the $2 duty. During the treaty many of our vessels could take their fares of cod direct into the American ports from the Banks, and they got their return almost immediately. If this treaty is ratified they will not be able to do that, because the duty upon a fare of codfish equal to 2,000 quintals when dried would amount to $1,700 or $1,800 at a duty of half a cent a pound on green cod. We are, therefore, to a certain extent prevented from getting rid of the surplus of our codfish in the American market on account of the duty. This drives a large quantity of fish into the West India markets—a much larger quantity than those markets are able to consume, and consequently it lowers the price there as well. I think it would only be just and fair to those poor toilers by the sea, if the Government should increase their bounty to the amount they will receive from the American Government for licenses taken out by their fishing vessels. This treaty if ratified will injure the county which I have the honor to represent more than any county in the Dominion that I know of, for the reasons I have already given, and I think it would be only well that the Government should pause before ratifying this treaty, which will work so injuriously to all our deep-sea fishermen. There are a small number of fishermen who use the hook and line, and do not use fresh bait, who would not be much injured, but all others would be injured to a very large extent. Now, I am quite free to admit that the privilege of selling bait will be of some benefit to our inshore fishermen, but I am quite sure that if our inshore fishermen had the choice they would prefer to remain as they are at present, provided there is any reasonable hope of getting rid of the American duty on fish. After all, it is only a very small portion of their catch which our inshore fishermen sell to the deep-sea fishermen for bait. A very large portion of their herring and mackerel are shipped to the American market. In the later part of the season nearly all their catch of mackerel finds its way into the American market, and they have to pay a duty on it of $2 a barrel. Now, I do not wish to take up the time of the House, but I would repeat again, in the interests of the fishermen of the county I represent, and in the interests of the fishermen of the country generally, that I consider that the Government has made some very valuable concessions. The junior member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny), who has just taken his seat, seemed to think that the concessions do not amount to much. Well, if that hon. gentleman goes down into his county, I think he will find that the fishermen there will tell him a different story. I think the concessions are very valuable; in fact, I think the Americans have got almost all they wanted, while we have got nothing. The hon. member said there were concessions on both sides, but he failed to point them out, and I have failed to hear any hon. member point out the least concession which we have got from the Americans. Therefore, I would very strongly urge on the Government to stay their hands from ratifying this treaty, for the present at all events, for I believe it will prove most injurious to a large class of our fishermen. I am sure that no arrangement that can be made between the two countries will satisfy the fishermen that does not provide for the free admission of fish into the American market. I am very sure that the whole of those engaged in the deep-sea fisheries, if they gave expression to their feeling, would be against the ratification of the treaty. For these reasons I do hope the Government will take into consideration the advisability of withholding the ratification, at all events for the present.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

Gen. LAURIE. The hon. the Minister of Finance took the House with him through a long and eloquent retrospect of the history of the fishery question; but there was one point to which the hon. gentleman did not allude, and I feel that he will not object to my supplying the omission. When the Washington Treaty was abrogated, and it became necessary that we should protect our fisheries, cruisers were sent out to do duty along our coasts, and a large expenditure was incurred in the protection of these fisheries. After two years of this protection a general election took place, and I say it with pride, and it must appeal, I am sure, to the national sentiment of every hon. gentleman in this House, upon whichever side he may sit, as showing that we are not any longer purely a paper nation, that we are not any longer Canadians by Act of Parliament, that, at a time when it was most desirable in the interests of party to make every point score against the Government, I did not find, from one end of the Dominion to the other, especially in the western part of the Dominion, where certainly no benefits will accrue to the population by protection to the fisheries, that any voice was ever raised against this expenditure in the protection of our just rights. I feel that this is a thing of which we may well be proud, because when I go back to the history of the United States, I find that, even after they had existed as a nation and as a confederation of States for twenty years, after the war with the United States in 1812, when the matter was brought before the commissioners appointed to settle the case, the feeling grew so intense on the question of the fisheries, which were claimed by New England in their entirety, and which the other States did not trouble themselves much about, that a breach nearly occurred, and it was a very serious question whether the New England States would not separate themselves from the rest of the Confederation. I mention this as pointing to the fact that I think our national sentiment has already grown to a point when we may claim that every portion of the Dominion feels a patriotic interest in what concerns any other portion. It is a matter of pride, I must say, that when we compare our progress with that of the nation to the south of us, we find that even twenty years after the confederation of the different Provinces of Canada into one Dominion, we have formed a true national spirit and are prepared to co-operate with each other in every respect in defending the interests of our people in whatever parts of the Dominion these interests may be affected. Our national spirit leads us to cultivate and protect the interests of another portion of the community rather than see it go by default and suffer, and in that sense we show that a national spirit has already taken root amongst us. In this connection, I am happy to say, that although, of course, I have not been able to go amongst my constituents and hear their views, I am in constant communication with them, that I am pleased to learn from all parts of the constituency that the people have not made this a party question, but are entirely in accord with the action of the Government. With reference to the remark of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) that this treaty is composed of concessions made in favor of the United States, that may be the case. It is the case undoubtedly, but I would ask if those concessions made to the United States are not injurious to the interests of our fishermen, why should we object to them. If we find that the concessions made by us are in no ways inimical to our people, it is a triumph of statesmanship to have overcome by this means the difficulties of the situation and have arrived at a settlement satisfactory to both sides. There was some historical error in the statement of the hon. member for Halifax which I feel bound to correct. He said that under the Washington Treaty the interests of the Province of Nova Scotia were sacrificed, because the right hon. the First Minister refused to offer the United States plenipotentiaries free lumber and coal. I think that is undoubtedly an error, which I cannot allow to pass on the present occasion without correcting it. My impression is that the right hon. gentleman did not refuse to make this offer, but that the offer was withdrawn at the request of the British plenipotentiaries, on the ground that the compensation offered by Canada was not sufficient to offset the advantages which the United States had obtained. I have called attention to this because I do not feel it right that this statement should pass unnoticed. The hon. gentleman regrets very much that we did not offer to the United States the privilege of free fish in Canadian waters, in return for reciprocity in natural products, and he says that was the lever which should have been used to obtain reciprocity. The hon. gentleman poses as a friend of the fishermen, but I hardly think it is consistent with that position which he assumes, that he should be willing to sacrifice their interests for the purpose of obtaining a concession which would benefit other interests. I do not think it is the duty of true friends of the fishermen to sacrifice their interests for the sake of others. The hon. gentleman went on to say that he regretted that the Americans did not ask for the inshore fisheries, and he has assumed therefore that they placed no value on our inshore fisheries. Whatever value the Americans may place on them, I do not hesitate to say that our people place a great value on our inshore fisheries. It is by means of those fisheries that a large portion of the population of the Maritime Provinces derive their existence, and were it not for this source of livelihood, they would be forced to seek a living elsewhere, and this is the only resource of the people living on those rocky shores. Were the Americans permitted to return to our fisheries as formerly, in a few years the fisheries would be fished out and destroyed by their reckless habits of fishing, and a large portion of our population forced to seek a living elsewhere. The hon. gentlemen referred to Art. 11 of the treaty. Well, I could hardly follow his reasoning with regard to it. He referred to that question of licenses, to purchase for the homeward voyage such provisions and supplies as are sold to trading vessels. He assumes from that, although the hon. the Minister of Justice set him right, that these vessels could come in and purchase bait and salt and barrels, and in fact everything they required, so as to make our coasts a base of supplies for their operations. I do not think that is the reading of the treaty and that it is so understood by the plenipotentiaries. He then touches on the headlands contention, and makes an assertion which I was a little surprised at, because if he had listened to the discussion across the floor, when the treaty was introduced, between the Minister of Finance and the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), he would have heard some information. He asserts that the headlands contention has been maintained by the British Government for the last seventy years. I think he might have heard that, on instructions from home, the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), when he was Minister of Marine, thought proper to withdraw that contention, and not to instruct the cruisers to keep the Americans outside of that limit. The fact is that, in 1869 and 1870, as we have had already told us, the three miles boundary outside of the headlands was all we were permitted to preserve, but now, under this new treaty, they have adopted the regulations applicable to the North Sea Convention and adopted by all the nations of Europe, and have protected all bays where the headlands are ten miles or less apart. It is a distinct gain. The Americans have now acknowledged this, whereas they formerly claimed that they could come within three marine miles of the shore at any point. He also objected to vessels being permitted to enter our harbors to purchase bait under the article of the treaty by which, under license, vessels can enter for certain purposes, and he went on to show that this would lead to smuggling unless a large addition was made to the customs staff. I am afraid that, as long as foreign vessels are allowed to enter our harbors, as long as duties are levied, there will be a necessity for that, and, whether those vessels enter our harbors to purchase bait or anything else, for barter or for gold, as long as people require certain goods, those goods will be landed on shore unless steps are taken to prevent it. He also says those vessels will fish within the three-mile limit, unless cruisers are there to guard against that. How is this to be prevented? We have a long coast, and whether vessels come in for bait, or drift in, as they claimed last year, they will come in. As has been stated by the hon. gentleman, if the fish are there they will come after them, and I do not think the fact that they can come in to buy bait is of any consequence in that connection. Then the hon. gentleman says that we ought to wait until the Senate of the United States have dealt with this question. I do not agree with him in that. I do not think it is desirable that we should place ourselves in the position of a subordinate Legislature to the Senate of the United States. I think, as far as this matter is concerned, we are a sovereign Legislature within ourselves in regard to approving or disapproving of this treaty, and it is for us to deal with matters of interest to our own people without reference to the Senate of the United States. He says we will feel cheap if the treaty is rejected there. I do not hold with him on that point, and I will give my grounds. We have been charged with carrying on our protective service in a barbarous manner, it has been charged that we have followed practices that would not be followed by any other civilised nation, and, if that is the case, if this matter should come to arbitration at any time, and that assumption prevailed, it is quite clear that we would have to surrender these points. So it is better for us to show that we are prepared to accept this rational and modern interpretation of the Treaty of 1818, and in so doing we shall have the sympathy of all nations outside. Should the matter be referred to arbitration later, the arbitrator certainly would not be prejudiced against us as a nation pursuing barbarous and irrational practices. I also fail to see the point which he tried to make in asserting that the treaty as now made precludes further negotiation, and finally closes any possibility of the American market being opened for our fish, which he as well as I and every man who handles fish, must desire and everyone who is interested in the fishing community must equally desire; but, so far from that it seems to me that we have placed ourselves in the very best position possible for this. The plenipotentiaries on either side were not permitted to make alterations in the tariff; they could only submit them but, while they stated that they were not authorised to negotiate on the basis of a tariff arrangement, they so made their arrangements that, until the fish are placed on the free list, the American vessels that fish off our coasts will be at a disadvantage in this respect, that, even if they have licenses, they will have to pay a license fee therefor, and, therefore, they will be at a greater expense than our vessels will be. The hon. gentleman produced a book which he appeared to think an authority on the matter of fish, and he said, if the Minister of Finance had had this book which I hold in my hand, he would not have negotiated this treaty. Why not? What is there in this book to preclude it? I have also a copy of the book in my hand, and I do not find anything in this book to prevent the Minister of Finance negotiating this treaty. I find that the hon. gentleman stated some facts from this book, and also I regret to say that, no doubt entirely unintentionally on his part, he made some misrepresentations of facts. He quoted from a table and said that the total importation of mackerel into the United States in 1887 was 99,995 barrels, and he mentioned how much the catch of mackerel in the United States had been reduced since they were shut out of our inshore fisheries; but, when I examined this return a little more attentively, I found that that amount is the total receipts in the Boston fish market of domestic and foreign catch. Then he went on to say that, as our catch was small compared with theirs, the price of mackerel was regulated by the home catch there, and our importation had to pay the duty. Without going into that question more fully at the present moment, I find that the domestic receipts in the Boston market are 25,664 barrels, and the foreign receipts 51,643 barrels; so that the foreign receipts in Boston are twice as much as the domestic receipts, in mackerel. If his argument is good for anything—and I am prepared to endorse it on that point that, where there is a sufficiency of the article in the market the importer will pay the duty if he chooses to send in any more, but that where there is not a sufficiency the consumer will pay the duty, and the home producer will gain the benefit—here we see that the imported article is double the quantity of the home production; but that is only in the Boston fish market. There really was a larger catch than that in New England, amounting to 88,000 barrels, which was the smallest catch for forty years. I think that is a proof that our protection of our fisheries, as I maintain and as our fishermen maintain, and our keeping the Americans outside the three-mile limit allows the mackerel to find a home there, where they are less disturbed, and larger quantities will fall into the hands of our fishermen, who fish in a better and more methodical manner than the Americans, and the Americans will take a smaller quantity year after year. The fish have a sort of intelligence, and they will come within the three-mile limit where they are less disturbed. The hon. gentleman who preceded me, the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Eisenhauer), is a gentleman for whose opinions on the fishery question I have the highest respect. No man in this House is a better authority on fish than he is, and he deserves the highest credit for the impulse he has given to the county he represents, and for the intelligent way in which he has built up the trade there. All honor to him for it, but when he spoke on this point, he naturally spoke from the point of view of the particular branch of the fishery trade in which he is interested. He has a special interest. The inhabitants of the county of Lunenburg are much more engaged in that business, as he said himself. He spoke most fairly on the subject. He told us that his constituents were deeply interested in the deep-sea fisheries, but he went on and told us, and I give him credit for that too, how they were interested. He said that when the Americans, under the Washington Treaty, were given entrance to our harbors to buy bait, the price of bait rose $5 per barrel for herring; that since the abrogation of that treaty the deep-sea fishermen had been enabled to buy their bait for 50 per cent. less. He showed us that during the treaty, the fitting out of a vessel going to the Grand Banks for bait, would amount to from $600 to $1,000; whereas since the abrogation of the treaty, they could purchase the same quantity of bait at from $3.0 to $4.00. Well, Sir, who gets that money? Where is it spent? Why, they buy their bait from the inshore fishermen, and these get the money. You will observe by this that the protection of the inshore fishermen has conduced to their advantage. The permission is renewed, and the price of bait will again rise. But if it raises the price of bait, that bait will be bought from the toilers along our coast, and they will get the money for it; in that sense the treaty would not be an injury to the inshore fishermen. Now he also made the point that it is most desirable that the duty should be taken off all sorts of fish, including codfish, because the United States people were our best market for our best class of codfish; and if they took them off our hands, they would enable us to obtain a higher price in the market that takes the largest quantity of our fish, but a second class article, that is the West Indies. Now, Sir, I do not hesitate to say that it is most desirable that the duty should be taken off. He touched upon another matter in regard to the application of the license fee, assuming that the Americans are going to pay it, and from what I saw in my county, they are already making arrangements to do so. The hon. gentleman from Halifax says that we got nothing and that the Americans Government got everything under the treaty. If we get nothing, and they get everything, I think the fairest way to ascertain is to ask, in the first place: What are the interests of our fishermen? We are dealing with a very divided interest. I do not say that the interest of the various classes of fishermen along our shores are antagonistic, but I do say they are diversified and different one from the other. They are all important. There is a large amount of capital invested in each of these industries. We will take, first, the shore fishermen. Now, how are our shore fishermen to suffer under this arrangement? Sir, when I had the misfortune, or the good fortune—I am not prepared to say which it was,—of running two elections during the last year, in a fishing county, as my opponent was opposed to the Government, I heard everything that could be said against the Government, and every point possible was made in order to throw discredit upon the Government. One of the points that was made in December last was that the Minister of Finance had gone to Washington and that he would palm off, he would surrender, the shore fisheries to the fishermen of the United States, and that no price we could obtain would be sufficient to compensate our shore fishermen for the surrender of those fisheries. The Finance Minister has come back, but he has not parted with our shore fisheries; and although the hon. member for Halifax says he is sorry that the Americans did not ask for them, I, Sir, am very glad they did not ask for them, and I am very glad they did not get them, because I consider they are of the greatest value to us. When I talked to our shore fishermen, and in all my communications and conversation with them, "whatever you do," they said, "keep the Americans outside the three-mile limit." Well, Sir, they are to be kept out, and not only that, but a very lucrative market is to be opened to our fishermen, if the treaty is ratified; and if, by-and-bye, the duty is taken off fish, or the modus vivendi is established a very lucrative market will be opened to them and they will be benefited by a vast increase in the price of bait that they will be able to sell, not only to our own fishermen but also to the Americans. Now, Sir, we have a second class, the deep sea fishermen, those in whom the hon. member for Lunenburg is particularly interested, and in whom I am largely interested and whom I largely represent. Their principal desire is that the duty be taken off fish going into the States. But, Sir, how can we compel the Congress of the United States to take that duty off? You recollect, Sir, the old story of a traveller with a cloak on; and the sun and the wind were contesting which should get his cloak off first. In this case the wind will not get that cloak off first; the sun may. We may succeed by offering them certain inducements, we may get that cloak off, we may get the duty taken off. In the first place let us show them, as we are doing, as we have done under this treaty, that we are animated by no hostile spirit, that we are prepared to meet them in a fair and reasonable way. When they come to pay their license fee year after year, they will see that, on the whole, it will be advantageous for them not to pay the license fee, that it will be as well for them to enter into competition with us in their market, as to continue the present system of competition. That being the view, I think we have adopted the very best plan, under the circumstances, of getting the duty taken off. Now, there is a third and a very important class, and that is the inshore fishermen, and those who supply them. To them it will be a very great boon that the American fishermen may come into our harbors, may come upon our coasts and purchase such supplies as they need under the treaty, or under the modus vivendi. It will tend to increase the consumption of the products of our soil, and other products, even our manufactured products and also stimulate trade among themselves. One large and important industry there, is the collection of ice in winter. Now, ice is supplied now only to our own fishermen, but under this arrangement, it will be supplied, on a very much larger scale, to American fishermen as well. Frost is cheap in our country, and so is water, and we can make ice on a large scale, and sell an article that does not cost much except in the labor of gathering it. Then we have a fourth class, that is the class who man the Gloucester fishing vessels. It is a common delusion among the people of the United States, which they manifested when they got up this cry about our shameful treatment of their fishermen. They said: This is an industry of extreme importance to us, it must be protected, because it is the only nursery for our navy in time of war. Why, Sir, men from the Provinces man the United States fishing vessels, and therefore they have to be considered too. That is a very important element in the consideration of this question. One of the great grievances of these men is that they cannot visit their home during the summer.

Now, if this treaty is carried into effect, or if the modus vivendi is adopted, and they obtain a license, they will practically be able to visit their homes. They often run into port from the Roseway Banks and the Western Bank, to shelter on our coast, and in doing so one of their great grievances will be removed. I mention this because, even in the matter of duty, as a rule, the crews of vessels receive one-half the out-turn. Now, it is the impression that they are protecting American fishermen, that the duty is practically a bounty which goes to American fishermen as opposed to Provincial fishermen; but, as a matter of fact, these fishermen, not wild harum-scarum young men, but for the most part fathers of families who have made a practice of going away to the United States, who own they do not do any better when they go, but who go because they have been in the habit of going and do not like to change the system, obtain one-half of the present duty so long as the duty is imposed. So the duty, instead of going into American pockets, largely goes into the pockets of our own fishermen.

An hon. MEMBER. Oh, oh.

Gen. LAURIE. Perhaps, if the hon. gentleman will visit the Maritime Provinces he will find out that what I am saying is an actual fact; I am not speaking what I have read, but I am speaking what I know. There are disadvantages in connection with shipping in United States vessels. They are more reckless in sailing than our vessels, and while they do make larger returns they also make larger losses. I now refer to the book, which the Finance Minister was told he should have referred to more frequently, and I find that the losses of Gloucester vessels during the season of 1887 amounted to 22 vessels and 145 lives, of which I am sorry to say a very large proportion, far more than the majority, were those of fishermen from the Lower Provinces. I think, as I mentioned already, that the county which I have the honor to represent, where political feeling as a rule runs high has not undertaken, I am happy to say, to regard the fishery question from a party point of view. The people regard it from the commercial and practical point as to whether it will be a benefit to them or whether it will be injury, and the consensus of opinion, even by those who are on other points politically opposed to the Government, is that on the whole the new treaty will be a very great benefit. Their idea was, and their idea still is, as it must be the idea of every sensible man, that if in discussing the Treaty of 1818 with the United States we were to hold to our extreme position in regard to its interpretation and claim everything that we could claim under the treaty, no progress would be made. The United States did not contend that our position was a false one further than that our interpretation was not in harmony and consonance with the modern view, and, therefore, they were not prepared to abide by it. This is not the only instance of a nation refusing to abide by a treaty. We can go back to a time within the recollection of most of us when this occurred. After the Crimean war the Treaty of Paris was signed by France, England and Sardinia and by Russia, and under it Russia bound herself to certain conditions in the Black Sea; but when France was prostrated at the feet of Germany in 1870, Russia then thought it would be a good time to repudiate the treaty. She has done so. I say, therefore, it is all very well for us to assert that the treaty laid down such and such conditions, and, therefore, to the end of time, we are bound by them. Nations—it may be a matter of bad faith—need not do so; the precedent of violating treaties has been set, and being set it has been practically copied by our neighbors. It, therefore, was not wise for us to stand up and demand the full requirements of the treaty, like Shylock, but rather to obtain the best interpretation we could and satisfy the reasonable views of the Americans, so long as they were not seriously to our injury. I conceive that while the treaty does not fully satisfy either party, neither has strong reason to complain. It was charged against the Government time and again that they should have arrived at some reasonable understanding in regard to this matter some years ago. If it was wrong for them not to arrive at a reasonable understanding then, surely it is right to have arrived at a reasonable one now, on the principle at all events that it is better late than ever, but at the same time the Minister of Finance has shown good reasons why this was not done, and I believe the majority of the people, judging from the expressions used throughout the country, are prepared to endorse the view that he expressed, that the opportunity was not offered until lately, and that at the earliest possible moment our Government and the British Government availed themselves of the opportunity, with the result that we now know. I think it is all very well to say that the treaty is only a concession to secure the peace of the Empire. I think the Empire has a certain claim upon us and is interested in our keeping on good terms with our neighbors. The country from which we spring, the country that furnishes an army and navy to work with ours and that enforces our treaties and supports them is worthy of some consideration, and this reasonable and modern interpretation of the Treaty of 1818 has placed us in a position that, even if the United States Senate should refuse to ratify this treaty, we have the distinct pledge and guaranteed support of the mother country to enforce our contentions and enforce our rights. There is one further point on which I should like to touch; it is that dwelt on by the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Eisenhauer) and it is a matter worthy of consideration. The modus vivendi is to be introduced under a system by which a license is to be paid by the United States vessels for certain privileges, which are to be granted to them free when our fish can go in free to the United States. Until the United States vessels are taxed on the one hand, practically a bounty is given to them in the shape of the duty when they carry their fares back to port. They benefit and our vessels suffer to that extent—they are in a worse position by the amount of the bounty. The contention of the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Eisenhauer) is a most reasonable one, and I hope the matter may receive the consideration of the Government. It is not a matter in connection with the treaty but a matter of municipal regulation, and the suggestion is that the amount of the licenses paid by the United States vessels shall go for the benefit of our fishermen, so as to compensate them in some degree for the duty that is charged on their fish going into the United States, so as to place them on an equal footing with those who fish on the same banks and carry, to a large extent, their fish to the same markets, but who have the advantage of that bounty in their favor. Under all these circumstances I feel, all things considered, that while we have made concessions to the United States, which I think will meet their reasonable requirements, I do not think our fishermen have suffered to any serious extent, and therefore, I feel it to be my duty as representing a fishing constituency to support and vote for this treaty.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, I feel that on rising to address the House on this occasion I am speaking on perhaps one of the most important subjects that has ever occupied the attention of this colonial legislature since the Dominion was formed. It is not too much to say that perhaps no question has ever come before us which has caused so much agitation, so much public attention on the part of Her Majesty's Ministers at home and so much trouble and interest to Her Majesty's Ministers in the colonies as this fishery question. And, Sir, I am more than pleased to find that the gentlemen who have spoken upon that question on both sides of the House have spoken on it as I believe free from any influences of party politics and in a manner to show that we are prepared to approach the consideration of it and to continue the discussion of it in the same spirit. Sir, I listened with great attention to the very able and eloquent speech of the hon. the Finance Minister, and while I have always admired that gentleman's ability, and acuteness, and dignity and eloquence, perhaps on no occasion has he ever presented a case to the House in which a bad case was so well put as that put by the hon. gentleman on Tuesday last. Sir, I listened to him with great attention when he asked this House to believe that the Government of which he was a member and the commission of which he was one of the representatives of England, in securing this treaty had performed a feat which would command the admiration of Canada, and enure to the benefit of her people. Sir, on these points I differ with him, but though I may differ with him in relation to the praise that he takes for the Commission and the laudation which he gave to gentlemen connected with it on the British side, and to the conclusions at which he arrived in reference to the benefits it would be to this country I must say that, looking at it, and looking at it in the consequences which the perpetuation of peace with our great neighbors on the south will bring about, although I look at the treaty as perfectly giving away the interests of Canada in almost every particular, I must tell this House that "give away" as it is and whatever the consequences of it may be, we have got to confirm and to carry out the treaty. We have got to do that, Sir, not because it is a just or a fair treaty to Canada, which it is not, and before I sit down I think I will be able if not to satisfy gentlemen on that side of the House I will be able at all events to induce the hon. the Minister of Finance to say that he certainly has colored the advantages which he alleged Canada would receive rather too highly. I speak now not for the purpose of opposing the treaty but I speak for the purpose of putting the case of Canada fairly before this House and before the country. I do it not for the purpose of obstruction, or bringing into disrepute the efforts of the hon. gentleman whose work during that long and tedious negotiation of three months in Washington, I have no doubt was in the best interests as he conceived of the country which he served. I speak, Sir, for the purpose of placing that gentleman and the Government he represents on this side of the water, and the Government on the other side of the water that accredited him to Washington in the position which I think they ought to be in, and to show that the credit they assume to adopt, for having accomplished the conclusion of a difficult question is not of that creditable character to them which the hon. gentleman assumes it is. Sir, these gentlemen believe that in accomplishing peace at any price they have accomplished a benefit for the country. Well, Sir, they have. Peace at any price is an advantage to Canada in her position in relation to our great neighbors to the south. Peace at any price is an advantage to Canada in the situation in which we are placed and in consideration of the way we have been deserted by Her Majesty's Ministers in England and by that British Government which the hon. gentleman has stated to us when he spoke the other day when he said: That when we appear at a commission or a convention or a public assembly of any kind our weight and our influence is measured by the power that is behind us, and I sitting at that commission in Washington as the representative of the greatest Empire in the world, felt that my statements and words carried with them a weight which I could not have assumed nor could have carried had I been simply a representative of Canada. Perhaps in some cases the hon. gentleman might be right. It is an advantage when we appear in a representative character to have power and influence behind us, to have a moral and material weight that can carry out our wishes or that can enforce our wishes with power if it is necessary, or with that moral weight which it is always desirable to have. But, Sir, when that moral power and that moral weight is simply a name, as it has been for forty years past, then, Sir, I think it is of little use to a man sent to represent the interests of a country like Canada, and is it not a consideration. That is the position which I assume, and before I will sit down I think I will satisfy my hon. friend and the gentlemen who sit beside him, as well as gentlemen on this side of the House, that I am right. In making that statement I am making a statement which the records of the last fifty years will sustain, and, Sir, when I come to that part of my speech, or rather my explanation, because I will not call it a speech, I will ask the forbearance of this House if I have to delay for some time, perhaps it may be too long in reading authorities with regard to the statement I am making that the record of the last forty years has been an British desertion of the interests of her brightest and greatest colony. My hon. friend devoted a great part of his time to laudation of the gentlemen with whom he was associated. With that I will not pretend to find much fault, but I will say this with relation to Mr. Chamberlain, whom the hon. gentleman said: No man in England could have been selected more fit to represent England and to secure the interests of Canada at Washington than the Hon. Joseph Chamberlain. That Mr. Chamberlain is an able and a clever man no one will deny. That he occupies a prominent position in the political life of England is true, that he may have rendered services to the country of his birth and of his occupation is also true, but, Sir, when he was selected to come out and to represent Canadian interests—or rather nominally English interests, but practically Canadian interests—at Washington, I differ with my hon. friend when he says that the selection was a good one, and that no more fitting man could have been selected to occupy that position. Sir, surely Mr. Chamberlain showed before he left England that he wanted and lacked that discretion which a statesman should possess. At a public meeting shortly before he left England he boasted of the position he was going to occupy and said that he was going out and that he would conclude a treaty and he particularly referred to the claims which had been made and which could not and ought not be sustained. Sir, what would you think of a juryman going on a jury to try a man for his life, who told us before he went on that jury that he knew the man was guilty. Suppose you appointed a person as arbitrator what would you think of a man stating before he went on there that he was going to give a verdict against you. That is the position of Mr. Chamberlain. But there is another objection to Mr. Chamberlain and I think it is a subject of regret, because of it, that he was appointed. We know, Sir, that there is a very powerful section of the British Empire who have a great cause of grievance against the whole country. We know in Ireland where the people have been striving and struggling, whether rightly or wrongly—I believe rightly myself whatever difference of opinion there may be about that—I say whether rightly or wrongly they have been struggling for privileges which have been denied them, and Mr. Chamberlain has been one of those men who have taken a strong part against those national aspirations of the Irish people. Sir, when we look at the United States and find the composite character of its population, when we find the large number of seven or eight millions, if not more, of Irishmen and their descendants who are in that country and wherever Irishmen are you find them occupying prominent positions in the executive of the country, in the legislative halls and in the administration of the public affairs. Will anyone tell me if we desire to get that treaty passed—if it is a desirable treaty to pass—that the fact that Mr. Joseph Chamberlain was appointed to come out to endeavor to secure the treaty was calculated to recommend him to that important and influential class of people in America who have something to say about the passage of this treaty before the Senate? Sir, my impression is that Mr. Chamberlain made a mistake in his utterances, and my impression is that the British Government made a mistake on the part of Canada in selecting Mr. Chamberlain for the position. Perhaps I might have said nothing about that were it not that my hon. friend, with a generous desire to speak friendly of the men with whom he has been associated, felt it necessary to give Mr. Chamberlain an amount of laudation and credit to which I have grave doubts about his being entitled. That is my justification for referring to him; and had the hon. gentleman not brought before this House Mr. Chamberlain's public services, his great ability, and his fitness for the position, and praised the Government who selected him, I should not have felt it necessary to refer to him in the way I have done. With regard to Sir Sackville West, I believe him to be a very respectable man. He also came in for a considerable degree of praise and laudation from the hon. gentleman. We know that in his association with other men, the great talents and abilities of our friend the hon. Minister of Finance command attention and respect. We know that Sir Sackville West is and has been all his life an employé in the diplomatic service of the British Government, and we know that his object is to serve the British Government. Serve Canada! What cares Sir Sackville West for Canada? What cares Mr. Joseph Chamberlain for Canada? What they desire to secure is the commendation of England and the English Government. That is the thing they have aimed at, and that is the thing they have obtained by this treaty. Sir, my hon. friend, in his speech of Tuesday last, gave a historical account of the fishery question for the past one hundred years. He pointed out what the arrangements were under the Treaty of 1783; then he came to the Treaty of Ghent; then he came to the convention of 1818; and he went on to tell us that the British Government had for the last forty years abandoned the view they had entertained as to the construction of the Treaty of Ghent for the previous forty years. The hon. gentleman noticed me shaking my head when he made that statement because I knew it was not true. I do not mean to impute wilful misstatements to the hon. gentleman. I would be sorry to do that, and if anything I say would seem to have that bearing, I know he will believe that I would not desire in the least to doubt his word, or suppose that he would make a statement to this House which he knew to be incorrect. But, Sir, I have been identified with this fishery question. Seven years of my life I spent in working it up. When I took it in hand the British Government was about to desert us; and for seven years my efforts were directed to trying to keep those men on the other side of the water, in the British Foreign Office and in the Colonial Office, up to their work, and preventing them from sacrificing and deserting Canada. Sir, I am making bold statements, but I will prove them before I sit down. The hon. gentleman next referred to the Treaty of 1854, effected by Lord Elgin, and he pointed out the great advantages which we had derived from that treaty, and I entirely agree with him. I believe that that treaty was the first entering wedge of free commercial intercourse between Canada and the United States. During the twelve years that that treaty lasted, to 1866, more real commercial progress and prosperity were developed in Canada, more farming industries were created, more mechanical employments were given to our people, than they had at any period up to that time. Sir, it was a matter of regret, not alone to the people of one section of this country—for we were then a number of isolated Provinces—Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and British Columbia, with separate Governments, and old Canada united—but every Province sharing in the benefits of that treaty, regretted its abrogation at the instance of the American Government. Sir, the hon. gentleman stated rightly that efforts were made by the several Governments to bring about a renewal of that treaty. Their efforts failed, I am sorry to say. Neither one party nor the other of the political parties in this country was to blame for that failure. It arose from the fact, as the hon. gentleman rightly stated, that an unfounded prejudice existed, whether rightly or wrongly, based on the belief that we had favored the southern portion of the United States in the internecine struggle which had been carried on in that country for six or seven years. Whether we did or did not may be a matter of opinion, but my hon. friend's statement was correct, I have no doubt, that a very large portion of the people of this country sympathised with the North, because for one man who was found in the Southern army, six or seven or eight were to be found in the Northern. At any rate, the treaty was repealed, and the United States Government refused to renew it; and when Mr. George Brown and Mr. Justice Henry, who I am sorry is so low to-night —

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). Better.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am glad to hear it, for the country can ill spare a man like him, who has taken such a prominent part in this country, both in his political and judicial capacity. When he was sent from Nova Scotia and Sir Albert Smith from New Brunswick and the gentlemen from Canada went to Washington and failed to obtain a renewal of the Treaty in 1866, it was a matter of great regret in all the Provinces. Those who remember the history of Canada will remember the position the country was in at that time. Old Canada was so torn with political dissensions that there was scarcely a Government that could last a week with any degree of certainty. We found one of the old Provinces struggling against another, and it was then that the idea struck the right hon. gentleman at the head of the Government and a number of hon. gentlemen connected with him, to form a confederation of British America. Sir, we did form it, and I am proud to say that I took some part in its formation. As the Premier of my own Province, after one defeat I was successful in bringing the Province into line and inducing it to enter the Confederation. When I came here and took the position of Minister of Marine and Fisheries, what did I find? I found that those gentlemen, in 1866, the year before we came here, had protested against the efforts of the British Government to induce us to allow the Americans to come in and occupy our fisheries for a year. I will say for the Government of that day that they wrote a most pungent dispatch, in which, although requested by the British Government, they refused to allow the Americans to come in and occupy our fisheries as they had done under the treaty. They communicated with the Governments of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, and those Governments, out of deference to the wishes expressed by the British Ministers, consented, as did the Government of Canada, to an arrangement for allowing the Americans to come in on paying a tax of half a dollar a ton. That arrangement was come to in response to a dispatch of Sir Edward Cardwell, then Colonial Minister. That despatch can be found in a return brought down in response to a motion made by Mr. Blake in 1872. Sir Edward Cardwell urged the Government of the Provinces to permit the Americans to occupy the fisheries on the same terms as they did before, stating that if they would consent to that, before the year was out some new arrangement would be made. We did it, the several Provinces did it, and before the term came around again in 1867, we had formed Confederation, and the duty was imposed upon me of creating the Department of Marine and Fisheries. I did create that department, and I think that I can appeal with satisfaction to the House and to the people generally to say whether, during my record of seven and a-half years, I did not perform my duty faithfully and effectively. When, Sir, in 1867, we were appealed to again renew the arrangement, I was called upon to enquire into and make a report on the matter, and I did make a report which is contained in the public records of this Parliament. In that report, I recommended an increase of duty and consented to a continuance of the arrangement, but only for one year more. That year passed away. The number of vessels the first year was considerably larger than the second and when we were applied the third year to allow the Americans to fish, we resented the application. We increased the duty, but consented only to put it on for one year more. Before that year was finished, I found that the British Government had again weakened and when I studied up the history of the question for the previous sixty or seventy years, I found that while the British Government had strictly enforced the headland question and the exclusion of Americans from the bays, and protected our inshore fisheries, about which there was never a dispute, for forty years after the Treaty of 1818 was made, yet, when in 1854 the Elgin Treaty was made, our exclusive rights over these fisheries were suspended during its existence, for twelve years, and the Americans were permitted to go in and participate in the fisheries under that treaty while it lasted. But when that treaty expired, in 1866, England resumed the protection of the fisheries of Canada and enforced the Treaty of 1818, as she had done up to the period of the Elgin Treaty, when our exclusive rights were given up. In place however of defending the position of Canada, as she had done for the previous forty years, we found that she weakened, and a large amount of correspondence had to be carried on to stiffen the British Ministers, but while occasionally they would stiffen, they would weaken again. When the hon. the Minister of Finance taunted me with the fact that we had not carried out our first instructions, he knew the reason, and I am surprised he did not do me the justice of explaining that it was under instructions from the British Government that I had issued my orders to carry out the instructions of Sir Edward Cardwell. Under this pressure, we had to recall our first instructions and to limit the exclusion to bays six miles in width instead of ten miles. From that time, my efforts commenced; and let anyone refer to the volumes of sessional papers in the library and read over the efforts that were made during those seven years to protect the interests of Canada, and he will see, at all events, that the Government of that day did their duty by Canada, and insisted upon the British Government not abandoning their rights. I will not pass this stage without paying a tribute to the right hon. the leader of the Government, for whatever may have been my feelings about him of later years, in those days, at least, he stood out for the interests of the country that he governed; and in every instance, without one single deviation, he took my part in my efforts to bring the Colonial and Foreign Ministers of England, who were both weakening in the interests of Canada, to their senses, and we did bring them to their senses pretty well. What came next? In 1870, a crisis arose in relation to the fishery question. It was evident to every one in the Cabinet and out of it that the British Government were weakening in sustaining our claims. First, in 1866, they asked us to allow the Americans to come in for one year; then they asked us to allow them to come in for another year; and then, in 1868, for another year; and in 1869, at last, a little rebellion of a mental character arose in the minds of some of us at least. It became my duty to deal with that question, and I did deal with it. But before discussing this point, I may ask the permission of this House to read in reply to the statement of the hon. gentleman my report, because his remarks imply nothing less than that I went back on my report and the position I assumed when I issued the orders and circulars to the marine police which I had organised. In that report, I will prove that the statement of the hon. gentleman that the British Government had stood by Canada was not correct.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My hon. friend has entirely misapprehended my whole argument, and my reference to himself. He has not only misapprehended my argument, but he has completely inverted the argument, and I will ask any gentleman who has looked at the verbatim report of my speech, if my argument is not this, that while Her Majesty's Government had technically always sustained the extreme headland extension, and the exclusion of the American fishermen from our bays, they had refused to sustain my hon. friend in his efforts to shut the American fishermen out of bays that are not less than ten miles in width. My argument was the reverse of what my hon. friend says it was. I showed that he had made that effort. I read his instructions to the House in which he had upheld the ten-mile limit and gave his instructions to that effect to the cruisers, and I read Lord Granville's despatch not to carry out those instructions, but to limit the exclusion to the three-mile limit. I showed that my hon. friend had been obliged, under the pressure of Her Majesty's Government, who would not support the larger contention, to issue further instructions in accordance with the expressed request of Lord Durham.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will read exactly what the hon. gentleman did say.

"I will now, Sir, proceed to deal with the subject of the treaty itself, and I take up first the most important question, that of delimitation. I need not tell you that that is a question which for seventy years has been an open sore. It is a question, which from the day the Treaty of 1818 was signed down to the present hour, as my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) knows, has been a most fertile cause of discussion between the United States and Great Britain and Canada. The Americans have maintained from the very outset that what we termed our exclusive right to shut them out of all bays was not well founded in the treaty."

That is not correct.

"They have maintained for seventy years that they had an indefeasible right under that treaty to approach within three miles of the shore of any bay or indentation. My hon. friend shakes his head; but I hold in my hand authorities, and I could give them to him by the score, in which they have again and again maintained that position, and demanded that right."

"Mr. MITCHELL. Did not Great Britain for forty years enforce her construction of that Treaty of 1818?"

"Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I can only say that nobody knows better than my hon. friend that Great Britain induced him to recall his regulations and instructions."

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

M. MITCHELL—

"After he had issued them, and restricted his jurisdiction to within three miles of the shore."

"Mr. MITCHELL. And why? Because Great Britain could control the Government of this country, and I had to do it; that is why."

"Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Never mind. My hon. friend's enquiry was as to the position of Great Britain, and I give it to him. Great Britain has always contended, and has rightly contended, for technical exclusion from any bay."

What I contend is that there was no technical exclusion for the first forty years, but there was an actual exclusion up to the year 1854 when the Elgin Treaty put our rights in suspense. That is what I contend and what I will prove before I am through.

"And the Crown officers of England have sustained that contention. But my hon. friend knows that it is one thing to hold a technical construction, and it is another to undertake to enforce it."

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. MITCHELL. My hon. friend has interjected that word "technical" into this discussion. I have never found any such word in any of the correspondence or the despatches, which I have read and studied, and which I think I understand pretty well, during the seven years of my experience in that department, and for the previous forty years down to 1854.

"Mr. MITCHELL. Will the hon. gentleman let me put one question to him? He states that Great Britain has held a technical construction of the Treaty of 1818. I would say that Great Britain has effectually enforced her technical construction for forty years. And with reference to what the hon. gentleman says about exclusion from bays, the first decision was given in reference to the Bay of Fundy, where the headland on one side was American and the headland on the other was Canadian or Nova Scotian. That was the first give away of our treaty rights."

"Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My hon. friend then means that for the first forty years Great Britain held a particular view which she has abandoned for the last forty years."

The House will see how the hon. gentleman, with that astuteness which characterises all his debates in this House, and, for anything I know, in other places, twists my words and puts a construction on my utterances which they would not bear. I do not say that he does that deliberately, but it is the diplomatic construction which he has learned in the last few years; and I may say that I congratulate him on the improvement in his treatment of public men, on there being less of the heavy attack and more of the suaviter in modo than there was before he took his residence in London and associated with peeresses and lords and kings and princes.

"Mr. MITCHELL. I do not mean that."

You see he would try to get that forced upon me.

"I do not mean that. I will say what I mean if the hon. gentleman will let me. I say that for the first forty years Great Britain legitimately enforced that contention and the Americans recognised it."

And I will prove that too.

"Under the decision in the case of the Bay of Fundy, one side of which was American and the other side Nova Scotian, it was held that that bay was not exclusively an English bay, and upon the decision in that case our rights were given away and suspended by England, and were not enforced as strictly as they had been before."

And he closed the discussion there, and I submitted.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My hon. friend has just stopped exactly where he should begin. I said, referring to the Department of Marine and Fisheries, that:

"From the time it was organised under his charge he showed the greatest possible determination to hold on to all that he had, and to get as much as he could in the interests of Canada."

Was that charging my hon. friend with surrendering anything? It was the very reverse.

"Now, I will draw the attention of my hon. friend and the House to the fact that, actuated by that motive, in 1870, he sent out the following instructions:

"In such capacity your jurisdiction must be strictly confined within the limit of three marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks or harbors of Canada, with respect to any action you may take against American fishing vessels and the United States citizens engaged in fishing."

"Mr. MITCHELL. Under instructions from England."

"Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No. This is before the pressure, as the hon. gentleman will see, but he went on trying to get in the thin end of another wedge, and I commend his attempt. He said:

"Where any of the bays, creeks or harbors shall not exceed ten geographical miles in width, you will consider that the line of demarcation extends from headland to headland, either at the entrance of such bay, creek or harbor, or from and between given points on both sides thereof, at any place nearest the mouth, where the shores are less than ten miles apart; and may exclude foreign fishermen and fishing vessels therefrom, or seize, if found within three marine miles of the coast."

"Then he went on to give the jurisdiction and the action that should be taken under it; and the bays from which he instructed his officers to exclude American fishing vessels are those ten miles in width. What since? We have a despatch from Lord Granville to the Governor General:

"Her Majesty's Government hopes that the United States fishermen will not be for the present prevented from fishing except within three miles from land or in bays which are less than six miles broad at the mouth."

"That is the answer to the instructions. My hon. friend, I grant you, was under compulsion; he was, I grant you, under pressure from Her Majesty's Government; but that only makes the case stronger from my standpoint, and my standpoint is that in the position we occupy, dependent upon Her Majesty's Government"

So I very reluctantly interrupted him in order to show that, instead of attacking the hon. gentleman for not having discharged his duty, I really commended him for attempting to carry out as far as he was able what we all thought were the rights of Canada, and I quoted the despatch of Lord Granville to show that it was under pressure from the Imperial Government that my hon. friend was not able to carry out his own views and wishes. I thought I ought to correct the erroneous impression which he had formed in regard to my remarks.

Mr. MITCHELL. And my hon. friend wound up that portion of his argument by saying that the terms we had obtained at Washington were better than those obtained before. Since there is a difference of opinion between my hon. friend and myself as to the attitude of the British Government on this matter, I will proceed, with the permission of the House, to prove it. I hold in my hand a State paper which has formed part of the records of this House. It was brought down three years ago in answer to a motion for all papers connected with the Washington Treaty, which had not been brought down on Mr. Blake's motion, and this is one of them. I may say that I prepared this paper with great care, and there is not a statement of the greatest humiliation that England could show in the treatment of her greatest colony. If the House will bear with me, I will read it, though it is rather long. It is dated, Department of Marine and Fisheries, 4th July, 1870. And I may say that, of all the British statesmen I have had to correspond with, I never found one of them so weak in the back as Lord Granville. I may also say that I dated that paper on the 4th July on purpose, for the signification of the date, so that they might understand it.

"The undersigned had referred to him for report, a despatch from Lord Granville to the Governor General, under date the 6th ultimo, having reference to the instructions given to British and Canadian vessels for the protection of the fisheries, and also to instructions from the Colonial Office of 30th April last, extending the privileges of American fishermen beyond what they previously enjoyed, permitting them to enter bays not less than six miles wide, and directing that no vessel should be seized unless actually taken within three miles of shore, or within a six-mile bay, as stated therein; appended to which is a memorandum from the Governor General, under date of 22nd June, informing the Council that it is indispensable that the instructions issued to Canadian cruisers should be brought into complete conformity with the latest instructions on the subject, issued by the Admiralty to Vice-Admiral Wellesley.

"The undersigned has the honor to report that the instructions to Canadian cruisers were amended on the 27th ultimo, as requested by Lord Granville.

"It would appear that Lord Granville contemplated by the despatch to convey—

"1st. That his telegram and despatch of the 30th April, were intended to modify the Colonial Office instructions of 12th April, 1866, while the Council construed it as being required to be read in connection therewith, and they did not imagine that such an important concession of the rights of our fishermen, would have been made without consultation with, and the previous approval of the Canadian Government.

"2nd. That though the instructions from the Admiralty to the officers in command of ships of war employed in the protection of the fisheries, and from the Canadian Government to their officers similarly situated since April, 1866, which prohibited foreign fishermen from entering bays less than ten miles wide at the mouth, and which instructions suggested that the forfeiture of such vessels was, if possible, only to be enforced when fishing had taken place within three miles of shore; yet, notwithstanding the instructions, His Lordship now, for the first time, communicates to the Canadian Government the fact that it never was intended to be acted upon.

"3rd. That if any doubt existed about the meaning of the instructions, or the possible chances of a trespasser being taken by Her Majesty's cruisers, that doubt is now removed, inasmuch as his lordship intimates that it never was the intention of Her Majesty's Government that their vessels should seize a trespasser under any circumstances, and for fear of such a possibility his lordship now removes all chance of it by stating that 'the effect of my despatch, or rather of the letter of the Admiralty, which, it transmitted for the concurrence of your Government was, as regards Her Majesty's vessels, to make the direction of non-forfeiture so far absolute, as to require that no fishing vessel whatever should be seized, except within three miles, and for an offence committed within those limits. It was intended to imply, though it was not expressed, that as the only ultimate means of excluding Americans beyond these limits was not to be used, the exclusion itself was not to be enforced.

Mr. MITCHELL.

"The Canadian Government, by the approved report of the undersigned, of the 20th December last, was pledged to Her Majesty's Government to maintain an efficient marine police to enforce the law within the three-mile limit, in the belief that Her Majesty's Government would command respect to national rights outside thereof, and to which this Government conceived them to be pledged, as Dominion vessels, by the limitation of the exclusion of foreign vessels to bays from ten to six miles wide, are precluded from, in any case, seizing beyond three miles, and as British cruisers are now positively directed not to seize unless the offence is committed and the vessel actually seized within three miles of land, the reasonable presumption is that Her Majesty's cruisers are not intended to seize at all. As a matter of fact, they did not seize a single trespasser in the past four years. It will also appear, on reference to the reports of the commanders of Her Majesty's vessels on the station, that though they repeatedly boarded vessels within the three-mile limit, which vessels had no license, and were liable to seizure, there is no instance of a single seizure having been made."

There it is as clear as day that they are determined to abandon the whole thing, but the three-mile limit abandoned the head line question, abandon our bay, abandon everything but the strip of three miles around the sinuosities of our coast.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. MITCHELL. You will not say "hear, hear" pretty soon.

"It would seem but reasonable, that if that policy as laid down, is to be maintained, and acted upon, that our fishermen who have had actual possession of the privileges referred to up to 1854, and who again by the lapse of the Reciprocity Treaty in 1866, were entitled to the same rights they enjoyed in 1854, should be maintained in their possession of all these privileges.

"7th. The despatch further remarks, that 'they (Her Majesty's Government) do not abandon the hope that the question of abstract right may yet be avoided by some arrangement between Canada and the United States, or that the limits may be definitely settled by arbitration or otherwise, and while any expectation of this kind exists, they desire to avoid all occasion of dispute, so far as this is possible consistently with the substantial protection of the Canadian fisheries.'

"In this paragraph there are two probabilities referred to:

"1st. The probability of an arrangement (trade arrangement, it is presumed) with the United States.

"2nd. The probability of the limits being fixed by arbitration, or otherwise.

"In reference to the first of these, it would have been much more satisfactory to the Government of Canada if the ground upon which Her Majesty's Government have founded the hope thus expressed, had been stated. Such hope entertained by Her Majesty's Ministers, has been held since 1855; it was believed in by Her Majesty's Government when Lord Clarendon wrote the despatch of 1866, which so ably indicated the position of British subjects in relation to these fisheries. Mr. Cardwell expressed a confident belief upon this subject when he induced Canada to adopt his licensing system, as a measure of expediency, for one year. His Grace of Buckingham and Chandos entertained the same hope; and now my Lord Granville, though five years have elapsed since notice of abolition, does not seem yet to have abandoned the hope that some arrangements may be secured.

"The Canadian Government regret that they cannot see either in the past or in the future, the same ground for believing that a satisfactory arrangement will be arrived at, nor, indeed, while the present fishery policy is maintained, any arrangement that Canada would be justified in accepting. On the contrary, it is believed that the chances of such a result are not so good as they seemed in 1866 and 1867; and that, so far from there being anything in the course taken by the United States to warrant the expectation of a fair trade policy being adopted by them, everything indicates the contrary result, and nothing tends more to encourage Americans in the course they have pursued than the spirit of concession towards them which has characterised the fishery policy of the last five years.

"In 1866 they, after a year's notice, voluntarily abandoned the Reciprocity Treaty, notwithstanding our efforts in the fall of 1865 to prevent that result."

"To do this, the undersigned would state our rights, as claimed by the Empire, and admitted by the United States in the Treaty of 1818, and also what were the rights of United States fishermen at the time the treaty was concluded.

"Article I of that treaty provided,—

"1st. Concurrent liberty of fishing within certain specified limits between the subjects of Her Majesty and those of the United States, subject to certain specified reservations.

"2nd. The privilege to American subjects to land, dry and cure fish in certain districts, also subject to certain qualifications.

"3rd. Limits reserved exclusively to subjects of Her Majesty, and comprised within bounds of a marine league from the coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks—the line of exclusion and measurement on the three classes of indentations last above mentioned, being defined by straight lines drawn across from headland to headland.

"It may be stated that upon the construction of Nos 1 and 2, no serious differences of opinion exist.

"Regarding the interpretation of No. 3, the American Government advances peculiar claims,—the most important of which is the basis of measurement on the mouths of bays, creeks and harbors. This line of demarcation between exclusive and common water, the United States contend—as in the tracing of the general coast line three marine miles from land—should at all bays continue to describe the outline of the shores of these indentations as if they were sinuosities of the coast.

"This is in brief the main point involved in the dispute known as 'The Fishery Question.'

"Other minor differences, more or less tributary to this, have entered into the discussion, but this substantially includes the only disputable ground of the controversy.

"The argument of Great Britain on this point is twofold:—

"1st. That the accepted definition of bays, harbors, and creeks is that established by international law throughout the civilised world, which distinctly adopts a headland line, irrespective of the configuration of any part of the coast, or the formation or extent of its indentations.

"2nd. That the territorial and maritime jurisdiction of all nations, and particularly of the United States, is so clearly laid down as not to admit of any exceptional application such as that claimed in connection with these fishing privileges in British America, in derogation of national rights.

"Moreover, Great Britain maintains that in the article of the Convention of 1818, Americans expressly relinquished the liberty before 'enjoyed' or 'claimed,' to pursue their calling anywhere else within British jurisdiction than in the limits described in the treaty. The text thereof being as follows:—

I need not read the text because you understand it.

"The Americans have, up to 1854, persisted in arguing for an exceptional application of the law of nations, as regards bodies of water, such as the Bays of Fundy and Chaleurs, and other indentations along the sea-coast of the British North American colonies, in which United States fishermen were formerly wont to pursue and capture the fishes of the sea, or to which they still resort to take bait.

"Yet, while they desired exceptional construction of treaties, and were especially as applied to the Bays of Fundy and Chaleurs, their statesmen had to admit that the right of exclusion as claimed by us, existed. Secretary Webster, 6th July, 1852, writes thus:—

"It would appear that by a strict and rigid construction of this article, fishing vessels of the United States are precluded from entering into the bays or harbors of the British provinces, except for the purposes of shelter, repairing damages, and obtaining wood and water. A bay, as is usually understood, is an arm or recess of the sea, entering from the ocean between capes and headlands, and the term is applied equally to large and small tracts of water thus situated; it is common to speak of Hudson Bay, or the Bay of Biscay, although they are very large tracts of water.

"The British authorities insist that England has a right to draw a line from headland to headland, and to capture all American fishermen who may follow their pursuits inside of that line."

And for 40 years they did it, and captured lots of them.

"It was undoubtedly an oversight—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. MITCHELL:

"It was undoubtedly an oversight in the Convention of 1818 to make so large a concession to England, since the United States had usually considered that those vast inlets or recesses of the ocean ought to be open to American fishermen as freely as the sea itself, to within three marine miles of the shore.

"Again, Chancellor Kent, in his able commentaries, lays down as a rule that bays, such as Delaware Bay (resembling in its characteristics and extent the Bay of Chaleurs) is wholly within the 'territorial jurisdiction' of the United States, while the States of New Jersey and Delaware each exercise jurisdiction to its centre, and for three miles seaward, from Capes May and Henlopen. The same rule applies to Chesapeake Bay, and the State of Maryland exercises jurisdiction over that tract of water, which is more than double the extent of Bay des Chaleurs. The same rule is applied to Massachusetts Bay, with an entrance fifty miles wide between Cape Ann and Cape Cod; indeed, the principle is applied in the United States universally, and however much American statesmen may regret the application of the rule on the bays of this Dominion, they cannot deny its strict justice, nor their own renunciation of all claim to admission by the 1st article of the Treaty of 1818. Yet from that time up to 1854 the fishermen of the United States accepted the fact reluctantly, and frequently infringed within our limits when they thought they could do so with impunity; but the British Government enforced our treaty rights, including the headland claims, up to 1854, with the exception of the Bay of Fundy, in reference to which they made special exception of a temporary character in 1845."

On that I will just explain as I go along. Why was the Bay of Fundy temporarily excluded? Sir, history repeats itself. The men of that day, the men in charge of the fleet of the British Government, had no other means to protect the fisheries. These were the men who enforced the treaty, the fishery rights; and these men seized the schooner Washington in the Bay of Fundy, but they were not able to show, when the vessel was before the courts that she was within the points of land of the Bay of Fundy where it was British territory on both sides, as the Americans claimed that one of the points of land, which was outside of a line near Calais, was on the American territory and the other was on British territory, and upon that ground the vessel was discharged. Lord Aberdeen, then Colonial Minister, because that decision was made in a case which was not a parallel case to 99 out of every 100 cases that now occur, abandoned the whole Bay of Fundy to them, out of a desire to conciliate the Americans. Sir, there is a case of to-day. The Adams was seized upon a frivolous pretext, and she is now on trial before the courts; and though my hon. friend says that the delay is not entirely due to the Government, I venture to say that some of it is due to the Government. I am not in the secrets of the Government and do not know, but I know enough of American fishermen and vessel owners to know that they will not willingly allow one of their vessels to be tied up in the courts for a couple of years, without some good reason. The Bay of Fundy case was a weak case. It was a case that would not hold water, because one side of the bay was on a line with the headland, and the other was considerably outside that line, and the courts held that it was not exclusively a British bay for that reason. But had the vessel been seized ten miles further or five miles further this decision about the Bay of Fundy would never have been had, and the probability is that this trouble about bays never would have reached the point it has reached. Lord Aberdeen abandoned the right of the colonies of the Maritime Provinces and gave up the question of the Bay of Fundy altogether, with the exception of the smaller inlets or bays leading into it. I will proceed:

"It may also be here stated that the Province of Nova Scotia supplemented the British squadron by several vessels during the years preceding 1845, and that during that time many seizures of American vessels were made at points ranging from near the shore to a distance of upwards of ten miles from land, on the ground that they were within headlands, many of which vessels were condemned and confiscated for such violation of our rights. In State documents, No. 22, published in the American Senate in 1862-63, I find the following fact reported by the United States Consul at Pictou, viz.:—

"The seizures in the course of the year were numerous. The Java, Battille, Mayflower, Charles, Eliza, Shitland, Hyder Ali, Independence, Hart, Ocean, Director, Atlas, Magnolia, Amazon, and Three Brothers were among the number."

"The Reciprocity Treaty of 1854 gave to the Americans the use, under certain restrictions, of our bay and inshore fisheries, and for which we were supposed to have received compensation by certain trade arrangements. This treaty the United States Government put an end to of their own act, professing to believe that it was more to the advantage of the colonies than their own. Doubtless the treaty, during its continuance, was beneficial to both countries, but it was not in Nova Scotia considered that they had received the equivalent in trade for what they correctly designated as 'their priceless fisheries.' See Minute of Council of that Province, 10th April, 1884, as follows:—

"At the same time it is proper that the undersigned should take this opportunity to express the unusual sentiment pervading this Province, that, in the construction of that treaty, fair consideration was not given to the interests whose inexhaustible fisheries of priceless value were given away without the coasting trade, or the right to register colonial-built shipping, having been secured in return to those British American Provinces."

"The treaty terminated in March, 1866, after the year's notice for which it provided had been given by the United States Government. The then Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, with the approval of Her Majesty's Government, sent delegates to Washington, to endeavor, if possible, to secure the continuance of the treaty, or else to effect some other arrangement which would meet the approval of both countries. In this they were unsuccessful. The delegation held several conferences with the Committee of Ways and Means, and the record of their proceedings proves that, there was really no desire evinced to renew commercial intercourse with the Provinces on any basis at all resembling the principles of reciprocal free trade. The efforts of our delegates proved fruitless, and they returned about the middle of February, 1866. On the 2nd of that month a Royal Proclamation was issued by the Governor General of Canada, notifying American fishermen and United States citizens of the termination, on the 17th day of the ensuing month, of the fishing privileges which they had enjoyed under the said treaty, and warning them of the legal penalties which they would incur by trespassing upon the inshore fisheries of British America belonging exclusively to Her Majesty's subjects. In the meantime, Her Majesty's Government, in despatches of the 3rd and 10th of March, 1866, urged upon these Provinces that it was desirable, from an Imperial point of view, to forbear from asserting the rights which recurred to them at its termination, and to avoid every possibility of difference between the British and American Governments, from any attempt to prevent encroachments by foreign fishermen. Her Majesty's Government felt disposed to allow the freedom of fishing that had prevailed since 1854 to continue for the season of 1866, on the distinct understanding that, unless some satisfactory arrangement between the two countries should be made in the course of the year, such privileges would cease, and all concessions made in the treaty just about to expire be liable to withdrawal. Mr. Secretary Cardwell, in a despatch bearing date the 17th of March, 1866, refers to the near probability of some concessions on the subject of the tariff being made through a Bill then under the consideration of Congress; the prospect of a satisfactory arrangement appearing to the Colonial Office an additional reason for deferring the matter to another season."

Just as to-day. They say we have concluded a treaty, but there are certain Bills coming before Congress and you may hope to get what you desire.

"The Colonial authorities, whilst assuring Her Majesty's Government of their earnest wish to abstain from any act which could possibly embarrass them, and although actuated by a sincere desire to deal with the actual situation in a spirit of conciliation and liberality towards their neighbors, irrespective of whatever inconveniences and injuries might attend deferment of the just and valued rights of colonial subjects, experienced much difficulty in accepting the conclusion to which their assent was invited. A Minute of Council was adopted by the Canadian Executive, on the 23rd of March, 1866, setting forth the grounds upon which they believed that the proposed policy could neither be carried out so as to avoid serious and lasting injury to the interests of the country, nor attain the purpose it was designed to effect. The intrinsic worth of the fisheries was pointed out, and also their value to the Confederation of the British North American Provinces, then in prospect, as a staple of extensive trade with foreign countries, a nursery for hardy seamen, and an inexhaustible resource for the industrial energies of our maritime population. The great and peculiar advantages which their exclusive working by British colonists would afford to the United Provinces was likewise dwelt upon.

"The memorandum in question proceeded to say that:

"The Canadian Government receive this expression of the opinion of Her Majesty's Government with the utmost respect; but they doubt whether its adoption would not in the end produce most serious evils. They fear there is no reasonable hope of satisfactory commercial relations being restored with the United States within the year. They think the prospect of attaining this result in the future will be greatly diminished if the United States fishermen continue to exercise the rights given by the late treaty. The withdrawal of their privileges a year hence will create more irritation than now, as having the character of retaliation. The step, if taken now, is plainly and publicly known to be the consequence of the act of the United States. They, and not Great Britain, have cancelled the agreement, and voluntarily surrendered the right of fishing. The course suggested would certainly be regarded by the American people as evidence of weakness on the part of Great Britain, and of an indisposition to maintain the rights of the Colonies; while it would disturb and alarm the Provinces. The determination to persist in encroachments, and in resistance to law, would be stronger by the impunity of the past year, and the danger of collision, when exclusion becomes necessary, would thus be much increased; while the value of the right of fishing, for the purpose of negotiation, would be diminished precisely in proportion to the low estimate which the Provinces would thus appear to have placed upon it.

"The committee would also respectfully submit to Her Majesty's Government that any apparent hesitation to assert an undoubted national right will certainly be misconstrued, and be made the ground for other and more serious exactions, till such a point is reached as neither country can recede from with honor."

That was a despatch worthy of the hon. gentleman of that day. I do not mean the Finance Minister, but the Premier; it did him honor and did him credit.

"Notwithstanding the strong opinions thus entertained, the Government of Canada reluctantly acquiescing in the suggestion of Her Majesty's Government, adopted the temporary expedient of issuing season licenses to United States fishing vessels, at a nominal tonnage rate, so as formally to preserve the right of sovereignty without occasioning any dangerous complications, such as were apprehended by the Imperial authorities. Under this provisional system any vessel attempting to fish without license, and refusing to procure them from the cruising officers, were to be removed from the fishing grounds and punished by confiscation.

"The Executive Government of Nova Scotia gave to this expedient an unwilling assent. In a Minute of Council, dated the 9th of May, 1866, it was stated:—

"The Council, after the most serious deliberation, and with a view to meet the wishes both of the Imperial Government and the Government of Canada, are compelled to state that they are of the opinion that any concession at this moment of the admitted rights of British subjects to the exclusive use of the inshore fisheries of British North America would be most impolitic and disastrous to the interests of British North America.

Mr. MITCHELL.

"The privilege of using these fishing grounds has been deliberately abandoned by the Government and Congress of the United States, and abundant notice was given to the people of that country by the official announcement made more than a year ago which abrogated the Reciprocity Treaty.

"If under these circumstances, when the United States are exhausted by a four years' war, and paralysed by an oppressive debt, any indecision is exhibited in the maintenance of these undoubted and admitted rights, and a temporising policy substituted, which will be certain to be misconstrued, the Council believe that the prospect of obtaining a fair Reciprocity Treaty will be diminished, that the most injurious results will follow, and that the difficulties to be encountered a year hence in dealing with the question will be vastly enhanced.

"At the same time the Council entirely concur in the view enunciated by the right hon. the Secretary of State for the Colonies recommending that, while firmly maintaining the exclusive right to the fishing grounds, the Local Governments should exercise all possible forbearance in pressing their rights, and the utmost caution in selecting the cases for enforcing the extreme penalty of confiscation. In this spirit the legislation of this Province has already been modified so as to remove any reasonable cause of complaint on the part of the Government of the United States."

"This expression of the views of the Government of Nova Scotia is referred to by the Secretary of State for the Colonies in a despatch to Sir W. F. Williams, the Lieutenant Governor, under date the 26th of May, 1866, in the following terms: 'Her Majesty's Government trusts on further consideration, and when the Executive Council are informed that there are reasonable grounds for hoping that before next season permanent arrangements may be made with the Government of the United States, they will feel themselves at liberty to withdraw their objections to a temporary arrangement for the year which has received the cordial approval of Her Majesty's Government.'

"I must distinctly inform you that on a matter so intimately connected with the international relations of this country, Her Majesty's Government will not be disposed to yield their own opinion of what it is reasonable to insist on, nor to enforce the strict rights of Her Majesty's subjects beyond what appears to them to be required by the reason and justice of the case."

"A further Minute of Council was passed by the Nova Scotian Executive, on the 21st of June following, expressing entire concurrence in the views held by the Government of Canada, regarding the policy which they felt themselves constrained to adopt; and although adhering to the opinions already expressed, they recognised the necessity of accepting the suggestions of Her Majesty's Government, and accordingly withdrew all objections to the granting of licenses for that year.

"In New Brunswick the same feeling of reluctance to grant licenses existed, but that Province followed the example of Canada, and assented to the license system, entirely out of deference to the wishes of Her Majesty's Government. Her Majesty's Government believed then, as they even still express the hope, that some arrangement might be arrived at, whereby satisfactory treaty arrangements may be secured, and, notwithstanding that such a hope was at variance with the convictions of the Government of the other Provinces, they gave way to the wishes of Her Majesty's Government, on the understanding that the license system was to continue only for one year in order to give an opportunity to the American Government to renew negotiation."

There is the evidence by the records of the Council of the three Provinces where they expressly declared their determination to maintain their rights as they existed prior to the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854, and urging upon Her Majesty's Government to enforce Canadian rights and to protect and maintain them. We will see how it was done, though:

"This license system continued throughout the years 1866 and 1867 with very unsatisfactory results. It proved quite inefficient in respect of enforcing compliance with its chief conditions, and equally ineffective with regard to the influence it was presumed to exercise towards inducing the United States Government to assist in merging it in some general measure of a permanent and satisfactory nature. The principal causes of its inefficiency and failure may be found in the extreme anxiety to avoid enforcing it wherever there was the least probability of United States citizens not voluntarily complying with it, the annotated instructions to the naval officers in command of Her Majesty's ships issued by the Colonial Office under date of 12th April, 1867, being conceived in this spirit. And also to the fact that amendments to the system suggested by the various naval commanders and particularly by Admiral Sir James Hope, in a despatch to the Admiralty, dated the 3rd of August, 1866, such as were calculated to render it real and practically effective, were pronounced inexpedient by the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty.

"In order to illustrate the complete defeat of the license system, it is sufficient to note the simple fact of Her Majesty's cruisers not having during these four seasons, detained a single American vessel, although it was notorious that great numbers of United States vessels were continually invading our limits, even after repeated warnings, a large proportion of which vessels when afterwards boarded were found to be still unfurnished with licenses.

"American fishermen committed other infractions of the Treaty of 1818: such as frequenting our harbors to transfer cargoes and take supplies, creating riots and disturbances, and setting the law at defiance, as witness the scene at Paspébiac, in Bay des Chaleurs, in 1869, and their refusal to pay harbor dues, at Magdalen Islands, during the present season, as reported by Commander Lavoie in May last."

My hon. friend the member for Gaspé will recollect the American fishermen landing and wrecking the place.

Mr. JONCAS. Yes, quite well.

Mr. MITCHELL—

"In his annual report for the year 1869, Commander Lavoie also says:—

"At Paspébiac there was a strong feeling against the crews of foreign schooners, who two or three times went ashore and committed all kinds of disorder; so much so that the inhabitants were obliged to put night watchmen to guard their property, and secure themselves against the outrageous conduct of these people."

"The effect of this system upon the American fishermen was practically a failure, as will be seen by the following statement, showing the number of licenses issued each year since 1866, and inclusive thereof:—

|--------------------|---------------|
| In 1866 there were | 354 licenses. |
| " 1867 " | 281 " |
| " 1869 " | 25 " |

"It will be perceived that in 1866, the first year of its adoption, the vigorous policy indicated in Lord Clarendon's despatch before referred to, and a lively recollection of the numerous seizures and confiscations made by Her Majesty's cruisers, and officers of the Nova Scotian Government prior to 1864, for violation of our fishery rights, induced a majority of the American fishermen who resorted to the gulf that season to take out licenses, notwithstanding that they required to have three warnings given them by Her Majesty's cruisers before seizure could be effected. The following year only about two-thirds of these took licenses, while in 1868, when it came to be understood that the effect of the instructions issued by Her Majesty's Government, requiring three warnings, was practically to nullify the whole system, the number taking licenses dropped, in 1868, to 56."

I may say here that one of the conditions of those protecting the fisheries at that time three warnings had to be given a vessel even when it was found she was acting illegally. This was one of the things enforced upon us and against which we afterwards kicked

"In 1867 the Canadian Government acted, as it also did in 1868 and 1869—called attention to this defective system,—and Vice Admiral Mundy in his despatch of the 15th May, 1867, spoke of it thus:—

"Since the termination of the Reciprocity Treaty of 1866, the system of warnings to trespassers has not realised the anticipations of the Government by which it was established in that year. Hence the desire of the present Dominion Executive to resort to the more stringent steps proposed in the minutes of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.' The Admiral then gives the probable number of American vessels on the fishing grounds that season as 700. In 1869 Her Majesty's Government consented to the instructions being amended so as only to require one warning, and notwithstanding that if seizures were to be made at all the danger was immeasurably increased to foreign fishermen—during that year only 25 took out licenses, or about one in 28 of the estimated number of vessels on our coasts. On the 26th August, 1869, Mr. Vernon Lushington called the attention of the Admiralty to the fact 'That the Admiral reports that an unusual number of fishing schooners belonging to the United States had arrived on the north shore of Prince Edward Island, but that only a few licenses had been demanded by the masters, who objected to pay the license duty of $2 per ton and prefer to run the risk of being caught within the three-mile limits.' The impression prevailed amongst the Americans that Her Majesty's Government in their great desire to avoid anything of an irritating tendency in the then temper of the American people towards Britain, arising out of their Alabama and other war grievances, would not make any seizures, and as a matter of fact, notwithstanding repeated violations, no seizures were made. Under such circumstances the system of licenses could not prove other than a most lamentable failure—and there was really no 'substantial protection.'

"This sort of protection was of no avail as affecting the interest of colonial fishermen, but simply ensured Americans in the practical enjoyment of the same privileges which they had enjoyed under the Reciprocity Treaty, and it saved the United States Government from all trouble and expense of maintaining a naval force in the Gulf.

"It was moreover, a manifest departure from the very terms on which the system was so originated, namely: 'That any vessel attempting to fish without licenses, will either be required to procure the license from the cruising officer, or will be removed from the fishing grounds,' (Vote Minute of the Executive Council of Canada, dated 23rd March, 1866) It also relieved Americans of any pressure such as might influence their Government to desire a settlement of the disputes which prevailed up to 1864; and while it injured the business of Canadian fishermen by affording facilities to foreigners, such as, together with a prohibitory duty on British-caught fish, enabled them to compete with our fishermen on unequal conditions, it also nullified whatever inducements to enter into a new commercial treaty would otherwise be held forth, by reason of an indirect counter-tax on their fishing and maritime industry.

"Another ill-effect attending this continued indulgence towards Americans is remarked upon by Vice Admiral Wellesley, in the following extract from a despatch to the Secretary of the Admiralty, dated 18th November, 1869:—

"Very few Colonial vessels are engaged in fishing, owing to the almost prohibitory Tariff imposed in the United States, on fish imported in colonial vessels, and the colonial fishermen therefore in considerable numbers man the American vessels.

"The Government of Canada should view with very serious concern the baneful effect on our maritime population of such dependence on American employers. It creates sympathy with foreign sentiments and institutions, and affords opportunities for instilling into the minds of our people ideas and expectations altogether inimical to British connection. There is actually presented to them the example of subjects of a Republican power and citizens of a foreign state prosecuting their calling at the very doors and in the exclusive limits of British subjects in Canada, who are themselves shut out of the markets of that country by a prohibitive tariff, adopted in the interest of their own fishermen, whilst ours cannot even enjoy their own exclusive privileges. Can the immediate influence of these circumstances be otherwise than seductive of the loyal attachment and personal enterprise of our sea-board population? It also discourages the independent employment of Canadian fishing craft, and provincial fishermen. It tempts our fishermen to catch and sell their fish clandestinely to United States owners of fishing vessels, who can afterwards market them in the United States, free of duty, as American caught fish. This practice demoralises our population, and accustoms them to violation of our own laws. The residents are induced to connive at other infractions of our treaty rights. The temporary and local advantages which these practices afford are of small account compared with the general injury done to our people. They militate also against our prospects of establishing an extensive fish trade with foreign countries, and others of the British possessions, and thereby developing the shipping and fishing industries of the Dominion, and creating a self-reliant and skilful class of fishermen and sailors identified in property and affection with our national existence, and attached by past and present associations to Imperial interests.

"A Committee of the House of Assembly of Nova Scotia, in a report submitted to that body during the spring of 1867, represented that 'the system of granting fishing licenses to American fishermen, adopted and practised during the last year by the Governments of this and the adjoining Provinces, is viewed with deep regret, as nothing could more injuriously affect the fishing interests of the Province; and they cannot in terms too emphatic express their disapproval of the injustice done to our industrious and enterprising fishermen, in allowing American fishermen, upon nearly equal terms, to fish in our waters, side by side with the former, while the American market is virtually closed by a high tariff to their products.'

"The undersigned would now refer to a despatch of the Earl of Clarendon to Sir F. Bruce, the then British Minister at Washington, under date the 11th May, 1866, covering a proposition of Mr. Adams, American Minister at the Court of St. James, in which he proposes the appointment of a Joint Commission to settle the point in dispute, in regard to the fishery privileges which the undersigned hopes will not fail to be secured in any re-arrangement of the treaty. Such was the opinion of Nova Scotia, and it was largely shared in by the other Provinces of the Dominion. To the main points of such proposal Lord Clarendon cordially assented, but asked explanations as to the concluding clause, which read thus:—

"Pending a definitive arrangement on the subject, the United States Government engages to give all proper orders to officers in its employment, and Her Britannic Majesty's Government engages to instruct the proper colonial or other British officers to abstain from hostile acts against British and United States fishermen respectively.'

"His Lordship in dealing with this paragraph, remarked:

"And Her Majesty's Government would hold themselves entitled to maintain, in pending the determination of the questions to be discussed, the principles for which they have heretofore contended, and to enforce all regulations and assert all rights which, previously to the conclusion of the Reciprocity Treaty, the British Government asserted and enforced. Therefore, if the purport of the concluding paragraph of Mr. Adams' paper is meant by the United States to involve an objection on the part of Her Majesty's Government to continue to allow, during the sitting of the commission, fishermen of the United States to enjoy in British waters the privileges under the Reciprocity Treaty which the Government of the United States have now renounced for their citizens, you will frankly state to Mr. Seward that into such an engagement Her Majesty's Government cannot enter.'

There is straight talk, and I would call the attention of the hon Minister of Finance to it. That is the talk of Lord Clarendon, who is something like a man.

"Her Majesty's Government are most desirous that the rights of the colonies should be so enforced as to give the least possible occasion for complaint or discussion. They have cordially approved and have recommended to the Governments of the other British Provinces a proposal made by the authorities of Canada, that American fishermen should for the present season enjoy, under special licenses, the benefits conferred by the Reciprocity Treaty, and they will be glad to learn that the Lower Provinces have adopted an arrangement intended to prevent the change of circumstances from operating suddenly to the injury of the fishing interests of citizens of the United States, but they cannot engage indefinitely to adhere to this system.'

"From this it will be evident that Her Majesty's Government at that time clearly decided—

"1st. That American fishermen should have only those rights which they had enjoyed from 1818 down to 1854; and

"2nd. That they were resolved to enforce for British fishermen the full privileges they enjoyed during that period, and which were put in abeyance at that time by the operation of the Reciprocity Treaty; and

"3rd. That the license arrangement was adopted only as a temporary arrangement at the instance of Her Majesty's Government, and but for one year. If further evidence is necessary in reference to the latter conclusion, I would beg to refer to the despatches of the Right Hon. Edward Cardwell, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, under date the 12th April, 1866, addressed to the Lords of the Admiralty; also to the despatches of the same right honorable gentleman to Viscount Monck, then Governor General, under date of 21st April of same year, in which, referring to the Minute of the Canadian Council on the subject, he says:—

"I recognise in this Minute, with much pleasure, the moderation and forbearance shown by the Canadian Government.

"The suggestion that American fishermen should be allowed to fish during the current year in all provincial waters, upon payment of a moderate license fee, meets with the full approval of Her Majesty's Government; and I should inform the Governors of the Lower Provinces that I trust they will readily concur in it. In anticipation of this result, Sir James Hape will be instructed to act upon it as soon as he shall have been informed that the arrangement is concluded."

"To this arrangement the Province of Nova Scotia dissented in an earnest Minute of Council, which exhibits wonderful forecast of what has since occurred, and the Canadian and New Brunswick Governments assented only out of deference to the expression of Her Majesty's Government that it was a temporary arrangement for one year, and adopted in the belief that before the year terminated, arrangements would be made with the United States; but by the despatch of 26th May, of same year, hereinbefore quoted, Mr. Cardwell informed the Lieutenant Governor of that Province that the policy as expressed by Her Majesty's Government must be carried out.

"This brings the history of the matter down to 1866, when the Colonial Government adopted the policy of Her Majesty's Government as a temporary expedient for the then present year, and in the belief that there were reasonable grounds for the hope that they expressed of a permanent arrangement being arrived at with the United States.

"The colonies believed—as they had a right to believe—that as the American Government had voluntarily terminated a treaty under which they received certain concessions,—each party should revert to the status quo anterior to the treaty,—and from the text of My Lord Clarendon's despatch of 11th May, 1866, before quoted, it is clearly implied that Her Britannic Majesty would continue to demand for the colonial subjects the same rights and privileges which they had enjoyed previous to 1854. But it appears from the letter of the Right Honorable the Secretary of State for the Colonies, of the 12th April, 1866, before quoted, that a policy of concession had even then commenced. It is therein stated, 'that Her Majesty's Government are clearly of opinion, by the Convention of 1818, the United States have renounced the right of fishing not only within three miles of colonial shores, but within three miles of a line drawn across the mouth of any British bay or creek. But the question of what is a British bay or creek is one that has been the occasion of the difficulty in former times.'"

There was the first evidence of their weakening. From that time out we have nothing but a record of it.

"It is, therefore, at the present, the wish of Her Majesty's Government neither to concede, not for the present to enforce, any rights in this respect which are in their nature open to any serious question. Even before the conclusion of the Reciprocity Treaty Her Majesty's Government had consented to forego the exercise of its strict right to exclude American fishermen from the Bay of Fundy, and they are of opinion that, during the present season, that right should not be exercised in the case of the Bay of Fundy, and that American fishermen should not be interfered with, either by notice or otherwise, unless they are found within three miles of a line drawn across the mouth of a bay or creek which is less than ten geographical miles in width, in conformity with the arrangement made with France in 1839."

"The Right Honorable Secretary further adds, that in case of seizure for infringement of the limits, if 'it should become necessary to proceed to forfeiture, cases should, if possible, be selected for that extreme step in which the offence of fishing has been committed within three miles of land. Her Majesty's Government do not claim that the prohibition to enter British bays should be generally insisted on, except where there is reason to apprehend some substantial invasion of British rights. And, in particular, they do not desire American vessels to be prevented from navigating the Gut of Canso (from which Her Majesty's Government are asked that they may be temporarily excluded), unless it shall appear that this permission is used to the injury of colonial fishermen or for other improper objects. I have it in command to make this communication to your Lordships, as conveying the decision of Her Majesty's Government on this subject.'

"This despatch recedes from the rights claimed and exercised by British fishermen up to 1854, and from the position assumed by Lord Clarendon in his despatch to Mr. Bruce, in May, 1866, inasmuch as it—

"First, places in abeyance the headland question; and,

"Second, continues the exceptional permission granted in relation to the Bay of Fundy;

"Third, it fixes the bays from which Americans shall be excluded as those under ten geographical miles in width;

Mr. MITCHELL,

"Fourth, it requires that repeated warnings be given (fixed at three);

"Fifth, that when seizures or forfeitures are made there, 'it is desirable that they should be selected from vessels in which the offence was committed within three miles of land.'

"Sixth, that Her Majesty's Government do not desire that vessels should be prevented from navigating the Gut of Canso, except it shall appear to be to the injury of colonial fishermen, or for other improper objects."

Now, Sir, I want to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Finance to this fact, and to ask him to correct his statement that the British Government has never enforced its complete rights since 1854. Sir, he knows well that during the twelve years of the Reciprocity Treaty their rights were in abeyance, to be resumed in every particular when that treaty expired. Lord Clarendon admitted that, and the British Government admitted it, but by their despatches they tried to induce us to tone down and modify our claims.

"I would observe that these six points of concession or suspension of our rights were settled by Her Majesty's Government by letter aforesaid of 12th April, 1866, after Canada had reluctantly adopted their suggestions in reference to the license system, as may be seen by Minute of Council of 23rd March, 1866, without any previous consultation or approval of such policy by Canada, and against the positive protest of Nova Scotia, as before stated. The Island of Prince Edward and the Province of New Brunswick also acted in harmony with their sister Provinces in the feeling of opposition to the policy proposed.

"Mr. Secretary Seward proposed, through Her Majesty's Ambassador at Washington, on the 4th of June of the same year, to negotiate upon the basis of a reduction of the customs duties on fish imports from the Provinces, in consideration of admitting American fishermen and fishing vessels to the free and unrestricted use of our waters. Such proposition was rejected by the Government of Canada (see Minute of Council, 18th June, 1866), and the Government of the United States were informed that no engagements could be entered into which could at all connect the admission of American fishermen and vessels to the desired privilege with a remission of duties proposed to be levied by the United States on Provincially-caught fish. The licensing was continued at the request of Her Majesty's Government, during the year 1867, with the reluctant assent of the Provinces, such assent having again been given plainly out of deference to the policy of the Empire, and in the belief expressed by the Government, that there was still a prospect of arrangements being arrived at in reference to a trade treaty with the United States. On the 1st of July and 3rd of September, 1867, His Grace the Duke of Buckingham and Chandos, being then Colonial Secretary, addressed the Governor General of Canada, dealing with the question of a continuance of the policy of licensing and increase of the tonnage duty payable for such license; and, on the 21st of February, 1868, the then Governor General, by direction, submitted with these despatches a memorandum, containing four propositions as a possible means of dealing with the subject.

"1st. To maintain the small fee (of fifty cents per ton, merely as an assertion of title).

"2nd. To increase the fee to a sum representing the value of the liberty conceded.

"3rd. To absolutely prohibit fishing by United States fishermen in colonial waters.

"4th. To propose to the Government of the United States to admit their vessels and fishermen on condition of opening American markets to Canadian fishermen.

"While the policy of the Colonial Office favored the continuance of the license system at an increase of one dollar per ton, the Government, by Minute of Council, acting on the reports of the undersigned, respectively bearing date the 20th November, 1867, and 27th February, 1868, were clear and explicit in conveying their opinions that the first, second and fourth propositions should not be entertained, that the third was the course which should be adopted, and that by total exclusion the American fishermen could alone be made to realise the importance of the privileges which they were permitted to enjoy. It was also again clearly asserted in these papers that the consent of the colonies to the licensing arrangement of 1866 was obtained on the faith of its continuance only for one year, and in the belief that the faith of Her Majesty's Government was pledged to its abandonment, and that they would not ask its continuance if the Americans failed to enter into trade arrangements of a satisfactory character.

"In proof of this position, the undersigned may here quote a few extracts from the Minutes referred to in the Minute of 20th November 1867, where it is stated that—"It was also remarked in this connection that the tonnage duty of 50 cents per ton then imposed was adopted for that year only, and must not, in any sense, be regarded as an equivalent for the advantages accorded."

"It was also distinctly understood, that unless some satisfactory arrangement between Great Britain and the United States, embracing the whole subject of reciprocal commercial relations, should be made during the course of the then current year, the special privileges thus allowed should be withdrawn, and in the same Minute the belief was expressed that it was upon the faith of that promise alone that Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island reluctantly gave their consent. It further states, in support of the same position, that—

"If there appeared at this juncture any near prospect of continued liberality and forbearance being exercised by the United States—if there was evinced an active desire to re-establish a fair interchange of the staple productions of the two countries, the peculiarity of our situation might not press with so great urgency. But unless before the opening of another fishing season some more equitable and permanent arrangement be effected, the existing provisional system ought wholly to cease.

"In the Minute of 27th February, 1868, it was stated as an objection against continuing the license system, that besides its inadequacy it is liable to the grave objection mentioned by His Excellency of being likely to degenerate into a total relinquishment of the exclusive right of fishing. A continuation, even for another year, of this nominal license fee, which system, when established, was expressly limited to the first year, but has now extended over two years, ought, on no account whatever, to be proposed.

"The Minute further goes on to state that whatever may at present be determined on by Her Majesty's Government, unless before the advent of another fishery season some satisfactory arrangement shall be effected, the existing and any other merely provisional system ought wholly to cease, and all concessive liberties of fishing be absolutely withheld."

"This Minute in further stating the temporary character of the arrangement observes that,—

"Conscious of their rights, and equally anxious to obviate every possibility of estrangement between neighboring peoples, or of international difficulty between Great Britain and the United States, they would rather accept a further temporary arrangement for the current year, provided it shall be made contingent on contemporary enquiries by a mixed commission of the nature indicated in the Earl of Clarendon's despatch of 11th May, 1866."

"On several occasions during the year 1868, the subject was again brought under the notice of Her Majesty's Government, and by a Minute of Council of the 9th their attention was called to the fact that evils of a peculiar character were arising under the new system of licensing American fishermen, inasmuch as the Provinces finding that their interests were neglected, and foreigners permitted to enjoy their fisheries against their will, were in danger of becoming Americanised in their views,—in fact, the people of Prince Edward Island were, by permitting the Americans to ignore the enforcement of treaty obligations, bidding for the trade which our own fishermen should have enjoyed, but which Americans monopolised, and were thus injuring the neighboring Province of Nova Scotia, where the treaty was enforced. In the Dominion the natural rights of our people, so far as we had power, or would be permitted by Her Majesty's Government to enforce them, were enforced; and Americans, so far as related to the causes for which they had a right to enter our ports, were kept strictly to their treaty rights. Our Government precluded them from trading in our ports,—from transferring cargoes from the fishing vessels to the freight and passenger steamers of their country, which visited our ports for the purpose of receiving their cargoes,—while in the neighboring Island of Prince Edward they were permitted as much license and liberty as a British subject. They bought fish, salt and barrels, sold and trafficked in fishing outfits, landed and stored their fish, to be again re-shipped in the line of American steamers running from thence to Boston, and whose trade was built up by this illicit violation of treaty rights. Again, they purchased the fish of the island,—shipped them as American fish,—and thus got them into American markets free of duty, calling them American fish. The trade of the island was thus gradually becoming alienated, and the disregard of the authorities to the constant and continuous violations on the part of Americans of treaty stipulations, was doing much harm, as well to the trade of the adjoining Province of Nova Scotia, as in sapping the loyalty of the people of the island. So serious did this become, that it was made the subject of grave remonstrance on the part of Nova Scotians, and the Government of Canada despatched, as a Special Commissioner, the Honorable Stewart Campbell, M.P., to report thereon. His report fully maintained the facts as previously stated, and the subject being again brought under the notice of Council upon report of the undersigned, of 10th June, 1868, in which attention was called to the very unsatisfactory state of the fishery question, and suggesting that the attention of Her Majesty's Government be called thereto,—the Government availed itself of the presence in England of two of the leading members of the Cabinet, viz.:—Sir George E. Cartier, Baronet, and the Honorable Wm. McDougall, C.B., and directed them 'to secure a personal conference with the Secretary of State for the Colonies, with a view to the timely adoption of some permanent and satisfactory policy.'

"The report referred to, after giving a brief resume of the fishery question,—the course pursued by the British authorities and that followed by the United States, remarked upon the belief that was entertained by Her Majesty's Government, that the Americans would shortly resume their trade relations which they, in 1866, so hastily abandoned, and upon the fallacy thereof, it again referred to the fact that the license system was limited to the then current year, and stated 'that during three successive seasons the same system has been continued,—that it was each year renewed with manifest reluctance, attended as it has been by considerable loss, and many inconveniences occasioning impatient acquiescence on the part of the Maritime Provinces.'

"The burdensome continuance of a system, originated as an amicable concession towards the neighboring States, does not seem to have met with the slightest appreciation. The sole practical effect of it has been to admit foreigners to a free use of our fisheries, whilst imposing on the Imperial and Provincial Governments the material expense of regulating such foreign participation in lucrative advantages, and incurring the cost of protecting British subjects in the concurrent use of privileges exclusively theirs by the laws and usages of civilised nations, and at the same time guarding their own fishing grounds against substantial injury by American fishermen. Under all these circumstances, it is respectfully but earnestly submitted whether the system of licensing United States fishing vessels, avowedly a provisional one, and implying no principle, should now be absolutely discontinued, and that it shall in future give place to a definite policy of exclusion agreeable to colonial interests, and consistent with national dignity and right.'

"The gentleman referred to brought the matter under the notice of the Secretary of State, but without resulting in any change of policy.

"The undersigned need not here especially deal with the despatch of Earl Granville of 21st June, 1869, as it is dealt with in the report to Council of 20th December of the same year, but would observe that, notwithstanding all the representations which the Government of Canada had made against licensing foreign fishermen, the system was still maintained, though at an increased rate, and he would especially recall attention to the report referred to, and also to that of the 16th of same month, on the subject of trade and fisheries, as bearing upon our relations with the United States. I may here state that some inducements were held out by the action of Congress leading to a belief that arrangements for trade might be secured, and a conference was held upon the subject by Mr. Fish on the part of the American Government and Sir John Rose on behalf of that of Canada, but with no practical effect; and though Mr. Rose was given to understand by the American Secretary of State that so soon as the opinions of certain leading statesmen could be obtained, he would invite the Government of Canada again to send delegates to meet him, no such invitation was sent; and notwithstanding the apparent change of sentiment indicated by the resolution of Congress alluded to, the President, in his annual address to Congress, on 4th December last, dispelled all hopes of such an arrangement, and the Government of Canada adopted the reports of the 16th and 20th of December, in which these remarks appear:—'But Her Majesty's Government cannot fail to be struck with the injustice to us, and the danger to the Empire which attend an indefinite and temporising policy; it is therefore respectfully recommended that, unless the course submitted in a former report of the 16th instant be pursued, the United States Government be at once urged to enter into a mixed commission, of the nature described in Earl Clarendon's despatch, of 11th May, 1865, founded on suggestions offered by Mr. Adams.' And that pending the recommendations of such joint commission, as may be adopted and confirmed by the respective Governments, an improved system of licensing American fishing vessels shall be enforced under regulations necessary to its effective operation, and limited positively to the ensuing year.

"In the event of the United States Government declining this proposal, the existing licenses which expire with the closing year should not be renewed, and a policy of entire exclusion from our fishing limits should be adopted and enforced."

"To this Minute no answer was received until the 5th May, 1870, when Mr. H. J. Holland for Earl Granville, under date 19th April last, sent a despatch to Sir John Young, of which the following is the text:—

"With reference to previous correspondence with respect to the protection of the Canadian fisheries, I have the honor to inform you that the Board of Admiralty have been requested to send to the Canadian waters a force sufficient to protect Canadian fishermen, and to maintain order."

"In the meantime, however, the Canadian Government had passed an Order in Council, under date 8th January last, to the following effect, viz.:—

"That the system of granting fishing licenses to foreign vessels under the Act 31 Vic., cap. 61, be discontinued, and that henceforth foreign fishermen be not permitted to fish in the waters of Canada. They further provided that six vessels similar to La Canadienne, be employed for the protection of the fisheries, in addition to the two already engaged on that service; and they also recommend that Her Majesty's Government be requested to maintain on the fishing stations of Canada a sufficient naval force to prevent riotous conduct, and to protect the officers of the police in the discharge of their duty. In reference to the proposal of Lord Granville to support the local force, by the presence of only one vessel of war, the minute stated that it considered this measure of support would be inadequate, and hoped that Her Majesty's Government may be instructed to increase it.

"In dealing with the latter point, the undersigned, in his report of 20th December last, before referred to, remarked:—

"With further reference to the concluding portion of Earl Granville's despatch of 21st June last, signifying the readiness of Her Majesty's Government to furnish for next year one vessel of war to assist in giving effect to regulations for protecting the fisheries, provided that the Canadian Government furnish at their own cost such other vessels as may be necessary, the undersigned would draw the attention of Council to the national character of this service as contra-distinguished from the municipal duty which it appears to be considered. It, in fact, involves important political considerations. The public right of fishing in the waters of British North America has been dealt with and disposed of in former times by Imperial authority, and has formed the subject of treaties or conventions with foreign powers. The differences which existed between the British and American Governments under the Treaty of 1813, arose from concessions of fishing privileges in colonial waters, made by the Imperial Government in favor of citizens of the United States; and the succeeding disputes which have arisen out of the Convention of 1818, resulted from the terms of an arrangement made entirely by the Imperial authorities. Those disputes were the same that would have been revived at the termination of the Reciprocity Treaty, had not a temporary postponement occurred through the licensing system. The Government of Canada did not desire to avoid their settlement. If, therefore, they are now to be still further postponed in deference to the views of Her Majesty's Government, the people of Canada may reasonably claim that Imperial connection with the great question in suspense shall be fully represented by Her Majesty's ships. The purely local or municipal duties of guarding the coast and inshore fisheries within the limits of our territorial jurisdiction, the Canadian authorities do not hesitate to assume, and will amply provide for; but in support of those national rights on which the whole question depends, it is respectfully submitted that a sufficient Imperial force should be maintained in colonial waters."

The particular despatch to which this refers is brought out here. The Canadian Government inform Her Majesty's Government that they are prepared to fit out a fleet to protect Canadian citizens within three miles of the shore, and they ask Her Majesty's Government, instead of putting on one ship as they proposed, to protect the fisheries outside of the three-mile limit, to put on a sufficient number of ships, and they made this response:

"Hitherto the number of war vessels detached for this service has been, according to the testimony of the commanding officers, altogether too few; and should the inadequacy of the force be further reduced to the small measure of one ship, the moral and material effect would, it is feared, prove as injurious to our interests as it is possible to conceive. Were an increased number of cruisers to be employed, the undersigned is prepared to recommend that they be supplemented by a sufficient number of sailing vessels, armed and equipped by the Canadian Government as a marine police, to enforce our fishery laws and protect our inshore fisheries. These vessels would be similar in build to the foreign fishing vessels, and well manned. The schooner La Canadienne, now employed, is described by naval officers as very suitable to the duty, and has accomplished like duties for several years past in a most satisfactory manner. The others might be provided somewhat on that model. These auxiliary vessels could cruise close in shore, and accompany the fishing fleet, co-operating always with Her Majesty's ships, and furnished with licenses to be issued, if required, to foreign fishermen."

"In pursuance of the policy indicated in that report, the Canadian Government directed that the force employed for the protection of the fisheries and maintained by them, be supplemented by the addition of six vessels of the class of La Canadienne, a style of vessel which was considered suitable for that service, and such as was recommended by the officers in command of Her Majesty's cruisers, as most desirable, which was accordingly done, and the Canadian force was thus increased to one steamer and seven sailing vessels."

"The Canadian Government also submitted to Parliament a Bill in amendment of the Act 31 Vic., cap. 61, which was passed, intitled: 'An Act to amend the Act respecting Fishing by Foreign Vessels,' which abolished the necessity of giving any warnings to foreign fishermen before seizure if found within our limits."

"The Government of Canada also submitted special instructions to be given to the officers in command of these vessels, under date 14th April last, based upon those which had been previously approved by Her Majesty's Government in former years, varying only when the altered circumstances called for change. To a portion of these instructions, exception was taken by Mr. Thornton,—at the instance of Mr. Fish—the correspondence in reference to which will appear in the report to Council, by the undersigned, under date of the 28th April last, and the Minute of Council thereon."

"After the instructions before referred to were issued, the Governor General submitted to Council, on the 2nd of May last, a copy of a cable telegram which he received from Lord Granville, dated 30th April last, in the following words:—

"Take steps to secure that American fishing vessels are not seized even between headlands, except within three miles distance of the shore," and he asked that he might be furnished with an answer to be sent the Colonial Office, with a copy of the orders which had been given or which might be given to the commanders aforesaid. To this Council by Minute of the 3rd of May, replied as follows:—

And here is perhaps the explanation of why Mr. Mitchell had to alter his orders.

"The Committee advise that Earl Granville be informed that steps have already been taken to provide against the seizure of American vessels under the circumstances above mentioned, and that the instructions to the officers in command of the vessels engaged in the protection of the fisheries (copies of which have been forwarded to the Colonial Secretary) contain special directions on the subject."

"In agreeing to the above report, Council naturally concluded that the telegram of the 30th April, had reference to, and was to be read in connection with, the instructions issued by Mr. Cardwell in April, 1866, and upon which the annual instructions of the Canadian Government were based for the past four years, and that if Her Majesty's Government had decided in any way to limit or abandon our rights to the fisheries of which we were in possession, that before doing so they would have consulted the Government of Canada upon the subject, or at least have explicitly informed them that they had so limited them, and in what particulars."

They actually reduced the limit from ten miles to six miles without consulting the Canadian Government, and that is the way in which Canada's interests are protected.

MR. MITCHELL.

"The Government was, however, somewhat surprised to receive on the 25th of May last, a copy of a despatch from Lord Granville to Sir John Young, bearing date the 30th April last, informing the Governor General that his Lordship had transmitted to him a copy of a letter addressed to the Admiralty, respecting the instructions to be given to the officers of Her Majesty's ships employed in the protection of the Canadian fisheries, and stating 'that Her Majesty's Government do not doubt that your Ministers will agree with them as to the propriety of these instructions to the vessels employed by them.'

"The letter referred to is as follows:—

"DOWNING STREET,

"30th April, 1870.

"In Mr. Secretary Cardwell's letter to the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, of the 12th April, 1866, it was stated that American vessels should not be seized for violating the Canadian fishery law, 'except after wilful and persevering neglect of the warnings which they may have received; and in case it should become necessary to proceed to forfeiture, cases should, if possible, be selected for the extreme step in which the offence of fishing has been committed within three miles of land.'

"The Canadian Government has recently determined, with the concurrence of Her Majesty's Ministers, to increase the stringency of the existing practice by dispensing with the warnings hitherto given, and seizing at once any vessel detected in violating the law."

"In view of this change, and of the questions to which it may give rise, I am directed by Lord Granville to request that you will move their lordships to instruct the officers of Her Majesty's ships, employed in the protection of the fisheries, that they are not to seize any vessel unless it is evident, and can be clearly proved, that the offence of fishing has been committed, and the vessel itself is captured, within three miles of land."

"This despatch the Council read also in connection with the named letter of Mr. Cardwell of 1866, and did not conceive, although the language of it was scarcely consistent with the latter, that Her Majesty's Government meant to convey a limitation in connection with the bays upon our coast, inasmuch as the Canadian Government was not advised of any alteration in that particular; and in the report to Council upon it, the text of which I have thought it desirable to give at length, it will be perceived that Council did not construe it to mean a restriction of the geographical limits of our jurisdiction, but mainly objected to that portion of the despatch which directed 'that they are not to seize any vessel unless it is evident, and can be clearly proved, that the offence of fishing has been committed, and the vessel itself is captured within three miles of land.'"

We protected our fishermen within our municipal jurisdiction of three miles, and what did the British fleet do? Did they protect them outside that limit? No. The instructions they had in regard to their action outside were a sham, and, if we could get to the bottom of those instructions, I believe it would be found that they were not to seize any vessel at all. At least, that is what they did not do.

"To the latter clause of this despatch, as to the place of capture, the Canadian Government had decided objection; it was a new feature in the instructions to Her Britannic Majesty's officers which had never before been given, was a further limitation of the means of preventing these encroachments, which it was the professed object of Her Majesty's cruisers to accomplish, and my Lord Granville was in error in assuming 'that the Government of Canada would agree with them as to the propriety of these instructions,' as will appear by the following report and the Minute of Council thereon."

"Having reference to a despatch of the 30th ultimo, from the Secretary of State for the Colonies, covering a communication of the same date from Sir Frederick Rogers to the Secretary of the Admiralty, directing attention to instructions given to officers of Her Majesty's ships employed in the protection of the fisheries of Canada, and desiring the Canadian Government to give corresponding directions to officers in command of the marine police vessels similarly engaged, the undersigned has the honor to submit that in certain respects, Lord Granville's wish has been already provided for in the special instructions adopted by the Governor General in Council on the 14th instant."

"The officers of Her Majesty's ships are, it is said, instructed 'not to seize any vessel unless it is evident, and can be clearly proved, that the offence of fishing has been committed and the vessel itself is captured within three miles of land.'

"Attention is respectfully requested to a division of the instructions issued by the Government of Canada, headed 'Action,' by which it will be seen that exercise of the lawful power of peremptory and absolute detention is not contemplated on the first occasion, unless there be a wilful and persistent violation of the law; but such preliminary forbearance could not possibly be extended to any subsequent act of trespass. Another division of these instructions, headed 'Directions,' provides with great care against the possibility of any offending vessel seized by the Canadian officers, except actually within three miles of land, and unless the commission of the offence can be clearly proved."

"It is, however, intimated under the same head that any offending vessel which may resist or avoid immediate seizure within three miles of land, remains liable to capture for the offence committed by Canadian officers in the waters of Canada and by Imperial cruisers wherever she may be afterwards found in British waters, and in consequence, the Canadian officers are directed to communicate without delay the names of any vessels they shall have notified and accosted, or any which may escape or resist seizure; this proviso is consonant to the Acts relative to fishing by foreign vessels, as, besides the offence of being 'found fishing,' it is unlawful to 'have been fishing, &c.' (Vide 31 Vic., cap. 61, sec. 1, and amending Act)

"The undersigned begs to express the hope that the instructions suggested in Lord Granville's despatch to the Admiralty may not be interpreted so as to affect such liability. It is also understood that the term 'offence of fishing has been committed,' occurring in the Admiralty instructions, to which the assent of the Canadian Government is invited, are to be construed conformably with the fishery laws, as, under these Statutes, 'preparing to fish,' inshore constitutes an offence.

"The undersigned would, therefore, respectfully observe that while recommending acquiescence in so much of his Lordship's suggestion as consists with these special instructions, it is advisable to guard against any further practical modification of the strict right of entire exclusion, and also of summary action, than what has been already provided for in the very considerate instructions issued by the Canadian Government.

"There should, as far as it is possible, be uniformity of procedure in these particulars between Her Majesty's ships and the subsidiary force employed by Canada.

"With reference, however, to that part of Lord Granville's suggestion affecting the order to capture any foreign vessel liable to seizure only when the ship is actually within three miles of the coast, the undersigned considers it open to serious objection.

"Both the Imperial and colonial statutes regulating fishing by foreign vessels, relate to jurisdiction in British waters. The system applied under them recognises certain conventional limits as the basis of actual exclusion. But it would seem to be inconsistent both with the provisions of these Acts, and the object of defence, to admit of offending vessels avoiding all penal consequences of their trespass by simply passing an imaginary line out of colonial bounds, and yet being still within British jurisdiction, after having violated the provincial laws, and infringed the treaty between Great Britain and the United States, and also the Imperial Act founded on the same. The peculiar facility with which foreign fishing vessels may cross and recross along this marine limit, renders it possible that under shelter of the exemption resulting from any instruction of the nature suggested, trespassers may present the anomaly of escaping from the marine police of Canada to the quasi-protection of Imperial authority. The existence of such a rule must really invite illegal encroachments on the part of foreigners; and the immediate effect would be to encourage intruders to quicken their efforts to avoid detention and evade seizure, knowing that the capture of their vessels is certain only when caught, as it were, in the very act of trespass. It will certainly weaken the moral influence of any demand made by the officers in command of these Canadian vessels, depending, as they are instructed to do, on the material aid of Her Majesty's ships in case of violence, they being themselves unauthorized to fire upon and disable any vessel either offering resistance or endeavoring to escape seizure."

"There is also to be considered the probable future reference to this exception in connection with any final settlement of the reserved question of headland lines. If, for instance, any foreign vessel having actually trespassed within three miles of the shore of the interior of the Bay des Chaleurs, and escaped from the municipal force of Canada, shall not be afterwards subject to seizure under British authority anywhere within the entrance to that bay, say inside of a line drawn across from Miscou to Point Maquereau (distant apart about 15 miles), and where, in all other matters of a civil or criminal nature, Canada exercises provincial jurisdiction, it may imply waiver of both Canadian and British control quoad exclusive rights of fishing. The Government having deliberated on and determined to maintain this essential point by several Orders in Council adopted since 1864, it is inadvisable to sanction any such dubious proceeding as might be in future pressed into service to support American views.

"Occasion is taken again to refer to reports from this Department, dated 15th and 20th December last, in which this disputed part of the fishery question is referred to at length, and other previous reports enumerated; and the undersigned begs leave again to urge that Her Majesty's Government may be requested to bring it to a speedy settlement in the manner proposed by Lord Clarendon in 1866, on the suggestion of the American Minister at London.

"The undersigned would respectfully, but most earnestly, represent the tendency of any restriction of the kind proposed by Lord Granville on the support of Her Majesty's squadron, to mar the efficiency of this important service, and begs leave to recommend that Her Majesty's Government may be asked to instruct the commanding officer to receive and act upon whatever definite and reliable reports (with satisfactory particulars) of actual detection or escape, may be made by the officers in command of the Canadian Government vessels employed in protecting the inshore fisheries of Canada.

"The action of Council thereon will appear by the Minute of 2nd instant, in which, after reference to the despatch, the Minute goes on to state that 'they have also had before them the memorandum from the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, to whom the above-mentioned despatch and enclosure were referred, and they respectfully report their concurrence therein, and advise that a copy thereof be transmitted by Your Excellency to Lord Granville as containing the views of the Canadian Government on the question referred to in the said despatch.'

"It will further be perceived, by reference to Minute of Council of 8th inst., that immediately upon receipt of the instructions issued by Vice-Admiral Wellesley, under the directions of Her Majesty's Government, a Minute of Council was passed in accordance therewith, and amongst other minor changes essential to secure uniformity, these words were added:—'It must be evident and susceptible of the clearest proof that the offence has been committed and the capture effected within the prohibited limits.'

"I need scarcely remind the Council of the great reluctance that they felt in thus narrowing our powers of protecting the interests of our fishermen, nor the feeling of doubt and distrust as to the real intentions of Her Majesty's Government in relation to these fisheries which was forced upon them. It became evident that a personal remonstrance ought to be made by a member of the Canadian Government to the British Ministry. This course was shortly thereafter resolved upon, and the Honorable Alexander Campbell was despatched to London for the purpose of remonstrating with Her Majesty's Government and urging them to insist upon a reference of the matters in dispute on the part of the Americans to a Joint Commission, or failing that, at once to enforce and secure the exclusive use of all those privileges and limits which British subjects enjoyed from 1818 up to their suspension by the Reciprocity Treaty in 1854.

"Council had hoped that until the mission of Mr. Campbell should have enabled them to judge what they might expect as to the course Her Majesty's Government might hereafter pursue, that at least they would not be called upon to make fresh changes, or submit to any further limitations of their rights, and were surprised at the receipt of a copy of a telegram of the 6th instant, forwarded to the Governor General in Council, from My Lord Granville to Sir John Young, in the following words:

"Her Majesty's Government hopes that the United States fishermen will not be for the present prevented from fishing, except within three miles of land, or in bays which are less than six miles broad at the mouth."

"The Government were again surprised to find that a new and further limitation of the rights of the British people was resolved upon by Her Majesty's Government, inasmuch as in all former instructions, foreign fishermen were excluded from bays which were less than ten geographical miles wide, while the telegram referred to, limited the exclusion, for the first time, to 'bays which were less than six miles wide at the mouth.'

"The question which naturally presented itself to the Canadian Ministry was, where is this to end? and to what extent are these concessions to be made? They felt it to be a duty they owed alike to Canada, for whose Government they were responsible, as to the whole British people, to remonstrate with Her Majesty's Ministers before issuing the required instruction, and on the 9th instant they adopted a Minute of Council, concurring in the report of the undersigned of the 8th instant, and requesting that a copy thereof should be sent to Lord Granville for the information of Her Majesty's Government.

"This report states that precautions have been already taken against seizure by Canadian officers of United States fishing vessels outside of three marine miles from land on the coasts of Canada, and further remarking upon the despatch, observes that:

"The termination of the Reciprocity Treaty by the United States, and the consequent cessation of the labors of the Joint Commission embracing disputed points in the controversy suspended thereby, had the legitimate effect of leaving the inshore fishery rights just as they stood in 1854. The main point formerly in dispute, involving the definition of bays, &c., has never since been conceded by the Imperial or Colonial authorities. It, on the contrary, has been steadily asserted in all subsequent correspondence and transactions. The letter of the Secretary of State for the Colonies, dated 12th April, 1866, expressly reserves it and sets forth the opinion of Her Majesty's Government as clear on this point. The Canadian Government was, however, desired to forego, 'for the present,' the strict enforcement of British rights in this respect, and 'during the (then) present season' to accept a conventional arrangement affecting bays or creeks less than ten miles wide at their entrance.

"It was so accepted as part of the temporary system at that time proposed, but has shared with kindred provisions the disapproval repeated on various occasions by this Government during four years past. The policy adopted this year by Canada, and approved by Great Britain, would in its entirety supersede all provisional concessions heretofore subsisting. But, in deference to the obvious wishes of Her Majesty's Government, this policy has been carried out in the spirit of Mr. Cardwell's despatch of 12th April, 1866, and the same conventional limit of ten miles will be again for the present observed. The Government of Canada ought not, therefore, to be now desired to recognise any further and fresh limitation of our exclusive rights, however temporary and guarded it may be intended to be made.

"This disputed matter has now been pending for upwards of twenty-five years, during which period the American Government has had frequent opportunities and has been specially invited to join in an equitable adjustment of the same. The fault that it is still unsettled and the source of difficulty attached to the United States Government alone. Great Britain and Canada are mere defendants, as in possession of a natural right existing in fact and in law.

"The Council is aware that, when the British Government in 1845 opened the Bay of Fundy to American fishermen, as an amicable relaxation of treaty rights, the act was officially regarded as 'a practical abandonment' by American authorities of the British construction of the Convention of 1818. It was immediately followed by a demand for general application to all indents exceeding six miles in width. This extraordinary demand appears to have been for the moment acquiesced in by Lord Aberdeen, for peace sake, but was soon afterwards rejected by Lord Stanley, on the earnest remonstrances of the colonies. Another concession in the same direction, as proposed by Lord Granville (identical in the words of that ineffectual and unjust claim), may be similarly construed to our detriment. Thus the whole policy of exclusion would be gradually subverted, and component parts of a question vital to the future welfare and interests of Canada, become practically abandoned piecemeal.

"The peculiar concession now suggested would, it is believed, tend to create new differences with the United States instead of promoting any final settlement of the existing controversy.

"Reference is particularly requested to reports of the 15th and 20th of December last, in which the whole matter in question is fully set forth. The conclusions arrived at were, that, as the American Government had voluntarily terminated the Treaty of 1854, and ever since failed to consider any propositions regarding an equivalent for the use of our inshore fisheries, notwithstanding an intermediate license system which continued to United States citizens the same fishing privileges they had enjoyed under the Reciprocity Treaty, on merely formal conditions, all such concessions should be absolutely withdrawn and our rights duly enforced as they existed and were upheld anterior to that reciprocal compact.

"The undersigned, therefore, respectfully submits that the terms of the policy already adopted, and now in actual course of being carried out, should be strictly adhered to."

"The undersigned would further observe that this resumé of the fishery question need not be embarrassed with the correspondence on the points raised, through Mr. Thornton, by the American Secretary of State, Mr. Fish, in relation to the text of the instructions given to the fishery officers commanding the marine police vessels in connection with the Magdalen Islands, and Labrador, as it is not material to the main question, and has been already answered by reports and Minutes of Council, of the 31st ult., and the 8th, 14th and 27th inst. ant, it is necessary now to make reference to the Bay of Fundy.

"Upon the concession made in relation to the correspondence it will be found that, after the right of Americans to fish in that bay was discussed at length, the following conclusions were arrived at by the then Foreign Minister, the Earl of Aberdeen, in his letter of the 10th May, 1845, in which, after reasoning upon the merits of the question, he states that:

"The undersigned will confine himself to stating that, after the most deliberate re-consideration of the subject, and with every desire to do full justice to the United States, and to view the claims put forward on behalf of United States citizens in the most favorable light, Her Majesty's Government are, nevertheless, still constrained to deny the right of United States citizens, under the Treaty of 1818, to fish in that part of the Bay of Fundy, which, from its geographical position, may properly be considered as included within the British possessions."

"Her Majesty's Government must still maintain—and in this view they are fortified by high legal authority—that the Bay of Fundy is rightfully claimed by Great Britain as a bay within the Treaty of 1818; and they equally maintain the position which was laid down in the note of the undersigned, dated the 15th of April last, that with regard to the other bays on the British American coast, no United States fisherman has, under that convention, the right to fish within three miles of the entrance of such bays, as designated by a line drawn from headland to headland at that entrance.

"But while Her Majesty's Government still feel themselves bound to maintain these positions as a matter of right, they are, nevertheless, not insensible to the advantages which would accrue to both countries from a relaxation of the exercise of that right—to the United States, as conferring a material benefit on their fishing trade; and to Great Britain and the United States conjointly and equally, by the removal of a fertile source of disagreement between them.

"Her Majesty's Government are also anxious, at the same time that they uphold the just claims of the British Crown, to evince by every reasonable concession their desire to act liberally and amicably towards the United States.

"The undersigned has accordingly much pleasure in announcing to Mr. Everett, the determination to which Her Majesty's Government have come, to relax in favor of the United States fishermen that right which Great Britain has hitherto exercised of excluding these fishermen from the British portion of the Bay of Fundy, and they are prepared to direct the colonial authorities to allow henceforward the United States fishermen to pursue their avocations in any part of the Bay of Fundy, provided they do not approach, except in the cases specified in the Treaty of 1818, within three miles of the entrance of any bay on the coast of Nova Scotia or New Brunswick.

"This concession made by Lord Aberdeen in the interest of peace and in the belief that it would have been reciprocated by the United States, and that his suggestion of their taking off the duties from British-caught fish going into the United States would have been acted upon, was not realised.

"An American writer in dealing with this subject (see page 424 of the United States Senate documents of years 1852-53) says:

Mr. MITCHELL,

"The opening of the Bay of Fundy considered in itself alone, though nominally confirming the interpretation of the treaty which the colonial authorities had set up, was, in fact, a practical abandonment of it, and we have the highest assurance that the British Government contemplated the further extension of the same policy by the adoption of a general regulation that American fishermen should be allowed freely to enter all bays of which the mouths were more than six miles wide."

"This communication was frustrated by the strong remonstrance of the Governments of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, fortified by an able and elaborate opinion of the then Attorney General, now the master of rolls of Nova Scotia, on the legal rights of colonists, in which, after indicating the legal rights of the latter, he says:

"The colonists cannot understand the principle upon which concession in any form should be granted to the American people in a case avowedly touching the highest ground of national policy, even, although concession did not involve consequences, as it unhappily does in the present case, both immediate and remote, most injurious to colonial interests."

"He further says: 'We believe the treaty does not exclude them, and we but ask a judicial enquiry and determination before these valuable privileges are relinquished: the highest law opinions in England have justified our belief. Her Majesty's Government, in theory, avows and maintains it.'

"The case was finally submitted to the British law officers of the Crown in a case put by the Legislature of Nova Scotia. The Advocate General and the Attorney General of England gave as their opinion 'that, by the terms of the convention, American citizens were excluded from any right of fishing within three miles from the coast of British America, and that the prescribed distance of three miles is to be measured from the headlands or extreme points of land next the sea, of the coast, or of the entrance of bays or indents of the coast, and, consequently, that no right exists on the part of American citizens to enter the bays of Nova Scotia, there to take fish, although the fishing, being within the bay, may be at a greater distance than three miles from the shore of the bay; as we are of the opinion that the term 'headland' is used in the treaty to express the part of the land we have before mentioned, including the interior of the bays and the indents of the coast.'

"The colonies sent a delegation and strong remonstrance to Her Majesty's Government, and on the 17th September, 1845, Lord Stanley thus wrote to the Governor of Nova Scotia respecting the policy of granting permission to the fishermen of the United States to fish in the bay of Chaleurs, and other large bays of a similar character on the coasts of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and apprehending, from your statements, that any such general concessions would be injurious to the interests of the British North American Province, 'we have abandoned the intention we had entertained on the subject, and shall adhere to the strict letter of the treaties which exist between Great Britain and the United States relative to the fisheries in North America, except in so far as they may relate to the Bay of Fundy, which has been thrown open to the North Americans under certain restrictions.'

"Mr. Webster, in notifying fishermen after the decision of Her Majesty's Government, and after dealing with this question and citing the above remarks, states: 'It is this construction of the intent and meaning of the Convention of 1818, for which the colonies have contended since 1841, and which they have desired should be enforced—this the English Government has now, it would appear, consented to do.'

"Yet, notwithstanding this amount of authority in support of the colonial claim, no sooner was the concession made as a matter of favor to the Americans to fish in the Bay of Fundy, than they claimed that the concession settled the question as a matter of right, and that in its operation it should be applicable to all bays, and the practical effect has been largely to encourage trespassers.

"It will be further seen, by reference to the despatch of Mr. Everett in reply to Lord Aberdeen's despatch of 10th March, 1845, as regards the concession in reference to the Bay of Fundy, that no sooner was that generous concession made, than a new and further one was demanded, viz.:—admission into the smaller bays of the coasts of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, within the Bay of Fundy; this, of course, was not conceded by Her Majesty's Government.

"This further concession, which is now, by the despatch of the 6th inst., temporarily made, limits the exclusion from bays only of less than six miles wide, in place of, as formerly, from all bays less than ten miles wide—is the same concession which was on the eve of being agreed to by the then Earl of Aberdeen, and which was arrested by the late lamented Earl of Derby, then Lord Stanley, on the strong remonstrances of the colonists, and will, it is to be feared, if not at once withdrawn, be viewed by foreigners, not as an act of grace nor a concession of a temporary character, but will, in future years as in the Bay of Fundy concession, be claimed, and its continuance, demanded as a matter of right—and, under any circumstance, inure to our disadvantage if the reference asked for is obtained.

"The undersigned would now call attention to the question of the navigation of the Gut of Canso in connection with the fishery question.

"The points which present themselves are :

"1st. What are the national rights in relation to the navigation and user thereof by foreigners, and have British subjects the exclusive right thereto?

"2nd. Have the Americans ever obtained any treaty rights from Great Britain to use it in common?

"3rd. What have been the restrictions against foreigners in its user, and what jurisdiction has Great Britain or the Province of Nova Scotia exercised over it?

"In order to a clear appreciation of the case, it may be stated that the Strait of Canso is a narrow strip of water or arm of the sea, connecting the Bay of Canso, which opens into Chedabucto Bay on the eastward, with St. George's Bay opening into the Straits of Northumberland in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, its dimensions are described by Admiral Bayfield, in the report of his survey of the coast, volume II, as follows :

"The length of the passage through the Gut from the lighthouse at the north entrance to the lighthouse on Eddy Point at the south entrance is 14½ miles, and its least breadth between Bolache Point and Cape Porcupine is 4½ cables' (or under half a mile).

"It is bounded on both sides by counties which now form part of the Province of Nova Scotia, and in no portion of its length between the points referred to, is the width up to two miles.

"Under such circumstances, it would seem that, beyond any doubt, international law would vest the absolute control and the exclusive uses of such gut, strait, or arm of the sea, within the exclusive territorial jurisdiction of the country which controls both shores.

"The maritime territory of every state extends to the ports, harbors, bays, mouths of rivers and adjacent parts of the sea enclosed by headlands, belonging to the same State. The general usage of nations superadds to this extent of territorial jurisdiction a distance of a marine league, or as far as a cannon shot will reach from the shore, along all the coasts of the state. Within these limits (i.e. the ports, harbors, bays, and mouths of rivers and adjacent parts of the sea enclosed by headlands, with three marine miles superadded) its rights of property and territorial jurisdiction are absolute, and exclude those of every other nation.'—Elements of International Law, p. 320. By Henry Wheaton, LL.D. Second annotated edition, by W. B. Lawrence, Boston, 1864.

"Navigable rivers, which flow through a territory, and the sea coast adjoining it, and the navigable waters included in bays, and between headlands and arms of the sea, belong to the sovereign of the adjoining territory, as being necessary to the safety of the nation, and to the undisturbed use of the neighboring shores.'—Kent's Commentaries, p. 25.

"The property and dominion of the sea might belong to him who is in possession of the lands on both sides, though it be open above as a gulf, or above and below as a strait, provided it be not so great a part of the sea, as when compared with the lands on both sides, it cannot be supposed to be a portion of them.'—Grotius de jure belli et pacis, L. 11.

"The exclusive right of dominion, and territorial jurisdiction of the British Crown, have immemorially extended to the bays or portions of the sea cut off by lines drawn from one promontory to another, along the coasts of the Island of Great Britain. They are commonly called the King's Chambers. A similar jurisdiction, or right of domain, is also asserted by the United States over the Delaware Bay and other bays and estuaries as forming portions of their territory. Other nations have claimed a right of territory over bays, gulfs, straits, mouths of rivers, and estuaries, which are enclosed by capes and headlands along their respective coasts, and the principle would seem to be pretty well established as a rule of international law.'—International Law by H. W. Halleck, A.M., San Francisco, 1861.

"Gulfs and channels or arms of the sea are, according to the regular course, supposed to belong to the people with whose lands they are encompassed.'—Puffendorf Law of Nature and of Nations, L. IV.

"All we have said of the parts of the sea near the coast, may be said more particularly, and with greater reason, of roads, bays, and straits, as still more capable of being possessed, and of greater importance to the safety of the country. But I speak of bays and straits of small extent, not of those great tracts of sea to which these names are sometimes given, as Hudson's Bay and the Straits of Magellan, over which the empire cannot extend, still less a right of property.'—The Law of Nations, by Mons. de Vattel, New Edition by Jos. Chitty, Esq., Annotated by C. D. Ingraham, Esq., Philadelphia, 1858.

"According to the current of modern authority, the general territorial jurisdiction extends into the sea as far as cannon shot will reach,* and no further, and this is generally calculated to be a marine league.'—Kent's Commentaries, p. 29.

*"When the United States, by the Treaty of 1818, solemnly renounced forever the right to fish within three miles of the coasts, bays, creeks or harbors of certain portions of North America, the stipulation was neither extraordinary nor extravagant. It is matter of common history that sea-girt nations claim peculiar rights within a league of their shores; and equally plain that, according to the maxims of international law, this claim is defined by lines drawn not only between the formation of bays, but from the headlands of indentations of the coasts.' Memorial to Her Majesty, 2nd, Sept. 1852.

"It would appear that by a strict and rigid construction of this article, fishing vessels of the United States are precluded from entering into the bays or harbors of the British provinces, except for the purposes of shelter, repairing damages, and obtaining wood and water. A bay, as is usually understood, is an arm or recess of the sea entering from the ocean between capes or headlands; and the term is applied equally to small and large tracts of water thus situated. It is common to speak of Hudson's Bay, or the Bay of Biscay, although they are very large tracts of water.

"The British authorities insist that England has a right to draw a line from headland to headland, and to capture all American fishermen who may follow their pursuits inside of that line. It was undoubtedly an oversight in the Convention of 1818, to make so large a concession to England, since the United States had usually considered that those vast inlets or recesses of the ocean ought to be open to American fishermen, as freely as the sea itself, to within three marine miles of the shore.'—Mr. Secretary Webster, 6th July, 1852.

"No United States fisherman has under the Convention (1818), the right to fish within three miles of the entrance of such bays as are designated by a line drawn from headland to headland at their entrance.'—Lord Aberdeen's despatch to Mr. Everett, 10th March, 1845.

"Considering the great extent of the line of the American coasts, we have a right to claim, for fiscal and defensive regulations, a liberal extension of maritime jurisdiction; and it would not be unreasonable, as I apprehend, to assume, for domestic purposes, connected with our safety and welfare, the control of the waters on our coasts, though included within lines stretching from quite distant headlands, as, for instance, from Cape Ann to Cape Cod, and from Nantucket to Mauntauck Point, and from that point to the Capes of the Delaware, and from the south of Cape Florida to the Mississippi.'—Kent's Commentaries, pp. 29 and 30.

"It is difficult to draw any precise or determined conclusion, amidst the variety of opinions, as to the distance to which a state may lawfully extend its exclusive dominion over the sea adjoining its territories, and beyond those portions of the sea which are embraced by harbors, gulfs, bays, and estuaries, and over which its jurisdiction unquestionably extends. All that can be reasonably asserted is, that the dominion of the sovereign of the shore over the contiguous sea, extends as far as is requisite for his safety, and for some lawful end.'—Kent's Commentaries, p. 29.

"The preceding dicta should be borne in mind, with especial reference to the plea set up by American Ministers that the limit of maritime jurisdiction claimed by Chancellor Kent is with respect to 'belligerent purposes;' and that the principle of drawing lines from distant headlands does not sanction such a definition of marine bounds as affecting territorial jurisdiction and piscary. Is not fishery a 'lawful end,' and are not the fishing pursuits of citizens 'purposes connected with our safety and welfare'?

"For purely belligerent purposes Great Britain takes sixteen miles of outside sea as the limit, and the United States take much more, both estimating the distance 'from a right line drawn from one headland to another.'—Chancellor Kent, p. 30.

"In Nova Scotia, from 1825 up to 1854, much excitement prevailed in reference to this question of the fisheries, and with it the navigation of the Gut of Canso.

"In 1841 the House of Assembly of Nova Scotia proposed the following questions for the consideration of Her Majesty's legal advisers, dated 8th June, 1841:

"I. Whether the Treaty of 1783 was annulled by the war of 1812, and whether citizens of the United States possess any right of fishery in the waters of the lower Provinces other than ceded to them by the Convention of 1818; and if so, what right?

"II. Have American citizens the right, under that Convention, to enter any of the bays of this Province to take fish, if, after they have so entered, they prosecute the fishery more than three marine miles from the shores of such bays; or should the prescribed distance of three marine miles be measured from the headlands, at the entrance of such bays, so as to exclude them?

"III. Is the distance of three marine miles to be computed from the indents of the coast of British America, or from the extreme headlands, and what is to be considered a headland?

"IV. Have American vessels, fitted out for a fishery, a right to pass through the Gut of Canso, which they cannot do without coming within the prescribed limits, or to anchor there, or to fish there; and is casting bait to lure fish in the track of the vessel fishing, within the meaning of the Convention?

"V. Have American citizens a right to land on the Magdalen Islands, and conduct the fishery from the shores thereof, by using nets and seines; or what right of fishery do they possess on the shores of those islands, and what is meant by the term shore?

"VI. Have American fishermen the right to enter the bays and harbors of this Province for the purpose of purchasing wood, or obtaining water, having provided neither of these articles at the commencement of their voyages, in their own country; or have they the right only of entering such bays and harbors in cases of distress, or to purchase wood and obtain water, after the usual stock of those articles for the voyage of such fishing craft has been exhausted or destroyed?

"VII. Under existing treaties, what rights of fishery are ceded to the citizens of the United States of America, and what reserved for the exclusive enjoyment of British subjects?"

"1st Query.—In obedience to Your Lordship's commands, we have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honor to report, that we are of opinion that the Treaty of 1783 was annulled by the war of 1812; and we are also of opinion that the rights of fishery of the citizens of the United States must now be considered as defined and regulated by the Convention of 1818; and with respect to the general question 'if so, what right' we can only refer to the terms of the convention, as explained and elucidated by the observations which will occur in answering the other specific queries.

"2nd and 3rd Queries.—Except within certain defined limits, to which the query put to us does not apply, we are of opinion, that by the terms of the convention, American citizens are excluded from any right of fishing within three miles of the coast of British America, and that the prescribed distance of three miles is to be measured from the headlands, or extreme points of land next the sea, or the coast, or of the entrance of bays, or indents of the coast; and, consequently, that no right exists, on the part of American citizens, to enter the bays of Nova Scotia, there to take fish, although the fishing being within the bays, may be at a greater distance than three miles from the shore of the bay, as we are of opinion that the term 'headland' is used in the treaty to express the part of the land we have before mentioned, including the interiors of the bays, and the indents of the coast.

"4th Query.—By the Convention of 1818, it is agreed that American citizens should have the liberty of fishing in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and within certain defined limits, in common with British subjects; and such convention does not contain any words negating the right to navigate the Passage or Strait of Canso, and, therefore, it may be conceded that such right of navigation is not taken away by that convention; but we have now attentively considered the course of navigation to the Gulf by Cape Breton, and likewise the capacity and situation of the Passage of Canso, and of the British possessions on either side; and we are of opinion that, independently of treaty, no foreign country has the right to use or navigate the Passage of Canso; and, attending to the terms of the convention, relating to the liberty of fishing to be enjoyed by the American citizens, we are also of opinion, that that convention did not, either expressly or by necessary implication, concede any such right of using or navigating the passage in question. We are also of opinion that casting bait, to lure fish in the track of any American vessel navigating the passage, would constitute a fishing, within the negative terms of the convention.

Mr. MITCHELL.

"7th Query. The rights of fishing ceded to the citizens of the United States, and those reserved for the exclusive enjoyment of British subjects, depend altogether upon the Convention of 1818, the only existing treaty on this subject between the two countries, and the material points arising thereon have been specifically answered in our replies to the preceding queries."

"The Parliament of that Province took action upon the encroachments of the Americans, and an Address was forwarded to the British Government upon the subject of the Fisheries, as well as upon the navigation of the Gut, and the Attorney General of that Province was directed by Lord Falkland to prepare a report on the various questions referred to which he did under date 16th June, 1845. Again, on three separate occasions, prior to 1851, efforts were made to bring, under the notice of Her Majesty's Government, the desirability of exercising their right to close the Gut of Canso against foreigners. Again, in 1851, the same Parliament made a fourth report upon the subject of closing Canso, based upon the action of Mr. Stevenson, the United States Minister to England, in a letter addressed to Lord Palmerston, then Foreign Minister, in which he objects to the closing of the Strait of Canso against American fishermen upon the ground that, at the time of the Treaty of 1818, one side of it was divided by Cape Breton, and the other by Nova Scotia, and that the union of the two could not be held to vest the right in Nova Scotia. In reply to this assertion, Lord Falkland contended that Her Majesty's exclusive property and dominion in the Strait of Canso is maintainable upon the principles of international law already referred to, and which it is considered will equally apply whether the shore on either side forms part of the same Province or of different Provinces belonging to Her Majesty. The strait is very narrow, not exceeding one mile in width, and its navigation is not necessary for communication with the space beyond, which may be reached by going round the Island of Cape Breton.

"It will be seen by the authorities, hereinbefore quoted, that the opinion of Chancellor Kent, agreed with the opinion put forward by the British law officers of the Crown, and justified the conclusions at which they arrived, that 'no foreign power, independently of treaty, has any right to navigate the Passage of Canso.'

"Again, the Province of Nova Scotia, for upwards of forty years, has exercised a control over the Strait of Canso, and imposed a tonnage due upon all vessels navigating the same for the support of the lights upon her coasts, and enforced the payment of the same. Such exercise of authority has never been disputed, and Nova Scotia has by her enactments legislated both for the obstruction and the restrictions of the rights of foreigners in relation thereto. The object, on the part of the Americans, in inserting the article I of the treaty referred to, was to secure certain privileges in connection with the fisheries, to which they were not entitled by the law of nations. Those are enumerated—it covered certain rights of fishing under limitations—it gave the right to land, to dry and cure fish in certain inhabited districts, and gave permission to enter bays, coasts, and harbors, for the purpose of shelter, and of repairing damages therein, of purchasing wood and obtaining water; but in no part of the treaty is there any reference to their right to navigate the Passage or Strait of Canso, and as they have no right by the law of nations, and obtained none by treaty, they are clearly proscribed from setting up such a claim.

"That portion of the Convention of 1818, which relates to the fishery question, is in the following words:—

"ART. I.—Whereas differences have arisen respecting the liberty claimed by the United States, for the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, and cure fish on certain coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks, of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America, it is agreed between the high contracting parties that the inhabitants of the said United States shall have, forever, in common with the subjects of His Britannic Majesty, the liberty to take fish of every kind on that part of the southern coast of Newfoundland which extends from Cape Ray to the Rameau Islands, on the western and northern coast of Newfoundland, from the said Cape Ray to the Quirpon Islands, on the shores of the Magdalen Islands, and also on the coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks, from Mount Joly, on the southern coast of Labrador, to and through the Straits of Belleisle, and thence northwardly indefinitely along the coast, without prejudice, however, to any of the exclusive rights of the Hudson's Bay Company; and that the American fishermen shall also have liberty, forever, to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks, of the southern part of the coast of Newfoundland, hereabove described, and of the coast of Labrador; but so soon as the same, or any portion thereof, shall be settled, it shall not be lawful for the said fishermen to dry or cure fish at such portion so settled, without previous agreement for such purpose, with the inhabitants, proprietors, or possessors of the ground.'

"And the United States hereby renounce, forever, any liberty heretofore enjoyed or claimed by the inhabitants thereof, to take, dry, or cure fish, on or within three marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of Her Britannic Majesty's dominions in America, not included within the above mentioned limits; provided, however, that the American fishermen shall be admitted to enter such bays or harbors, for the purpose of shelter and of repairing damages therein, of purchasing wood, and of obtaining water, and for no other purpose whatever. But they shall be under such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent their taking, drying, or curing fish therein, or in any other manner whatsoever abusing the privileges hereby reserved to them.'

"It will thus be apparent that no such right was created by treaty, and, therefore, no such right exists.

"In April, 1841, Lord Falkland in dealing with this whole fishery question, stated that 'the greatest anxiety is felt by the inhabitants of this Province (Nova Scotia) that the Convention with the Americans, of 1818, should be strictly enforced,' and, while stating the efforts of that Province in fitting out armed vessels to protect her rights, suggested that additional vessels of the navy be sent to supplement their efforts; and between that time and November, 1842, two additional reports of the Committee of the Legislature of Nova Scotia, upon the same subject, were forwarded to Her Majesty's Government, when the late Earl of Derby (who was then Lord Stanley) informed the Nova Scotians, that, 'as regards the fisheries, the precautions taken by the Provincial Legislature appear adequate to the purpose, and that being practically acquiesced in by the Americans no further measures are required.'

"It would, therefore, appear that the active enforcement of the headland lines, and the exclusion from the Gut, was, in November, 1842, in the opinion of Lord Stanley, acquiesced in by the Americans, and was, as a matter of fact, actively enforced.

"The foregoing statement brings the history of this question down to the present time, and the undersigned will now resume the consideration of the despatch of my Lord Granville to Sir John Young, of the 6th instant before referred to, and the memorandum of His Excellency the Governor General of the 22nd instant thereupon.

"It has already been stated in compliance with the command of His Excellency, by the directions of Lord Granville, that the instructions to the above fishery officers should be altered, and a report embodying that policy has been submitted.

"It is, however, the duty of Council carefully to consider the despatch referred to, and as it is one of so much importance, the points in which involve such serious considerations on the part of Canada, it is given at length. It states:

"In your despatch of 4th May, you state that you have laid before your Ministers, my telegram of 30th April, the effect of which, as of a written despatch now in your possession, was to modify in one respect the Colonial Office instructions of 12th April, 1866.'

"The instructions of 1866 were to the effect that the United States fishing vessels were to be excluded from bays less than 10 miles wide at the mouth, but that the forfeiture of such vessels was, if possible, only to be enforced when the fishing had taken place within three miles of shore.'

"It further states: 'That the effect of my despatch, or rather of the letter to the Admiralty which is transmitted for the concurrence of your Government, was, as regarded Her Majesty's vessels, to make the direction of forfeiture so far absolute as to require that no fishing vessel whatever should be seized except within the three miles and for an offence committed within those limits.'

"It was intended to imply, though it was not expressed, that, as the only ultimate means of excluding Americans beyond these limits was not to be used, the exclusion itself was not to be enforced.'

"You enclosed, in reply, a minute of your Ministers, stating that steps had been taken to prevent the seizure of American vessels beyond the three-mile limit, and you enclosed certain special instructions of 1st April, 1870, as affecting this object.'

"But, in your telegram of 14th May, you inform me that those instructions conform, or are intended to conform, not to my instructions of 30th April, but to the Colonial Office paper of 12th April, 1866, which those instructions were intended to supersede.

"I am not quite sure whether you now perceive that the British and Canadian instructions are inconsistent with each other.'

"The Canadian instructions are inconsistent with the spirit of which I conveyed to you, in that they still require Canadian fishery officers to exclude American fishermen from bays more than ten miles in width, and you will see, on perusal, that under the head 'action,' they are inconsistent with the letter of the Admiralty instructions, by directing the fishery officers, after certain warnings, 'instantly to seize' any person fishing within 'prescribed limits,' which, read with the preceding paragraph, cannot but be taken to include bays.'

"And under the head 'directions' it is implied that vessels are to be seized for coming into a Canadian bay (whether or not within three miles of shore), unless they are forced thither by violent winds or other unavoidable cause.'

"These objections to the instructions as they stand are not removed by the limitation implied in the words (p. 4), 'or seize it if found within three marine miles of the coast.'

"I further observe that the decision of Her Majesty's Government not to exclude American fishermen, except within three miles of a line drawn across the mouth of a bay or creek which is less than ten geographical miles in width, does not warrant their exclusion from that part of the Bay des Chaleurs which is not more than ten miles wide.'

"Considering the importance of the subject, and that your attention appears to have been especially directed to the sentence respecting that part of the Bay of Chaleurs, I am somewhat surprised that these points should have escaped your notice.'

"Her Majesty's Government are fully aware that no steps should be taken which should prejudice the question what are Canadian waters? or should admit the right of United States fishermen to fish within these waters, except within the limits prescribed by the Convention of 1818. But they do not abandon the hope that the question of abstract right may yet be avoided by some arrangement between Canada and the United States, or that the limits may be definitely settled by arbitration or otherwise, and while any expectation of this kind exists, they desire to avoid all occasion of dispute so far as this is possible consistently with the substantial protection of the Canadian fisheries. With these objects they think it advisable that United States fishermen should not be excluded from any waters except within three miles of shore, or in the unusual case of a bay which is less than six miles wide at its mouth, but spreads out to a greater width within.'

"It will, of course, be understood and explained to the United States Government that this liberty is conceded temporarily, and without prejudice to the rights of Great Britain to fall back on her treaty rights, if the prospects of an arrangement lessens, or if the concession is found to interfere practically with the protection of the Canadian fisheries.'

"It would appear that Lord Granville contemplated by the despatch to convey—

"1st. That his telegram and despatch of the 30th April, were intended to modify the Colonial Office instructions of 12th April, 1866.'

"2nd. That though the instructions from the Admiralty to the officers in command of ships of war employed in the protection of the fisheries, and from the Canadian Government to their officers similarly situated, since April, 1866, were based upon Mr. Cardwell's letter of instructions of April, 1866, which prohibited foreign fishermen from entering bays less than ten miles wide at the mouth, and which instructions suggested that the forfeiture of such vessels was (if possible) only to be enforced when fishing had taken place within three miles of shore, yet notwithstanding the instructions, his Lordship now, for the first time, communicates to the Canadian Government the fact that it never was intended to be acted upon.'

"That if any doubt existed about the meaning of the instructions or the possible chances of a trespasser being taken by Her Majesty's cruisers, that doubt is now removed, inasmuch as his Lordship states:—

"That it never was the intention of Her Majesty's Government that their vessels should seize a trespasser under any circumstances, and for fear of such a possibility his Lordship now removes all chance of it by stating that 'the effect of my despatch or rather of the letter of the Admiralty, which it transmitted for the concurrence of your Government was, as regards Her Majesty's vessels, to make the direction of non-forfeiture as far absolute as to require that no fishing vessel whatever should be seized, except within the three miles, and for an offence committed with those limits. It was intended to imply, though it was not expressed, that as the only ultimate means of excluding Americans beyond these limits was not to be used, the exclusion itself was not to be enforced.'

"It may be stated that as the Canadian Government, by the approved report of the undersigned, of the 20th December last, stood pledged to Her Majesty's Government to maintain an efficient marine police to enforce the law within the three-mile limit, in the belief that Her Majesty's Government, having declined to do that which they designated as strictly a police duty—viz., to command respect to municipal law within the three mile limit—would command respect to national rights outside thereof, and to which they are, in the opinion of Council, pledged, and as Dominion vessels by the limitation of the exclusion of foreign vessels to bays from ten to six miles wide, are precluded from, in any case, seizing beyond three miles—and as British cruisers are now positively directed not to seize unless the offence is committed and the vessel actually seized within three miles of land—the reasonable presumption is that Her Majesty's cruisers are not intended to seize at all, under any circumstances; and if further proof were required than the text of the despatch referred to, the fact is easily verified on reference to the reports of the commander of Her Majesty's vessels on the station, who, though they repeatedly boarded vessels within the three-mile limit, and which had no license, there is no instance of a single seizure having been made.

"3rd. That Her Majesty's Government had narrowed the limit of exclusion from bays more than ten miles wide to bays under six miles in width, and had done this without the slightest reference to the Canadian Government, who are responsible to the people of the Dominion for the protection of their rights, and this fact was communicated to the American Secretary of State before Her Majesty's Government ascertained whether or not it was satisfactory to the Government of Canada."

"4th. That it does not appear from the said despatch that there was any special reason for deliberately limiting and restricting the rights of Her Britannic Majesty's subjects in British America, nor that the Government of Canada was consulted thereon, nor indeed does it seem to have ever been considered necessary in the changes that have been resolved upon during the current year."

"5th. 'That Her Majesty's Government states that they are fully aware that no steps should be taken which should prejudice the question 'which are Canadian waters?' or should admit the right of United States fishermen to fish within these waters, except within the limits prescribed by the Convention of 1818.' Her Majesty's Government have virtually done this act already, which they profess to disavow. In 1854 we were in active possession of the three miles limit—of the bays 10 miles wide—of the headland line of coast in which our rights were reinforced and practically recognised,—and it appears much like 'prejudging the question,' and to the disadvantage of British subjects too—for Her Majesty's Government, pending the settlement of those questions, to waive for the time all but the first of the positions, and so far as the acts of her own cruisers and their instructions to them are concerned, probably even that also. It is practically abandoning to United States fishermen privileges which they had not by the Treaty of 1818, when we allow them to fish in the Bay of Chaleurs, and on all of the best and most valuable fishing grounds which we possessed within headland lines. No such privilege was conceded to them by the Treaty of 1818, nor were they permitted to enjoy them up to 1854, yet our exclusive rights in them are for the present suspended; and in the despatch which thus deprives us of those rights, we are informed that Her Majesty's Government are aware 'that no step should be taken which should prejudice the question.'

"The undersigned would further observe that Mr. Boutwell, the Secretary of the Treasury Department at Washington, in his circular to the United States Customs Officers, dated 16th of May last, acting on the concession of the three mile limit so recently made, also prejudices the question, inasmuch as he says 'that the authorities of the Dominion of Canada have terminated the system of granting fishing licenses to foreign vessels, under which they have heretofore been permitted to fish within the maritime jurisdiction of the said Dominion—that is to say, within three marine miles of the shores thereof.'

"Here is a clear attempt at limitation of our treaty rights of 1818, 'by which Americans renounced the right to fish not only within three miles of the coasts, but of the bays, creeks, or harbors of His Britannic Majesty's Dominions in America,' while Mr. Boutwell's circular ignores that portion of the right which gives us jurisdiction over bays, creeks, or harbors and states our jurisdiction to be only three miles from the shore.

"6. 'The despatch further remarks, that they (Her Majesty's Government) do not abandon the hope that the question of abstract right may yet be avoided by some arrangement between Canada and the United States, or that the limits may be definitely settled by arbitration or otherwise, and while any expectation of this kind exists, they desire to avoid all occasion of dispute, so far as this is possible consistently with the substantial protection of the Canadian fisheries.'

"In this paragraph there are two probabilities referred to—

"1st. The probability of an arrangement (trade arrangement it is presumed) with the United States;

"2nd. The probability of the limits being fixed by arbitration or otherwise.

"In reference to the first of these it would have been much more satisfactory to the Government of Canada if the ground upon which Her Majesty's Government have founded the hope thus expressed, had been stated. Such hope, entertained by Her Majesty's Ministers, has been held since 1865; it was entertained by Her Majesty's Government when Lord Clarendon wrote the despatch of 1866, which so ably indicated the position of British subjects in relation to these fisheries. Mr. Cardwell expressed a confident belief upon this subject when he induced Canada to adopt his licensing system as a measure of expediency for one year. His Grace of Buckingham and Chandos entertained the same hope, and now My Lord Granville, though five years have elapsed since notice of abolition, does not seem yet to have abandoned the 'hope that some arrangements may be secured.'

"The Canadian Government regret that they cannot see either in the past, or in the immediate future, the same ground for believing that a satisfactory arrangement will be arrived at. On the contrary, the chances of a satisfactory arrangement are not so good as they seemed in 1866 and 1867, and that, so far from there being anything in the course taken by the United States to warrant the expectation of a fair trade policy being adopted by them, everything indicates the contrary result, and nothing tends more to encourage them in such a course than the spirit of concession towards them, which has characterised the fishery policy of the last five years. In 1866 they, after a year's notice, voluntarily abandoned the Reciprocity Treaty, notwithstanding our efforts, in the fall of 1865, to prevent that result. The licensing arrangement pressed upon us in the interests of Her Majesty's Government, and because of their hope of a trade arrangement gave to foreigners the principal thing that they cared for, which we had to give. By the liberal policy of England, they had already practically the free admission to our coasting trade, as between Province and Province—the privilege of navigating our rivers and canals—the advantages of registry for their shipping in our ports—almost everything in fact—that we had to give, that they desired except the enjoyment of our valuable fisheries, and this the despatch of My Lord Granville has practically permitted them the use of. How have our advances been met by the Americans in the last few years? The advantages which, through the liberal policy of the Empire, they have enjoyed in Canada have been responded to by almost prohibitory tariffs—their canals closed against us—their coasting trade confined to themselves, and their refusal to reciprocate the liberal policy of Britain in reference to the Registration of Shipping. 'Tis true that a resolution of Congress was passed in 1869 which induced many to believe that they had changed their policy, but this idea was much shaken after our experiences of that year. Canada soon discovered that the resolution referred to either meant nothing, or such terms as she could not accept. The utterances of Mr. Schenck, in referring to the resolution which induced the Government of Canada for a time to believe that a change of sentiment had been created in the public mind of the United States, are given in the Congressional Globe of the 3rd March, 1869.

"It states that Mr. Schenck was Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, a position analogous to that occupied by Mr. Morrill in the Conferences of 1866. In reply to a question put by Mr. Pike, when the resolution was reported to the House of Representatives, Mr. Schenck said: 'I do not believe we ought to enter into any relations of reciprocity with the British Provinces, either through negotiating with the Imperial Government of Great Britain or by direct treaty with the Provinces themselves, if that were possible. I believe the people of the British Provinces should be treated like all other foreigners, and made to pay the same duties on articles they export into our country that other foreigners are required to pay on similar articles.' He added: 'I am not authorised to speak for the rest of the members of the committee, but I am not aware of any difference of opinion between any of them and myself on that subject. But Mr. Schenck expressed himself in favor of commercial treaties 'in regard to the fisheries on the coasts of these Provinces, and in relation to the free navigation of the St. Lawrence River from its source to the sea.' In the course of this debate not a single member expressed himself in favor of reciprocity.

"Thus upon the pro forma submission of a resolution passed by Congress denying the right of the Executive Government of the United States to make treaties or conventions with foreign governments touching 'import duties,' the House assents to confining the scope of the resolution, although professing to renew negotiations regarding commercial intercourse,' to securing to Americans 'the rights claimed by them to the fisheries,' and 'in relation to the free navigation of St. Lawrence.' With a committee, through whose hands our proposition must be sifted, already committed to a circumscribed form of 'commercial intercourse' and avowedly hostile to any relations of reciprocity,—with a House of Representatives which (although supposed to contain some few members at least favorable to mutual trade relations somewhat less restrictive than they are) silently and safely 'recommends to the President' to negotiate for securing certain 'rights' claimed by the United States citizens,—and with an Executive which proclaims beforehand hostility to any reciprocal engagement,—what concessions can we hope to obtain as equivalents for the privileges we have to offer? Even these privileges of fishing and navigation which we might concede—in return for what?—must be first reduced, from an American point of view, to the extent of the 'rights' asserted in this resolution. With such enunciations before us, and the proceedings of the delegation at Washington, in 1866, still fresh in our memory, it is difficult to discover any ground for hoping that new trade arrangements can be secured on equitable terms, in pursuance of the resolution of Congress."

"But this matter may, for the present, be looked upon as finally postponed, from the official announcement of the President of the United States in his last inaugural message in the following words:—

"The question of renewing a treaty for reciprocal trade between the United States and the British Provinces on this continent, has not been favorably considered by the administration. The advantage of such a treaty would be wholly in favor of the British producer, except possibly a few engaged in the trade between the two sections. No citizen of the United States would be benefited by the reciprocity. Our internal taxation would prove a protection to the British producer, almost equal to the protection which our manufacturers now receive from the tariff. Some arrangements, however, for the regulation of commercial intercourse between the United States and the Dominion of Canada may be desirable."

"On the face of such authority to the contrary, and in the absence of the grounds on which My Lord Granville rests his hopes of an arrangement, the undersigned cannot participate in the belief that the United States are prepared to offer any terms that Canada will accept. It is true, that the United States intimated a desire to admit coal, salt, lumber, and fish free of duty, provided we would do the same, and give them, besides, the free use of our fisheries, our River St. Lawrence, and our canals, and also consent to deepen the latter. Canada feels no imperative necessity, as she certainly has no desire, to enter into any such one-sided arrangement. When we do make an arrangement it must be on equal and fair terms, or it will not be made at all, and must be such an one as obtains for our people the same rights and reciprocity in trade, registry of shipping, and coasting that the Americans now have from us, and in the meantime, until public opinion so changes in America, as to bring about these results, Canada can afford to wait."

"This Government, prior to the meeting of the last Parliament, ceased to entertain the hopes expressed by My Lord Granville, and felt it to be their duty to deal with the great resources of this country quite irrespective of what might or might not be hoped for from the United States. This was clearly indicated in a report of the undersigned of the 11th December last, approved by Council in dealing with a despatch of My Lord Granville, covering two memoranda from the Board of Trade upon the subject of the colonial coasting trade, in which, while regretting the necessity of declining to act upon the suggestions of Her Majesty's Government by throwing open our coasting trade to the United States as Great Britain had done, while they continued to close theirs against us, the subject was there entered into at length, and a policy outlined which has met with the approval of Parliament and the public sentiment of this country."

"The following is an extract from such report:

"The Board of Trade in their memorandum state that it is to be hoped that the Legislature and Governments of the colonies will be disposed to co-operate with Her Majesty's Government in their attempt to secure the benefits of free navigation and cheap freights for Her Majesty's subjects, throughout the British Empire, and to strengthen their hands in their efforts to obtain from foreign countries for the shipping of the United Kingdom and of the British colonies a reciprocal liberality of treatment."

"The undersigned is of opinion, as twenty years have now elapsed since the British Government extended to the shipping of the United States, in common with the shipping of all other foreign countries, the privilege of participating in their carrying trade throughout the British dominions on equal terms with British ships (with the exception of the local coasting trade in each colony), and as the recent Act first herein quoted has shifted the responsibility of legislating upon or dealing with the question of colonial coasting trade from the Imperial to the Colonial authorities, and as the liberal treatment of American shipping by the British Government has produced no corresponding reciprocity of sentiment on this subject on the part of the United States Government, that the time has arrived when it becomes our duty to define a policy which should be pursued towards our neighbors from the standpoint of Canadian interests, and which should apply, not alone to the coasting trade, but to all matters affecting navigation and the trade generally."

"The experience of the twenty years has, in the opinion of the undersigned, proved to the people of Canada, that concessions in matters of trade, navigation, and shipping, voluntarily conceded by us, have not been reciprocated in by the Government of the United States, and indeed, have not always been appreciated, nor the value of them realised."

"The United States Government put an end in 1865, after an existence of eleven years, to the Reciprocity Treaty, which was of such great value as well to them as to the several British American Provinces—they refused to renew or reconstruct it, except on terms which were not to be defended in the interests of our trade; and though the undersigned, in common with a considerable portion of the public of Canada, was led to believe from the utterances of their press and commercial centres of trade for the last two years, as well as the expressed opinions of some of their leading public men, that public sentiment was changing in favor of 'new arrangements,' whereby trade relations would be again re-established on principles of reciprocal free trade;—these expectations have been dispelled, and the existence of such opinions to any great extent in the Cabinet of the United States have been negated by the Message of the President, in which he distinctly states, 'that the renewal of the treaty with us has not been favorably considered by the Administration;' while he expresses a belief 'that the advantages of such a treaty are wholly in favor of the British Provinces, except possibly, a few engaged in the trade between the two sections,' he distinctly states that 'no citizen of the United States would be benefited by reciprocity,' and yet gives expression to the opinion that some arrangements for the regulation of commercial intercourse may be desirable,' and the recent action of Congress would tend to confirm the belief that no reciprocal arrangement of a satisfactory character can now be obtained."

"The undersigned would observe that there are numerous arguments which can be adduced from an American point of view in favor of the position assumed by their chief magistrate against the renewal of the treaty, and that while England has pursued a most liberal course towards foreign nations in relation to trade and navigation, and has offered the fullest opportunities for foreign competition, the argument which has done much to remove objections to such a policy in Canada, has been the belief, repeatedly expressed by English statesmen, that those foreign countries which enjoyed the benefits of that liberal policy, and that free trade would in time reciprocate; and such expectations have not been without their results in Europe. In America, however, no such results have followed the liberality of England, although a generation of our people have nearly passed away; and indeed national events have tended to make the adoption of such a policy on the part of the United States much more difficult, and while we go on making concessions, permitting them to have privileges, and giving them facilities which they decline to reciprocate, while in fact they possess the right of registry for their ships in our ports, and have practically enjoyed our coasting trade, and at the same time refused us similar privileges—while they have had the benefit of our canals and rivers, without corresponding concessions on their part—they have compelled our ships to pay a war tax of thirty cents gold per ton and other customs fees, without any such corresponding charges in our ports upon their ships (notwithstanding the 173rd section of the Imperial Act, 16 and 17 Victoria, cap. 107, to which I have referred in the Minute of Council annexed—we have not retaliated). Our fisheries, too, they have all opened to them on the most liberal terms, while British-caught fish is met with a duty which has closed their country as a market for our fishermen, and indeed they have made their tariff in general almost prohibitory, and while their legislation tends towards exclusion, the construction they put upon their tariff laws, and their execution of them, bear most heavily upon our people. Under these circumstances, the undersigned regrets that he should, in viewing the past, arrive at conclusions different from those which seem to be entertained by the board of trade, viz., that a continuance of the policy of concession would, with that foreign nation in whose trade we are chiefly interested, lead to the result hoped for, and secure a 'reciprocal liberality of treatment'; and he thinks it would be unwise to force it on them unasked at the present time. He is of opinion that the true policy of the Canadian Government at present should be to retain all the privileges which it now possesses, until fresh negotiations take place for new trade relations between Canada and the United States, when the opening of the whole coasting trade of the Dominion to United States shipping can be included in any arrangements which may be made, if the Canadian Government should then be of opinion that it would be advisable and in the interests of Canada to do so.

"A copy of the report to Council made by the undersigned on the 2nd April, 1860, hereinbefore referred to, on the subject of tonnage duties and custom house fees, and other restrictions imposed on British vessels entering the ports of the United States, as compared with the charges and restrictions imposed on American vessels entering Canadian ports, and as to the advantages which American vessels have in the United States as compared with British vessels, is herewith attached, to which the undersigned begs to draw attention."

"The active protection of our fisheries was the first step in our National Policy—

Will the hon. gentleman observe that I initiated the National Policy, and I am sorry it has come to be a protective policy.

"—as viewed from a colonial standpoint—and has since been followed up by legislation which has imposed certain charges upon shipping and imposts upon articles of trade. It should, however, be clearly understood that these restrictions and charges we are prepared to remove whenever the United States are disposed to give us reciprocal treatment. Till then, the public sentiment of the country calls for vigorous action at the hands of the Canadian Government, and demands that this, the greatest and largest question of them all, and one which our neighbors most appreciate, shall be dealt with with spirit and vigor, and form part of an important National Policy—Council should, therefore, ask of Her Majesty's Government that which we feel confident the Empire will not refuse us, viz.: 'That our rights in the fisheries may be maintained and enforced as they were prior to 1854.'

"The second probability which I noticed, as referred to in the despatch of Lord Granville, viz., 'His hope that the limits may be definitely settled by arbitration or otherwise,' it would be pleasing to see realised in a satisfactory manner. If, however, this is to be attained, it will not be by pursuing the policy which has characterised the treatment of the fishery question on the part of Her Majesty's Government.

"In 1866, Canada reluctantly consented to the licensing policy for one year;—Nova Scotia was forced into it against her will, on the faith of what cannot be viewed otherwise than a condition or a pledge that it was only for one year; New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island assented for the same reasons as Canada, and because she led the way in this policy.

"In 1867, the Council of Canada protested against its continuance, as it also did in 1868-69, when it further asked that the proposition so favorably entertained by Lord Clarendon, for a Joint Commission to settle the disputed points be again urged upon the consideration of the United States Government. To these propositions the Council have, as yet, received no reply, nor are they aware whether the proposals for a Joint Conference, have ever been communicated to the American Government, or, if so, with what result?

"The undersigned cannot but feel that this treatment of an important and vital question is not such as Canada had a right to expect, nor will its people be satisfied with such a result.

"As part of the Empire, Canada is entitled to demand that her rights should be preserved intact, and at least it cannot be considered that Council will have performed its duties if we silently permit ourselves to be divested of them by piecemeal, as is the case with our fishery interest; and the people consider that their valuable fisheries are a trust incident to Canada, and involve interests which Her Majesty holds for the benefit of her loyal subjects, and which should not be abandoned nor their protection neglected.

The Government of Canada, therefore, now ask of Her Majesty's Ministers that they at once require of the United States the appointment of a Joint Commission, to settle the matters in dispute, and, in the meantime, that they should be requested to give such instructions to Her Britannic Majesty's officers on the North American stations as will secure:

"1st.—The exclusion of all foreigners from fishing within our bays, from which they are excluded by the Treaty of 1818, as interpreted by Her Majesty's Government.

"2nd.—The exclusion of all foreigners from fishing within the limits of three miles from headland to headland, according to the British interpretation of said treaty.

"3rd.—The exclusion of all foreign vessels from the use of the Gut of Canso.

"It is further advised that Her Majesty's Government be requested to make no concessions nor terms limiting the privileges to which we are entitled as British American subjects of Her Majesty, and more especially those which were secured to us by the Treaty of 1818, without first submitting them for the consideration of, and obtaining the approval of the Government of Canada thereto.

"The people of Canada have ever been loyal and true in their maintenance of the interests of the Empire, and feel deeply anything that would impair its material interests or create dissatisfaction amongst its population; and the undersigned cannot but express his convictions that the policy recently pursued in reference to the fishery question is not such as to meet the approbation of the people of Canada, and he would earnestly recommend that a strong remonstrance be submitted to Her Majesty's Government upon the subject.

"Respectfully submitted.

"P. MITCHELL,

"Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

"DEPARTMENT OF MARINE AND FISHERIES,

"OTTAWA, 4th July, 1870."

Now, Sir, in the record which I have read of concessions yielded year after year by Her Majesty's Government, I think my hon. friend will fail to perceive that any strong ground has been taken or any material support given, in the interest of Canada, such as he spoke of in his introductory remarks on Tuesday last. Sir, I think it is a record which is a discredit to Great Britain—to have the interests of a great colony, the greatest in the Empire, and one she is proud of, frittered away by piecemeal, as I have said. It is a record of concessions which have been made step by step without even consulting the people who are interested in them. I think the record of the last thirty years, at least the last twenty years, is a disgrace to the British Empire and the British Government. In saying what I do, I do not intend to cast any reflections on the action of my hon. friend and his colleagues at Washington. He has very patriotically and very magnanimously taken the blame for the shortcomings in this treaty on himself. It is natural for him to do that in such cases; but I know him too well, I know the facts too well, and I have had too much experience in dealing with the fisheries, not to know that what he did there he did under pressure. Although he spoke of the largest power in the world being behind him, as a matter of fact that power was not there. It was there in name, but not in power; and if there has been an act since the formation of this Dominion which has tended to loosen the bonds between Canada and the Empire, if there has been an act which will tend to produce dissatisfaction and to promote distrust in the British Empire with reference to the affairs of Canada, it is this last act of hers in abandoning us and taking away our fisheries, in the face of the fact, as I have shown from the despatches I have read, that she stood pledged to maintain the interests of Canada as they stood when they were suspended in 1854. When the treaty lapsed by the act of the United States, where was the British Government? Read Sir Edward Cardwell's, Lord Kimberley's and the Earl of Aberdeen's despatches.

The only man among the whole of them who has fairly stood by us was the Earl of Clarendon. Yet everyone of them, one after another, assured us that England intended to stand by us in maintaining the exclusive rights which the British Government claimed and enforced up to 1854; and, Sir, everyone of them save Lord Clarendon went back on his record, and left us to see our rights taken away from us by piecemeal. That is the position of the British Government for the last twenty years—and I speak of it with regret, for I have ever been as loyal a subject as any that stands in the Dominion of Canada. I have been loyal in fact, I have been more loyal in sentiment, but the sentiment is knocked out of me, and I fear that a great many others feel as I do; and when we see the interests of Canada frittered away as they have been in this case, I fear that any desire to create a more permanent loyalty will ooze out of us, and we will become a dissatisfied people. They talk about the federation of the Empire—the veriest rot that ever was spoken. What interest have we in common with the other side of the Atlantic? We owe to England our existence as a semi-nation, it is true; we owe to her our language and our laws, and we are proud of both; but while England has been one of the greatest colonising nations of the world, there is no nation has worse administered her colonies. Take the case of Cape Colony, a record of years of mismanagement, misrule and misgovernment, and what would Canada have been without the administrative powers of the Canadians themselves?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Without the rebellion?

Mr. MITCHELL. Look at the record in this case. I, who was intimately connected with the whole affair and felt deeply the necessity of standing up for our rights; I, who spent day after day, and week after week, pressing these claims on the British Government and keeping them up to the mark, found them always receding at the first opportunity—and now everything is gone. My hon. friend speaks of the advantages this treaty has given us; he speaks of the limit of space which is described by the points of the treaty; he speaks about the delimitations which are named in the treaty. Sir, let any man take up a map—and I regret that my hon. friend should have made the excuse he did about not producing a map—for it was his duty to produce one. His excuse is, that there is a provision made for the delimitation on the treaty. True, there is; that is the official delimitation. But it was the duty of the Cabinet to have prepared a map and to have it submitted to us, so that we could appreciate and understand these advantages my hon. friend has so eloquently described, but which I cannot see. I may tell my hon. friend that, looking to the contentions of Canada and England, as propounded in 1818, and maintained up to 1854, when they were suspended for twelve years under the treaty of Lord Elgin, after which they were urged to be enforced again and recognised by the British Government from that time out, until they were again suspended in 1871 by a new treaty. I say if a map based on those contentions, was taken from headland to headland, and those exclusive rights of the bays delineated upon it, this House would see what the difference is between the delimitation in that map and the concessions given up by the Americans. If I can understand the meaning of the statements in the pile of despatches which I have had to wade through in order to define and maintain the interests of Canada, I should say that the men who made them were bound in honor to have stood by Canada and enforced those rights. If they had done so, we would have stood to-day either with our headland system maintained—because all that was wanted was a little firmness some twenty years ago—we would not be in the position of having to beg for reciprocity. About the inshore fisheries, it was never disputed that we had an absolute right to them, and yet my

hon. friend comes here with his eloquent tongue and persuades us—he knows he can do anything in this country, for he can do what none of us can do, he can control the First Minister—he comes with his eloquent tongue and persuades us that in this delimitation, which the treaty provides for, we have obtained a great concession. Sir, we have abandoned everything, and while we have done that, my hon. friend has forgotten one thing. Did he know there were two ends to the shores of America on the Atlantic? Where is the provision in the treaty to give the Canadians the same rights in the Delaware and Chesapeake, in Boston Bay, and Narraganset, and Albermarle, and from the Cape of Florida past the mouth of the Mississippi? Do we find that the interpretation which they set upon the shores, bays, and coasts is the same as they ask us to set upon ours? Have they not rights which they claim from headland to headland, and which are enforced even among themselves? It is true it is the separate states own them there, but that does that alter the law or right on the question. Where has my hon. friend provided in the treaty that we should have the use of those bays to the south of where our boundary terminates? Let us have the same privileges in the American bays, straits, and headlands, that they demand in ours. There is no such provision in the treaty. Let a Canadian fishermen go down to Delaware and Boston or go down amongst their oyster bays and attempt to fish, and he will soon find himself in prison. Did my hon. friend forget all about that? I am sure not. But my hon. friend found himself there with instructions in Mr. Chamberlain's hands to make a treaty, and as to what that treaty was, neither Chamberlain nor the British Government cared, and the only man who did care was Sir Lionel Sackville West, but he had to obey his instructions as a servant of the Government. He was handicapped, weighed down and overborne by the influence of that greatest Empire of the world. I feel I have taken up too much of the time of the House to-night, but I felt it to be my duty, even at the risk of boring the House, to place upon record the history of this fishery question, not for the purpose of éclat to myself, but as a duty I owe the country, that we may be able to find in some available way the history of the iniquitous way in which the British Government has treated this colony of ours. I am as loyal a subject as any man, and I hope to remain so, but I will remind the House that the time is fast coming when, if the British Government continues to allow our interests to be frittered away in this way, she will find the colony itself frittered away before long. It is as well some plain speaking should be heard. I do not wish to be understood to express the opinion that I desire it. I should regret it notwithstanding this treatment, and I feel proud of belonging to a colony of England, but Canada cannot and will not always remain a colony. Children do not always remain in their father's house, and we are gradually growing into the position when the interests of Canada demand we should branch out for ourselves. I do not desire to see this, but a few more cases like this and I would not give much for the power of England in this colony of Canada. There are a great many points I wanted to talk upon, but I have taken up so much time in the proof of these matters that I think it would be trespassing too much on the time of the House for me to continue. I will, therefore, not take up the time of the House any longer in discussing this matter. I felt I had a duty to perform, and I only regret that I have performed it so inefficiently. Of course this treaty will pass; there is no doubt about that, but I disapprove of it entirely, as I think the Americans have got everything and we have got nothing. I speak with knowledge of the subject when I say that we have got nothing. The delimitations that are spoken of are simply allowing us to retain an infinitesimal part of what Britain has over and over again declared we had an absolute right to, and has for forty years enforced before the treaty put them in abeyance. Our rights revived when that treaty ceased, and what did we find? We found that taken from us by the commission which sat under the authority of the British Crown. I regret very much that England should have so much humiliated herself before her children here, and it is a humiliation, and I regret that it should be done by a nation which professes to have kept faith, especially with her colonies. I regret that I have to speak as I am now speaking of England, but I say this as a duty to my country, as a duty to myself and as a duty to this House.

Mr. FOSTER. After the long discussion which we have had on this subject and the exhaustive and able speeches which have been made on this side of the House by the mover of the Bill and the Minister of Justice and other gentlemen who have spoken, I should not have considered it necessary to have said one word on this question had it not been that for two years past I have been charged, in my position as Minister of the Department of Marine, with the duty of carrying on the protective service and looking after the rights of Canada as far as her fisheries are concerned. Occupying that position, I feel that, before the debate closes, I will have to ask the indulgence of the House for a brief time while I make a few remarks. Certainly this debate has not lacked in variety. We have had all the phases of opinion expressed by the hon. gentlemen on the other side. I think an attentive observer of this debate must have been struck with three things in this particular. First, the large amount of effort which hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have directed to make a case against the Government; second, the small amount of effort which has been directed towards the discussion of the treaty itself, which is at the present time before the House, and as to whether or not it would be better in the interests of Canada and in the interests of the Empire, that the treaty should be now adopted; and, in the third place, I must say that disingenuous arguments and assertions have been made with a view to discredit the Government and to discredit the treaty. We have had every phase of assertion and of argument, and all varieties of opinion. My hon. friend from Prince Edward Island said we would occupy a proud and happy position if we had given up this position and had made these concessions two years ago. My hon. friend the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), declares in equally strong terms, that the Minister of Finance, who sat as commissioner at Washington, should have held on to all these matters and would have got further concessions if not now, at some future time. Some other hon. gentlemen have taken the Government to task because bait has been allowed to American fishermen under this treaty. Other hon. gentlemen have taken the opposite side in regard to that matter. So we have had almost as great a variety of opinions as there have been persons who have spoken, or have made their opinions known, outside or inside of this House. Without criticising the individual opinions of hon. members, if the House will kindly bear with me, I will state the positions which have been taken in the main against the Government. The first was that the Government wasted a valuable opportunity in delaying to take advantage of what they said was a favorable condition of public sentiment in the United States to make arrangements for the continuation of the treaty some two or three years before it was denounced. My hon. friend from Prince Edward Island was especially strong in his indictment of the Government on that question. In view of the facts of the case, I believe I can challenge the sentiment of the House and the country for the negative of that position. From 1878, when the Halifax Award was made public, until the time of the Fisheries Treaty, I contend that no body of public opinion in the United States, either congressional opinion, executive opinion or other opinion in the United States of America, warranted the assumption that a proposition made to the United States Government for a continuation of the Washington Treaty would meet with a fair reception. Where did my hon. friend find that favorable sentiment in the opinion of that country during the period from 1877 to 1885? Where can he find any resolution of Congress or any public utterances of their public men, or any action of the Senate or of the House of Representatives in that direction? He cannot put his finger upon one prominent expression of opinion in the public press, or amongst the public men, or in the Congress or from the Executive of the United States, which favors the idea that there was a favorable opportunity for the continuation of the Washington Treaty, and the very first moment it was possible to give notice to terminate the Treaty of Washington, that very moment it was done by Congress, and on the 3rd March, 1883, that resolution passed unanimously. It had previously been brought before the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate and had passed unanimously. It had passed the Senate. It went to the Committee on Foreign Relations of the House of Representatives, and this is what they stated. Chairman W. Rice was instructed by the committee, and gave his reasons:

"So that the matter stands by itself, or else we enter upon another term, for which England may demand ample payment from the United States, according to the enormous and unjust award of the Halifax commission for privileges which nobody in the United States, who has investigated the subject, considers worth keeping. The Senate's Committee on Foreign Affairs unanimously reported this resolution. It was adopted by the Senate without an objection; and the Committee on Foreign Affairs of this House, having fully examined the matter, unanimously instructed me to move the adoption of the resolution by the House, which I now do under that instruction. With this explanation, I trust that no objection will be made to the consideration of the resolution, which, I am very sure, I can satisfy everybody ought to be adopted to avoid liability to further payment of an extortionate sum to Great Britain for that which is not considered worth anything to us, by parties who are interested in the matter, and who have examined into it."

Well, Sir, the President's message came shortly after that, on the 4th December, 1883, that great message that my friend has characterised as being the outstretched hand, the message in which the President suggested that a commission should be appointed. What kind of a commission was that? It was not a mixed commission, it was not a joint commission; the President did not so propose. He says:

"That Congress create a commission to consider the general question of our rights in the fisheries, and the means of opening to our citizens, on just and enduring conditions, the richly stocked fishing waters and sealing grounds of British North America."

That was not a joint commission to which members were to be invited from the British Government, or from Canada as being represented upon it. It was simply a suggestion of the President that a commission of their own country, to enquire into their own rights, should be granted. That message was sent to Congress, Congress did not even notice the suggestion in the message. So far from there being a favorable opinion toward the continuation of that treaty, when it was brought to their attention by their executive head, Congress did not even give it the courtesy of a consideration. So, Sir, at the very earliest possible moment, the treaty was denounced, and denounced in the way I have stated. Where does my hon. friend find a favorable sentiment, with the executive opposed to it, with the House of Representatives and Senate opposed to the continuation of the treaty, with no public sentiment in the country, so far as expression went, in its favor, with the fishery interest strongly against it. My hon. friend would have had this Government, in the face of all that opposition, make a proposition for the continuation of a treaty which the whole people, through their Congress and their representatives, had denounced, and declared that the privileges contained in it were not worth having, and they did not want them. So, I think, my friend's proposition, that the Government was guilty of delay, and lost the favorable opportunity for having arrangements made for the continuance of that treaty before it was denounced, falls to the ground, and I think this case in that respect is not proven. The next proposition that was taken by my hon. friend is this: That the policy of the Government was fickle and contradictory. He says, at one moment there was the giving away of the fisheries to the United States for six months; the next, there was a strong and almost tyrannical enforcement of protection in the jurisdiction of Canadian waters; then, again, there was a year of less strong enforcement, and afterwards the concession and giving away; and he tried to draw an inference from that, and asserted that the policy of the Government was a fickle and inconstant policy, and that it had no consistency in it. What is the test by which we are to judge of the policy of a Government, the policy of a party? It is two-fold. It is by the motive which underlies it, in the first place; and it is, secondly, by the methods by which that underlying principle is carried out. What was the policy of the Government with reference to the fisheries? Sir, the policy of the Government was to maintain the fisheries of Canada for the advantage of the people of Canada, by what was preferable, a mutual and amicable arrangement made between the two parties; or, failing in that, by a strict and prudent recognition of, and enforcement of, the rights of Canada in the premises. That, I think, may be stated as the policy of the Government, as the motive which underlaid the policy of the Government; and if that be taken as true, I hold that the policy of the Government was thoroughly consistent on that point. How were these fisheries to be maintained for the country? They were to be maintained, first, if possible, by having an amicable, mutual arrangement between the two countries interested, by which Canada's fisheries could inure to her own advantage and to the enjoyment of her own people. In order to obtain that, the Government of the country, at the first favorable opportunity, when there was a change of Administration, when the Administration that succeeded the Republican Administration showed that it was more favorable to open negotiations; and so the proposition was made and acceded to, that a period of six months should be given United States fishermen for the enjoyment of our fisheries, and that in return a commission should be recommended by the President to Congress. Was it not worth that trial? Was not the prospect of a commission, and the settlement of this question by a commission, in an amicable way, worth the while of holding out the olive branch, worth the while of holding out a friendly suggestion, that, instead of interrupting the operations of the fishermen in the middle of the season, thereby causing certain irritation, and perhaps putting off what was wished for by the whole country, a commission representing both countries should sit down together and come to a mutually amicable arrangement which should be for the advantage of both countries? I say it was worth the while to give that advantage, to make that proposition, for the sake of the prospective gain. Well, Sir, they enjoyed half a season's fishing, and the President, true to his promise, the Executive, true to their undertaking, sent down to Congress the suggestion for a commission, and the Congress went against that. The proposition was not acceded to; by a vote of 30 to 15 in the Senate, the proposition was negatived, and the Senate gave its voice that no commission should be appointed to settle this question. Now, then, my hon. friend says that the policy of this Government was fickle, because the Government changed from the proposition which they had made to allow free fishing in our waters for half a season, in order to gain thereby a commission to settle the question, because they changed that, and introduced a policy of a prudent but strict enforcement of the rights of Canada. What else could be done, consistent with the underlying principle of Canada's rights, when the means at first adopted in order to bring about an amicable arrangement, had failed, and Congress and the Senate had stated that they were against a commission, that there was no prospect of an appointment at that time? Sir, it then became a duty to carry out the policy of the Government, to protect the fisheries of Canada, and to protect the rights of Canadians, so far as their territorial waters were concerned; and that policy was introduced. In the years 1886 and 1887, it was carried out, consistently carried out, and my hon. friend is quite wrong in stating that the policy was carried out differently in 1886 and 1887. The very same instructions that were sent out in 1886 were continued in 1887; the very same policy of protection, and the very same form of protection was carried out in all its important features. And it is not true to say that there was any important material change in carrying out the protective service with respect to the fisheries in 1886-87. Well, Sir, that had its effect. I believe that both the holding out of the offer of a proposition respecting the fisheries in 1865-86, and the prudent, strict enforcement of the rights of Canada in those years, both had their operation and their effect and both contributed towards the negotiation for the commission which was ultimately obtained towards the settlement which has resulted therefrom. I believe that both of those lines contribute to the success which has ultimately accrued. So much then for the fickleness and inconsistency of the policy. My hon. friend and others on that side of the House with him have said: Well, yes, your instruction and interpretation of that treaty was all right; we agree with it. My hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) said: I have read over the minutes, the reports of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, the report of the Minister of Justice, and I agree with everything that is contended for in those reports. He will correct me if I have misstated his position. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) took occasion in this House not many days ago to declare that he agreed with every word, with every contention embodied in those Minutes in Council. He will correct me if I have misstated his position.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is correct so far as the law is concerned.

Mr. FOSTER. That is so far as the interpretation and construction put upon the law and put upon what grows out of that, so far as the laws were concerned in those Minutes of Council, based on reports made by myself and the Minister of Justice, the hon. gentlemen as co-leaders of their party and as strong men in their party say: They agree with every word, with every construction, with every position taken.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No.

Mr. FOSTER. They agree with the construction. What was the construction? The construction was, in the first place, that the Treaty of 1818 was mutually binding. They agreed with that construction. In the second place, the contention was that we had a right to pass our own laws and to carry out the direction of our own tribunals with respect to them. They agreed with that. Again, the contention was made that we had a right to refuse commercial privileges to the United States fishing vessels. They agreed with that. Again the contention was that we had a right to refuse the purchase of bait by American fishing vessels. They agreed with that. Again our contention was that we had a right to construe and carry out our own customs laws with respect to foreign fishing vessels, United States or others. Those were the constructions, those were the contentions, and those hon. gentlemen say they agree with those contentions to the letter. Then why do they find fault with the Government? Is the hon. gentleman in this position: that he ardently professes a creed but that he stolidly refuses to practice it, that he is most energetic in favor of a law, but is most stubbornly and absolutely against the enforcement of that law? If those contentions were correct, and if this Government carried out those contentions strictly, why do they find fault with the Government so far as that was concerned? They must admit so far as their agreement with all those contentions is concerned that the Government have strictly carried out those contentions, if they were sincere in their belief of those constructions and in those interpretations. Ah, yes, says my hon. friend, we would not object to your strictly carrying out those contentions, but we do object to the manner in which you did carry them out. That is the position which the hon. gentleman opposite has taken. That is to use his own language, that the manner in which those constructions and interpretations were carried out was tyrannous, harsh and cruel, and I do not know how many other adjectives the hon. gentleman used, but almost all that could be gathered from the dictionary. That is the objection, if there can be any objection, of my hon. friend. He stated that the manner in which they had been carried out was harsh, irritating, persecuting, that they showed the jingo spirit that they arose—he did not quite fully express it but he expressed it sufficiently to carry his meaning—that they arose from an idea that the Government were going to show the United States people what they could do, that they were going to use power upon them and that they were glad to have an opportunity of using power upon them. Now my hon. friend must be honest in his reasons, and he must show where he finds any proof of that desire. Does he find it in the spirit of the Government as shown in its action before the protective service was put on? Why, the Government had the right to have undertaken this system of restriction and protection on 1st July, 1885, in the very midst of the fishing season if they had chosen to do it, and if they had been filled with that spirit of jingoism that the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), spoke of they would have jumped into the fray at once on 1st July, put on the protective force and come down into the ranks of the fishing vessels which were all about our coast. Instead of evincing such a spirit they made the proposition of which I have spoken, that they would not pursue this irritating course, but for that reason they would allow them to fish on our coasts and would try to come to a mutual arrangement with respect to the fishermen. Is it shown in the instructions which were issued to the officers of our protecting cruisers? No. If you will look at those instructions you will find they have been framed in a spirit the very reverse of that. First, with regard to the Magdalen Islands it is stated in those instructions that—

"Although the liberty to land, to dry and cure fish there is not expressly given by the terms of the convention to United States fishermen, it is not at present intended to exclude them from those islands."

With respect to operations upon coasts that are unsettled or partially settled it is stated:

"It is not desired that you should put a narrow construction on the term 'unsettled.' The general conciliatory spirit in which it is desirable that you should carry out these instructions, and the wish of Her Majesty's Government that the rights of exclusion should not be strained, must influence you in making as fair and liberal an application of the term as shall be consistent with the just claims of all parties."

Then further there is a direct caution given to them not to exceed the limit of their power and not to go too far even in taking a technical advantage of United States vessels which may have got within the three-mile limit from unavoidable circumstances, such as storms or accidents. And the instructions close with these words:

"It cannot be too strongly urged upon you nor can you too earnestly impress upon the officers and crew under your command that the service in which you and they are engaged should be performed with forbearance and discrimination. The Government relies on your prudence, discretion and firmness in the performance of the special duties entrusted to you."

There is no jingo spirit shown in those instructions, there is no undue irritating spirit shown in those instructions. If my hon. friend will take up the instructions which are issued in the second year he will find that they are still further broadened and made more liberal, and beside liberal provisions having been made for the reporting of vessels to the captains of those cruisers who are on the grounds in their ports, there were direct and positive instructions issued that in all cases they were to extend all possible courtesies with reference to United States fishermen. The second instruction ends with the words:

"The Government rely upon your judgment actuated with a spirit of forbearance to undertake the delicate and important duties with which you are entrusted."

Now, Sir, there is nothing of that sort shown in the instructions which were issued, neither, Sir, was there anything of that kind shown in the way in which our cruisers and their captains acted under the instructions that the Government gave them with reference to United States fishing vessels. It has been stated by men in this Parliament; it has been stated by the organs of hon. gentlemen opposite; it has been thrown broadcast through the United States press that no courtesy and no leniency was shown to United States fishermen, but that every pretext was taken advantage of in order to harass and provoke them. I hold in my hand a list, and not by any means a complete list, of the courtesies that were shown and of the mild and generous treatment which was accorded to United States fishing vessels for all infractions of the rules which were not considered to be important infractions. The Joseph Storey, a vessel that was detained in the very first of the protection service, had bought supplies and did not report to the customs. When the report was made to the Minister of Marine, it being her first offence, she was ordered to be at once released, with a warning. The Government had just the same right to take that vessel, under the custom laws, as they had to take any other vessel that violated those laws. But there was a different course pursued in reference to them. The schooner Hereford was detained for shipping a man, and was released immediately with a warning. The Boyton was allowed to land an injured man from her vessel for medical attention. The Fanny Starling was allowed to purchase provisions for her homeward voyage. The French was allowed to ship a crew to take the vessel home when he discharged her own crew, and was detained for repairs quite a long time. The French and Argonaut were seized within the three-mile limit and their crews allowed to be shipped home in United States fishing vessels. Technically we could have insisted that they should not have this privilege, but we gave the privilege and gave it heartily. The schooner Perkins had shipped a man illegally and was detained, but she was released after discharging the man. The schooner Gracey was allowed to ship men to take the vessel home. The schooner Perkins was extended the same courtesy. The schooner Pendragon whose crew had sickness on board, was, under medical advice, allowed to purchase fresh provisions and meats of all kinds just as long as the doctor gave a certificate that it was necessary for the health of the crew. The schooner J. W. Day was allowed to ship men to replace those who were taken ill. The schooners Mary Steele and John S. Quinn were allowed to buy provisions for the homeward voyage. The schooner Oscar Hatton was allowed to take a new set of sails, as her own through disaster had become useless, and the vessel, in consequence, was rendered partly unmanageable. The N. H. Fry, the Senator Fry, the Rice, and other vessels were allowed to purchase provisions and take them on their homeward voyage, their own provisions having been casually exhausted. The collector at North Sydney gives a list of a large number of vessels to whom he allowed such courtesies, and besides that, vessels which met with disaster at sea and had been driven in by heavy storms and which were obliged to put in the slip for repairs, were allowed to sell the fresh fish which they had on board, which would otherwise have spoiled and put the parties concerned to loss and inconvenience. These, Sir, are a few of the courtesies among the many that, in 1886 and 1887, were freely given to United States fishermen, and given with the best of spirit. This, I think, is enough, strong enough, and ample enough to disprove the assertion that there was a spirit of malice and a spirit of desire to irritate and provoke which actuated the carrying out of this service. Let me go one step further. I can give an answer, and I think a sufficient reason, to the charge that 1886 and 1887 the protection service was carried out in a spirit of undue interference with the rights and privileges of United States fishermen. We must recollect that that service was new in 1886, and that new men undertook it. Of all that had been connected with our previous protection service, only Captain Scott was concerned in the protection service of 1886 and 1887. The captains of our vessels were new men, the service was new and we must recollect as well that in that first year, 1886, United States fishermen came down upon our coasts in very different spirit to what they came in 1887. They came not knowing exactly what treatment they were to receive, or what rights they were to have or what privileges they were to claim in our waters. They came down from Gloucester and other fishing towns where there was an idea that they would not be treated in the same strict way that they had in 1870 and 1871. Their own papers had favored the idea that commercial privileges would now be granted and that "touch" and "trade" permits would carry them into all the ports of Canada and carry them safely through. So with all those things was it to be wondered at that collisions had taken place? Was it to be wondered at that interference, lawful and proper interference, had to be taken with reference to those vessels? The wonder is, and the only wonder, that under such circumstances the protection service could have been carried on for those two years without more causes having occurred of interference and undue interference than did actually occur. The captains of the fishery protection vessels boarded in 1886 780 vessels and in 1887 1,362 vessels.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend says "hear, hear"; let me draw his attention—

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Let me ask the hon. gentleman whether they were boarded in the harbors or outside?

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend a year ago, I think, tried to make a strong point in this House because our fishery protection vessels did not overhaul and board them outside of the three-mile limit, where they had no right to overhaul them. We are under no right to overhaul them or board them there.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman will bear with me, I am sure. I did not intend to make a point that they did not board them outside the three-mile limit, but that they confined their boarding to the vessels while they were lying at anchor, and did not attempt to board them while they were within the three-mile limit but outside of the harbor.

Mr. FOSTER. There again my hon. friend is wrong. The fishery protection vessels board the vessels inside the three-mile limit wherever they think it necessary to do it, and they board them outside the harbor as well as inside the harbor; but my hon. friend knows well enough that in one port, for instance, in the port of Souris, a fishing fleet of sometimes 200 vessels will lie at anchor at night, and the cruiser is there with them, and goes out with them in the morning to cruise about them during the day and to watch that foreign vessels do not come within the three-mile limit. If they do, the cruiser has a right to overhaul and seize them. The boarding takes place wherever it is necessary, and the captain of the cruiser is the judge as to where it is necessary. Well, Sir, as I was stating, 1,362 vessels were boarded in 1887, and 700 in 1886; and of all the vessels that were boarded in those two years only 30 cases have been brought to the attention of this Government by the Executive of the United States, and it is certain that everyone who had a fairly grounded complaint made that complaint to the Secretary of State for the United States and that the complaint was investigated and forwarded to the Canadian Government through the British Government. But thirty-two cases in all of United States vessels were dealt with by the Dominion of Canada in those two years. Now, Sir, will you listen to me for a moment, while I detail the circumstances of these thirty-two cases, to see whether or not the statement is borne out that undue interference, arbitrary, harsh, unwarranted interference, has taken place with respect to those vessels? The complaint with reference to five of them was that they were refused commercial privileges. Will my hon. friend say that that was harsh treatment, to refuse a United States vessel commercial privileges in our ports? That is the contention to which he gave his adhesion; consequently, the carrying out of that contention is no grievance to a United States vessel, and no evidence of harsh treatment on the part of this Government. As to four of those vessels, the complaint was that they were warned off a head line. When the complaint was investigated the collector of Customs charged with having given the warning denied that he had given any other warning to them than to hand them the printed warning issued from the Department. With reference to three of them, he said they had not been in the port, as was alleged in the grievance. There was no hardship. One was refused the purchase of bait or to ship men. That was no grievance; it was within our right.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that because it is within his right to refuse to let a vessel ship men, therefore it ought not to be allowed to ship men? Is that his contention?

Mr. FOSTER. It is my hon. friend's contention, if consistent.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No.

Mr. FOSTER. Did he not give his adhesion to this contention, that we had a right to refuse the purchase of provisions, the shipment of men and the purchase of bait?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I beg to say that I have not spoken on this question, and I have never pretended to give my adhesion to anything. I have neither spoken for nor against the policy of the Government. I have spoke of the legal contention, nothing else.

Mr. FOSTER. Did the hon. gentleman approve of the legal contention made by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, that Canada under the Treaty of 1818 had a right to refuse commercial privileges to United States vessels?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Had the power to exclude—certainly I said so. How far should we act on the right or the power is a different question, and that question I propose to discuss when the hon. gentleman gets through.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend, then, is exactly in the position of a gentleman who is in favor of the law, but against its enforcement.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Not at all. I wish to call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that he has undertaken to defend the Government by saying that they did protect their rights in four cases. Now, he mentions a case of one sort, and he says the Government acted properly because they did not allow those parties to ship men. Surely the hon. gentleman must see how he is himself arguing on both sides of the policy, although he is on one side of the law.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend is quite wrong. He has probably misunderstood me. I mentioned the cases of four vessels with reference to which the complaint had been made that they had been warned off a head line which extended from point to point some forty or fifty miles, and I simply stated that the collector denied that he had warned them off from that extended head line, or had given any warning to them except simply to do, as his duty was, to give them the printed warning sent him by the department. I did not argue on both sides as to that.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but that is not the case to which I referred. I referred to the case of the shipment of men, obtaining supplies and making repairs.

Mr. FOSTER. I have stated the facts with reference to both of those cases. In the case of one vessel, the grievance was that she was warned off from fishing in the Bay of Chaleurs. In the case of another, the Marion Grimes, the complaint was with regard to interference with her flag, and the fishery correspondence will show that the regrets of the Government were immediately sent—not that there was a technical wrong, but it was thought that such action on the part of the captains of the cruisers should not be countenanced. One vessel had some trouble about the salvage of a seine that gave rise to a complaint and a very strong remonstrance from the Secretary of State; but after having received the answer of the Canadian Government, the Secretary of State wrote to the gentleman who made the complaint, to say that from the evidence which was given, it was clear that his case was not one relating to the fisheries or international rights, but that it was simply a case of salvage, and he could get his seine by complying with the laws of Canada with reference thereto. Another case was on alleged refusal to grant the sale of provisions for the homeward voyage. When this came to be investigated, it was found that the statement was untrue. One was for illegal fishing, and the vessel was forfeited. Another was for buying bait. Six were for minor violations of customs regulations where no penalty was mentioned and the vessels were discharged with a warning. Nine cases were for violations in customs laws and for smuggling and the like, in which penalties were imposed, and a part of the penalties were afterwards remitted. That makes up the whole list, and after careful investigation of these cases, I think they fairly disprove the assertion that there has been unnecessary harshness, undue influence, or any desire to stretch the authority of the Government with the view of irritating the United States fishermen or people. I wish to call the attention of the House to two facts. One is that the Government of Great Britain, which has been described to-night as sensitive on that question, has renewed all the correspondence and reports with reference to these cases, and in no single instance has the Government of Great Britain found fault with the action of the Dominion Government. Further, and this is also important, these grievances were forwarded by the Secretary of State for the United States to the Dominion Government, and the report as to the facts after investigation was sent back, and in only one instance was there an attempt made to refute the facts. In only one instance was there any further correspondence had as to the facts of a case reported upon to the United States by the Dominion Government. It cannot be said that in the course of the two years during which this protection service has been in operation, any man was deprived of his liberty or that any strong or undue interference took place with reference to the subjects of the United States. Taking the whole history, as given in the fishery reports which are before Parliament, and in this additional information which I have been glad to give to-night, I think it is fairly well known that there was no desire shown by the Government to unduly interfere with American fishermen in any spirit of retaliation, but that, on the contrary, in the carrying out of the protection service for the two years, a wise, prudent and generous policy on the part of this Government was carried out. I wish briefly to deal with the oft-repeated assertion that this treaty is a complete surrender. Nearly every hon. gentleman, who has spoken on the opposite side, has said that the United States have obtained everything they asked for, and that the concessions have been entirely on our side. The record, I maintain, entirely disproves that assertion. What were the contentions of the United States? First, with reference to the headland limit, the American contention from the earliest date of this controversy down to the present time, notwithstanding the iron exception of Mr. Webster as Secretary of State, which was a qualified exception, I maintain has been always for a restricted interpretation of the headland question. They have almost uniformly contended that their vessels should approach to within three miles of the shores, and as to the bays their limit was not more than six miles wide. The proposition, one of the very latest propositions made by the Secretary of State for the United States in 1837, was that the extreme limit should be three miles from the shore and ten miles as regards bays. That is the contention of the United States, as laid down in the fishery correspondence, and embodied in the proposal for a commission to settle this question, which was made by Mr. Secretary Bayard. The contention of Canada was, in its broader terms, that the line should be drawn from headland to headland, and that it should be three miles from the shore in other respects. Well, a commission was held to settle the difficulty. It has been stated that the Government opposed very strongly a settlement on the ten mile bay limit when it was proposed to them. They did oppose it, because, as they stated, if that were carried out, it would take out of the jurisdiction of Canada, bays such as the Bay of Chaleurs, which are peculiarly Canadian bays, and which ought not to be opened to the United States fishermen. Neither side has had its extreme contention, so far as the headlands line is concerned, agreed to. Both have made concessions, but notwithstanding the strong remarks made by my hon. friend who spoke last (Mr. Mitchell), I hold that you may take the map of Canada, you may take your compasses and you may take in the extreme western point of the Bay of Fundy and go around the whole coast until you come to the coast of Labrador, and you will find that Canada's construction has not been so very far departed from. You will find, notwithstanding the statements that have been made, that Canada's concessions have not in any very important and essential particular taken away from her the fishery privileges and the rights she practically enjoyed during the series of years that have passed.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Nine-tenths of the water area for which she contended has been given up, and nineteen-twentieths on the coast of Newfoundland.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a point on which my hon. friend and myself cannot agree.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am perfectly willing to accept the measure of any competent surveyor who will undertake to compare the two lines.

Mr. FOSTER. And we will abide by that measurement, if you get a competent man to make it. With reference to the bait question, the statement is that Canada has given up everything to the United States. You will find throughout the whole correspondence, the contention was made by the Americans that their fishing vessels should have the right to buy bait, and that they also claimed the right of transshipment, and backed that claim up by the very strongest arguments. On the other hand, the Canadian contention was that, under the Treaty of 1818, transshipment could not be allowed. Let my hon. friend read the treaty, and he will find whose contention has been in the main carried out. In reference to that it was the declared contention in the United States that the penalties were excessive. These have been moderated to a certain extent, and that is a concession to the United States, so far as that goes. On the other hand, the penalties that have been retained are sufficient for the purpose. With reference to the customs laws, the Americans claimed that when their vessels entered our ports for any of the four purposes mentioned, they should not, no matter how long they staid, be subject to our customs laws. Canada contended that they should, and in that respect there has been a concession on both sides. But the large concession has not been on the part of Canada. Commercial privileges were claimed by the United States in their papers and despatches, and their arguments all went to show that they had their right now, under the changed order of things brought about by widened commercial relations, to commercial privileges in our ports for their fishing vessels without touch and trade permits. That is a contention which was directly adverse to the Canadian contention. Will my hon. friend find out which contention has been given up in respect of that? With reference to the harbor dues and other dues, the United States contention was that their vessels should not pay them. It was the contention of Canada that she had a perfect right to demand payment, and payment has been made. These dues have been given up. That is a concession by Canada, but the harbor regulations have been kept, and that is a concession to the principle that those laws hold good. So, if you take these different controverted points and look at the contentions of Canada and the contentions of the United States, and read the treaty fairly and candidly, you will find that the treaty itself is a record of mutual concessions and that it is far away from the truth to say that the United States have had all their demands granted and that the concessions have been altogether on the part of the Dominion of Canada. At this late stage of the debate, I do not intend to take up the time of the House much longer. I was anxious to make this simple statement with reference to the carrying out of the protective service, and there were one or two points in reference to the treaty in regard to which I thought some misapprehensions should be corrected. I do not think it is worth while to seriously attempt to controvert the positions taken by the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) with reference to the interpretations of articles 10 and 11 of the treaty as it stands. The wording is plain. It does not seem that a fair and candid reading of it can lead to any other conclusion than what is stated by the words themselves as to what is meant and what will be carried out if the treaty comes into force. In the first place, the validity of the harbor regulations is affirmed. United States vessels, putting in for shelter or repairs, are not required to report if they remain only twenty-four hours, provided they do not communicate with the shore, but, if they remain more than twenty-four hours, or if they communicate with the shore, they are to report to the customs, and at any rate they are under customs supervision. That is far wide from the statement of the hon. gentleman that the customs laws are given away entirely, and that we have no customs supervision over United States vessels. My hon. friend tried to make a strong point in regard to these vessels being allowed to come in for supplies, and he said that would practically open the three-mile limit inshore to these vessels, and would practically give them the fishing inshore. I noticed that that statement was applauded by many hon. gentlemen on the other side, but would that be a whit worse than the condition of affairs at present? My hon. friend said that, if a cruiser overhauled a vessel, she would say she was going in for supplies, and under that excuse the three miles would be in reality opened up to the unrestricted use of United States vessels. Why, to-day United States vessels have a perfect right to go into our ports for wood, water, shelter or repairs; and what is there to prevent a United States fishing vessel doing the same thing? If a cruiser overhauls her, she may say: I am going in for wood or for water or for repairs. The same excuse exists to-day as would exist under this treaty, and, if it were possible now to protect the inshore waters, it is equally possible to protect them under this treaty. Another hon. gentleman was exercised because, under this treaty, the price of bait would be raised to the deep sea fishermen, and yet he stated directly afterwards that what was especially needed was a free market for our productions in the United States. Well, for free fish in the United States markets, as it was under the Treaty of Washington, it is plain that we must give as a compensation the right to buy bait. The hon. gentleman finds fault with this because it gives the right to buy bait by giving a fee and so enhances the price of bait to the deep-sea fishermen, and yet he is in favor of a treaty which would open the markets to these fishermen in the United States, when the same effect would be found, to make bait dearer in the same way. The modus vivendi would go out of force the moment the privilege of free fish is given, and it is the same in regard to the price of bait. Some hon. gentlemen who have spoken on the other side have made a great deal of the inconsistencies of the Government and the inconsistencies of the positions which have been taken. I think it comes with a rather poor grace from gentlemen on the opposite side to speak of inconsistencies with reference to this fishery question. When in 1871, the Washington Treaty was brought about and was before this House for ratification, gentlemen on the other side opposed that treaty by might and main. They were especially opposed to that treaty because it proposed for a money consideration, to give the use of our fisheries to the Americans. They said it was selling our birthright for a mess of pottage. Yet, in 1877, when the arbitration was held at Halifax, they plumed themselves, when the award was made, on having gained that award themselves, and from that time to this they have not ceased to make out of it something that they should gain credit for. They have attacked the Government for taking the first opportunity which was given them to secure a commission. They have then attacked the Government equally for enforcing the laws, when they failed to get the commission which was at first proposed. Sometimes it seems to be a wonder, in view of all the statements that we have heard from the other side, that we should have been able to get a treaty at all; and it is still more a wonder that the commission should have been able to obtain the treaty which it framed. The difficulties which were created, so far as the Opposition were concerned, were not favorable conditions in the United States towards the consummation of a treaty. For some years back the people of the United States have been sedulously creating the feeling that harshness has been used by us in the treatment of their vessels, and a great deal of the feeling in the United States of unnecessary harshness on the part of Canada has taken its rise from utterances which have been made in Canada itself, in the newspapers of Canada, which have gone to the United States, and their statements have been accepted as authoritative statements as to the position of Canada in this regard. They have sedulously created the opinion in the United States that Great Britain would not back up the contentions of Canada, and so have striven to weaken us in what should be, and is really, the strongest point in Canada's claim for getting a treaty with the United States in reference to this matter. They have given currency to the idea that Canada is falling to pieces, that she is disintegrating, that the different parts are separating from each other, and that in time it will fall to pieces, and then it will become gradually a part of the United States. The idea that there was no future for Canada in herself, but that annexation or absorption by the United States was her ultimate destiny—that sentiment has been created and has been spread in the United States, from the utterances of men in the Opposition, and papers in the Opposition, and that has been a very great difficulty in the way of the proper sentiment, on the other side, for granting us the advantages of a treaty. It has been stated here to-night that Canada has been deserted by the British Government, that Great Britain is but a name behind her; and my hon. friend, in solemn tones and sad, gave voice to his opinion that Canada need no longer look to Great Britain for support and for aid with reference to this great question, but that Great Britain had so acted in this matter as to put the finishing blow to his loyalty to the mother country, and that in the future, he would owe little of that spirit to the mother country. Sir, the only sentiment which was strongly applauded in the speech of the hon. gentleman, was that sentiment he uttered with reference to Great Britain, and with reference to the oozing out of his loyalty to Great Britain. I do not wish to stand here, as a Canadian citizen, as well as one who knows something of Great Britain's course with reference to this fishery matter during the two years that have passed—I do not wish to stand here and let that assertion pass without giving it, so far as I am concerned, my denial. I say that Great Britain has stood well by us in these two years that have just passed; I say that every contention that has been put forth has been backed by the Government of Great Britain, and that in all respects she has fairly, and consistently, and continuously given force to our contentions, and has stood at the back of Canada in this matter. Sir, an attempt was made to make it appear that Mr. Chamberlain was not the proper person to be entrusted with the commission, and his commission had not been made public a day before influential journals in this country and influential men in this country, set themselves to work to undermine his influence with the people of the United States, and to raise prejudices there against him. That did not look very much like aiding towards the settlement of this question. The attempt to arouse prejudice against Mr. Chamberlain, to arouse race prejudice against him in the United States, in order that his mission might be defeated, was an attempt which will not bear scrutiny, and which will not gain the approval of fair and candid men in this country, or in any other country. Sir, I do not think so of the people of the United States, I do not think so of the Irish people, either, who are a generous people, whose impulses are generous. Whatever love they may have for their own island, whatever desire they may have to see her gain privileges and advantages that they think she has not now, I do not think that Irishmen are made of that kind of material that they would try to break down the influence of Mr. Chamberlain, or to oppose the settlement of a question with which he was entrusted, simply because they and he did not agree with reference to Irish matters, and the policy that should be pursued by Great Britain with reference to Irish affairs. I believe, Sir, and I take pleasure in stating here what my hon. friend has so well said with much greater authority, that Mr. Chamberlain did his duty nobly and well, so far as Canada was concerned in this matter, that he stood by her contentions, that he loyally supported them, and that, though he started out for the purpose of getting a treaty, he would not have started excepted for that purpose; he started, I believe, with the firm purpose of getting such a treaty as would be honorable to both countries, and as would be fair to the rights of Canada as the party greatly interested in the settlement of the question. Now, what will hon. gentlemen opposite do with reference to this treaty? All through the country their papers have denounced this treaty in the strongest terms. Sir, the head lines that have been printed with reference to this treaty ought to be preserved. "Canada lies a-bleeding," says the Mail.

Mr. MITCHELL. And truly, too.

Mr. FOSTER. "A complete surrender," says the Globe; "Secretary Bayard's victory," says the Mail; "A complete give away," says the Halifax Chronicle; "Canada betrayed," says the Ottawa Free Press; "So far as the United States are concerned, they have got everything they ever contended for," the Hon. Peter Mitchell; "The great Tupperian surrender," Halifax Recorder; "A base, beggarly blundering surrender," Attorney General Longley. These are some of the statements made by the party opposite outside.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to use my name in connection with this?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. What did Peter Mitchell say?

Mr. FOSTER. "So far as the United States are concerned, they have got everything they ever contended for."

Mr. MITCHELL. So I say now.

Mr. FOSTER. Then I did not misrepresent the hon. gentleman. This is what they have said outside, and we who have listened to those speeches inside, have heard every hon. gentleman who has spoken in opposition intimate, if they did not use the words, that it was a "base and beggarly surrender," that it was a "complete give away," that it would be completely injurious to the fisheries interests of this country; and yet, with all these strong assertions outside, and with all these strong assertions inside, to back him up, my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies), after framing this indictment, and declaring that it was disgraceful to Canada and injurious to her interest, declared in the same breath that he did not intend to oppose the treaty. What will hon. gentlemen do? Are they honest in what they are saying? Are these head lines candid? Are they carrying out the real feelings of their hearts, or is it simply a something that they are putting before the people for party purposes which they do not sufficiently believe in to back up by their votes in the House? Now, Sir, in closing, I have just this to say in reference to the treaty. Everyone knows the length of time that this controversy has existed; everybody who has read the history of this question knows the difficulty which has surrounded it, the irritation which has been provoked. Sir, I believe that the Dominion of Canada, in its large and broad heart, from end to end, will be in favor of this treaty, not because it holds every contention that Canada has made, not because it carried out everything that Canada could wish had been carried out, but because it is, as stated by the President and Secretary of the United States, a fair and honorable arrangement on both sides, in which neither country gets the full of its contention, but in which neither country suffered great injury by the concessions that have been made. Taking into account the future of Canada, her future interests as well as her present interests, taking into account the fact that we are to live beside a great and powerful neighbor, that we form part of a great and powerful empire, and that we have conserved our interests to a very large degree, and that there is a prospect for the future of a permanent settlement of this question, I believe that the great heart of Canada, notwithstanding the head lines and the strong assertions, will beat with this one sentiment, that after all this long controversy of year upon year, it is a happy, a fair, a good settlement, one that has been made in the interests of peace and in the interests of the two great countries which ought to live beside each other in amity and good feeling. Sir, the executives of the four countries of Newfoundland, Canada, Great Britain and the United States have brought this question from its tumultuous condition, have taken it out of the arena where it has been discussed as an irritating question for seventy years, and they have come to a final and permanent solution, so far as they are concerned. They say that this arrangement is fair to all parties concerned, and they relegate it now to the Parliaments and Congresses of the great nations. Notwithstanding all that may be said for party purposes and all that may be argued for interested purposes, I believe that if the voice of the country could penetrate to the halls of all those Parliaments and Congresses and have its way, that it would result in an approbation of this treaty and of this instrument as a conclusion, final, honorable and on the whole advantageous to all parties concerned. It is in that view that I support the treaty, and it is with those feelings that I hope the treaty will be finally ratified by all the powers concerned and will put an end to a vexed and troublesome question in what I consider a truly honorable and happy way.

Mr. KIRK. I move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. MITCHELL. On this motion I desire to offer a few observations in reply to the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. I certainly did not expect from the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) the remarks which he has made about myself. He has chosen to drag my name into this debate in a way which I think is quite unwarranted. I think the course I adopted in this debate was one of forbearance, and I refrained from speaking of the hon. gentleman's conduct, not referring to it throughout my speech except in one instance in regard to the Adams. I have said that history repeated itself, that the taking up of a weak case, the case of the schooner Washington seized in the Bay of Fundy, when it was doubtful whether she was in British territory or not, led to the loss of the Bay of Fundy and the opening up to the Americans of that bay and the subsequent claim on their part of right of access to all other bays. History indeed repeats itself. I have forborne to speak as plainly as I could have spoken, and I have not touched upon some points I might have dwelt on in regard to the hon. gentleman's administration of the department; although I have expressed myself frankly it has not been in hostility to the administration of the day, nor do I desire to defeat their effort to get this treaty carried elsewhere. I have foreborne; but I tell the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that through his misconduct and his want of efficiency in raising the question of these treaties and the rights of Canadian fisheries in the case of the Adams, seizing a vessel when there was a doubt about our right to seize her, releasing her and subsequently seizing her on customs grounds, these acts show that the case of Canada has been placed in a similar position to what it was when the case of the Bay of Fundy was raised on the seizure of the Washington. This whole question has arisen on account of the misconduct, mismanagement and maladministration of the department over which the hon. gentleman presides. If bad feeling has arisen, as he has described, with the United States, when did it arise? Did it exist before 1885? No. No such feeling existed in the United States at that time. That ill-feeling has existed since is true. Does the hon. gentleman want the proof? Let him take up—I did not think he would be so discreet to bring it up at this time of the evening—Mr. P. Phelps's despatch to the British Minister, and he will find that was the cause of the ill-feeling in the United States. It was due to the senseless seizures for petty offences. Mr. Phelps in addressing Lord Roseberry says:

"It would be at most, under the circumstances, only an accidental and purely technical breach of a custom house regulations, by which no harm was intended, and from which no harm came, and would, in ordinary cases, be easily condoned by an apology, and perhaps the payment of costs."

He further says:

"Can it be reasonably insisted under these circumstances that by the sudden adoption, without notice, of a new rule, a vessel of a friendly nation should be seized and forfeited for doing what all similar vessels had for so long a period been allowed to do without question?"

"It is sufficiently evident that the claim of a violation of the Customs Act was an after-thought brought forward to give whatever added strength it might to the principal claim on which the seizure had been made."

Again:

"I submit to your Lordship that a construction so harsh, so unfriendly so unnecessary, and so irritating as that set up by the Canadian authorities is not such as Her Majesty's Government has been accustomed either to accord or to submit to. It would find no precedent in the history of British diplomacy, and no provocation in any action or assertion of the Government of the United States."

Again:

"Of the obvious conclusion the Canadian authorities seem to be quite aware. I am informed that since the seizures they have pressed, or are pressing, through the Canadian Parliament in much haste, an Act which is designed, for the first time in the history of the legislation under this treaty, to make the facts upon which the American vessels have been seized illegal, and to authorize proceedings against them therefor."

Still again:

"The practical construction given to the treaty down to the present time has been in entire accord with the conclusions thus deduced from the Act of Parliament. The British Government has repeatedly refused to allow interference with American fishing vessels, unless for illegal fishing, and has given explicit orders to the contrary."

In the face of that this vessel was seized. Three examinations were held. She was allowed to go, and because she drifted on the bar in Digby harbor she was seized and held—after she was seized for preparing to fish and was released she was seized under customs regulation, and the First Minister knows that it was upon that he contended for the conviction of that vessel. Yet his Minister of Fisheries dares to attack me because I have expressed my opinion. Both of them know they seized that vessel illegally, and on that illegal seizure, the first of a number of illegal seizures for trifles, this great question of the fisheries has come up, and our case has been given away at Washington.

Mr. THOMPSON. I beg to inform the hon. gentleman that he is entirely mistaken.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am not. I think I know as much about it as you do.

Mr. THOMPSON. Perhaps the hon. gentleman does not wish to know, but the Adams when she was seized was never released and continues unreleased up to this moment.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Adams, after she was seized, was released, and when she was sailing out of the harbor she was seized again.

Mr. THOMPSON. No, no.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think I am right.

Mr. THOMPSON. The Adams when she was seized was never allowed to go. She was visited by one of the officers of the Lansdowne, and the statement made by the captain justified the captain of the Lansdowne not seizing her. It was ascertained before she got very far that that statement was entirely untrue, and she was then seized for the first time, and has been seized ever since.

Mr. MITCHELL. Say what you like, she was visited by the officers and seized for a breach of the customs regulations. She got away and was stranded on a bar and could not get out, and she was seized a second time. Those are the kind of acts that brought about the concessions in the treaty.

Mr. THOMPSON. She was never seized until she was seized on the first occasion, and has never been released since. It was not because she stranded on the bar, but she was seized for two offences—buying bait and evading custom dues.

Mr. MITCHELL. The hon. gentleman has the faculty of making words suit himself.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MITCHELL. I rise to explain.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MITCHELL. I rise to an explanation.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will have order. I rise to an explanation. I am not going to be misrepresented, even by the Minister of Justice. What I have said is this: I said the vessel, after having been twice visited—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am in order, and you had better keep quiet and you will get away quicker. I say that vessel was twice visited by those officers and they did not seize her, and it was after they had failed to be able to find any act for which to seize her that the vessel was going out of the harbor when she accidentally grounded and she was then seized. I say that this is true.

Mr. THOMPSON. That is an entire mistake. If the hon. gentleman reads the book he has under his hand he will see he is wrong from beginning to end.

Mr. MITCHELL. I know what I am talking about.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I hope the motion for adjournment was made to allow the hon. gentleman to make the statement he has made. I hope there is no object in pressing it.

Mr. MITCHELL. No; that was my object.

Motion for adjournment withdrawn.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). When the hon. gentleman rose I did rise to move the adjournment of the debate. It is now one o'clock in the morning and I wish to address the House upon this subject. There are several gentlemen here who also wish to address the House, and I am quite sure that on a matter of this importance the Government, anxious as they are to carry the Bill confirming the treaty, will not insist upon the second reading of the Bill to-night.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would like to say to the hon. gentleman that there was a distinct understanding with the other side that this discussion should close to-night.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would correct the hon. gentleman. He will remember that it was an informal conversation and not an official understanding.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Quite so.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I told him that we were quite willing, if we could, to close the thing to-night, but he will recollect that I told him I could only speak for the gentlemen around me, and I expressly excepted the hon. the leader of the third party. There is no doubt whatever but that that hon. gentleman had a perfect right to speak when he pleased. Had the Minister of Marine replied to my friend from Halifax and had the debate been confined within the limits of the Ministers and the parties who are more especially conversant with the matter like my hon. friend the member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) the debate might easily have closed. Certainly the hon.

Mr. MITCHELL,

gentleman will not pretend to say that I entered into anything like a formal agreement with him to close the debate to-night.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I certainly understood that the hon. gentleman was quite prepared to have the discussion close to night. It is quite true that he intimated that he and the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) had some remarks to make, but that they would not be very lengthened, and he did not know what time would be occupied by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell). As the hon. gentleman is aware, there has been very little speaking on this side, and the greater portion of the time has been occupied by the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) and the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell).

Mr. MITCHELL. And the Finance Minister, too.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am speaking of the discussion to-day. The hon. member for Shelburne (Gen. Laurie), who represents a fishing county, made a few brief remarks, and the speeches generally were brief. It could hardly be expected that the debate should close without the Minister of Marine making some reference to his administration which was referred to.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Certainly not.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. With the pressure of public business, and with the questions which I have myself to bring before the House, which will require a great deal of attention, I must ask the hon. gentleman to allow the second reading to take place to-night. There will be no difficulty at a further stage of the debate, for if hon. gentlemen wish to deal with any particular subject they will have abundant opportunity.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman cannot attach importance to the second reading to-night.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I attach the greatest importance to the second reading or I would not press it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I can understand that the third reading would be a matter of importance.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is the second reading of the Bill to which I attach importance.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) wishes to speak.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We shall be happy to hear him.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I also have some remarks to make on this matter.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We will listen to both with great patience.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is perfectly unreasonable and unfair. We are quite willing to expedite public business, but at the same time when you have a great question like this—a question of first-rate importance—undoubtedly members should have an opportunity of speaking on it, and undoubtedly they should have an opportunity of speaking at a reasonable time in the morning. Now, the House is quite exhausted listening attentively to this discussion since three o'clock this afternoon. I was about to make a suggestion to the hon. gentleman which I thought would facilitate the business and that was that my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) should move the adjournment on the understanding that the second and third reading might be taken on Tuesday, which would give the hon. gentleman all the expedition he could possibly obtain. The debate, if it were forced must go on the third reading, which would lead to a greater delay.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am extremely anxious not to defer the second reading of this Bill until Tuesday. I think I may say further that my hon. friend knows the anxiety I have to get the second reading of this Bill. I attach the greatest possible importance to have the second reading of this Bill take place now, and at the same time I am extremely anxious to avoid anything that would cause undue personal inconvenience. If the hon. gentleman will consent to make it the first order of the day on Monday, I will consent to the adjournment, otherwise I must ask them to allow the second reading to take place to-night. I think I am as unable as any other gentleman in this House to remain here for any longer period.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We want to meet the hon. gentleman's views also, and suppose we do this. We can get through the unopposed notices of motion in an hour or two on Monday, and let us resume this debate on Monday evening at 8 o'clock.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. With the distinct understanding that we take the second reading at that sitting.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Certainly.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

THE BUDGET SPEECH.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is the hon. gentleman prepared to state definitely when he expects to make his Budget statement?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I hope to be able to make it this day week. I shall make a great effort to reach it by that time.

THE BOUNDARIES OF ONTARIO.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like to ask the hon. First Minister again whether he will be prepared to propose an address to confirm the award of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and the arbitrators with regard to the boundaries of Ontario. I make the inquiry, because, if it is not the hon. gentleman's intention, I desire to bring a motion on the subject before the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would say to the hon. gentleman that communications have been had with the Government of Ontario and draft bills have been interchanged, we proposed a draft Bill. An Order in Council has been passed, and will be sent by the first mail tomorrow to the Government of Ontario.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Can the hon. gentleman say whether he proposes in that draft Bill to deal with the boundaries as fixed by the arbitrators in 1878?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No, the draft Bill is to confirm that portion of the answer of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council which refers to the boundaries between Ontario and Manitoba.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That of course will embrace the boundary of Manitoba as contended for by Manitoba and the counsel for the Dominion, that is, to a line drawn due north from the junction of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers, which leaves a part of the Province of Manitoba north of the Albany River. The hon. gentleman will remember that the award of the Judicial Committee fixes the boundary on the west and the north. He proposes just to follow the award of the committee.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No, that portion of the answer which settles the western boundary of Ontario, which is the boundary between Manitoba and Ontario.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then I think I must go on with my motion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, go on.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 1.15 a. m. (Saturday).

Ottawa, Monday, April 16, 1888.

No. 35.

Necessary corrections to Members' Speeches, for the bound edition, must be forwarded to the Debates Office within twenty-four hours after the printed copies of the speeches have been circulated, as after that time the contractors may print the copies for the bound edition without further delay.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 16th April, 1888.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. LAURIER moved that Mr. Meigs be added to the following standing committees: Railway, Canals and Telegraph Lines, Standing Orders, Banking and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

THE OFFICIAL DEBATES.

Mr. DESJARDINS moved that the second report of the Committee on the Official Debates be concurred in. He said: The object of this report is to render justice to some officials who have been charged with responsible duties in connection with the Debates Committee and the publication of the official report. The first is in regard to Mr. Boyce, assistant to the Chief Reporter, who is recommended to receive an increase of salary. Mr. Boyce has been employed the whole year, and his duties are very responsible and are of a multifarious character. He has to see that copies are sent to members for correction, and that those corrections are made in the revised report; he has to keep track of matters connected with the printing, and in fact he is frequently compelled to remain two or three hours after the rising of the House. Every member of the committee is of the opinion that he fully deserves the increase recommended, and no one has found fault with the manner in which he has performed his duty. Moreover, he prepares the index of the Debates after the session. The second recommendation is in regard to Mr. Brewer, who is accountant of the committee, and who is charged with the performance of duties of a special and technical character. He has to measure the type and make up the accounts on which the printers are paid. This requires a special knowledge of printing, and after enquiry by a sub-committee it was found that his duties were of such a nature that he fully deserves the recommendation of $50 a year and $100 for past services. Mr. Hartney is also recommended to receive $100 for past services and $50 a year as clerk of the committee. He has to keep the records of the meetings of the committee, carry out the correspondence and everything connected with the meetings. We, therefore, considered it would be fair to acknowledge his services as well as the services of the others, and the committee has therefore made the recommendation I have named. He has acted as clerk of the committee since 1878. These are the recommendations contained in the report.

Mr. LANDRY. As I have not the report under my hand at the present moment, I should like to ask if it contains anything respecting nominations to fill vacancies caused by the dismissal of three of the translators.

Mr. DESJARDINS. Not at all; it only contains a recommendation respecting salaries to be paid to old officers.

Mr. DAVIN. In rising to support this motion I may say that we went into the question of the claims of these gentlemen, not once but several times. We had Mr. Brewer before us, and I confess when I saw the responsibility that was cast upon him I felt inclined, and many other member of the committee felt inclined, to give him more than is recommended in this report. The responsible duties discharged by Mr. Brewer, that of measuring up the matter, as any man who knows anything about printing is aware, are such that if he was not a man on whom this House could thoroughly rely the country might lose thousands of dollars in a year. In Mr. Brewer's case, therefore, there cannot be the least doubt that the recommendation of the committee is most moderate. I can speak, if I may use that term, with authority as to the claims of Mr. Boyce, because I had him associated with me on two occasions, during which I was able to measure his ability, his attentiveness, his accuracy and the reliability of the man to do any work he undertakes and to carry out with a skill I have never known equalled recommendations that might be made to him. Mr. Boyce is engaged in work requiring great care and great skill: one had only to explain to him what was needed and he entirely carried it out. In connection with the Hansard his duties are of an onerous and also of a responsible character. He not only corrects the first proofs but he sees that the corrections made by members are ultimately inserted in the speeches, and in addition to that he does work which is of the greatest importance so long as we have a Hansard, and that is to make an index. Unless that index is made well, I need hardly say that the value of that volume is greatly decreased, and one might also go so far as to say that the index is so far like a chain as a chain is not stronger than its weakest link, so the index is not valuable unless it is altogether complete and accurate and a sure means of reference. It seems to me that Mr. Boyce discharges his duties thoroughly and well, and if he discharges them thoroughly and well the amount suggested by the committee is a small sum for work so onerous and at the same time requiring so much skill. In regard to the other recommendation I am not so fitted to speak, because I do not know the circumstances; but, so far as I have had them explained to me I think that the recommendation is one also that the House should be ready to grant.

Mr. CHARLTON. As a member of the Debates Committee I rise to heartily endorse what has been said by the chairman of the committee and the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) especially with regard to the services of Mr.

Boyce, and to support the motion that an addition be made to his salary. I believe that even then he will be an underpaid servant. He is a most valuable officer and has served the House in the capacity which he follows at a very low pay indeed. Mr. Boyce most richly deserves the increase of salary proposed to be given to him.

Mr. CASEY. If the hon. Minister will allow me before closing the debate, I simply wish to add a few words to fully endorse all that has been said in regard to the value of this gentleman's services, and my endorsement leads me to the statement that even if this addition is made to the salaries of Mr. Brewer and Mr. Boyce with whom I am best acquainted, they will still remain rather underpaid than fully paid for the great services they render. They are both competent officers and discharge their important functions in a manner which has given great satisfaction to the House since they have been appointed, and I have known them both since they were appointed. I have great pleasure in endorsing, even this moderate measure of justice to those gentlemen.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am sorry the chairman had this report moved to-day, as we did not expect it to come up. I do not say he is wrong in doing so, but we did not expect it as it is not mentioned in the Order paper, and we had no time to consider it. I would ask, therefore, that the hon. gentleman postpone it to another day, so that the Government may have a chance of looking over the matter. Besides that, I must call the attention of my hon. friend the chairman, and the other members who have followed him in supporting the report, of the fact that this mode of increasing the salaries of officers of this House is hardly a proper one, and I do not think it will meet with the approval of the House. The officers of the House are put under the control of the Clerk of the House, with the Speaker over them all; but then the Committee on Internal Economy is appointed also according to law, by the Governor in Council, every year. They are members of this House, with the Speaker as chairman, and their duty is exactly to look over appointments and have vacancies filled. Some three years ago that committee made a report to the House, and classified the officers of the House and determined the salaries, which were acknowledged by the House as proper. Now, this committee can enquire if those officers are deserving officers, and if their pay is too small. If, by a report to the House of Commons, a committee can obtain this increase in salaries, will they not by that means do an injustice towards other officers who may be as deserving, but who will not have a chance of having their case brought before the attention of such a vigilant committee as the committee of which my hon. friend is chairman. I see that one of the officers whose salary is recommended to be increased is Mr. Hartney. I think Mr. Hartney is one of the clerks of the Railway Committee and of the Banking and Commerce Committee as well. He has been appointed the other day by the Railway Committee to be the examiner of all the Bills that are presented, in order to see that those Bills are exactly in accordance with the rules adopted by Parliament. This is extra work, and so that officer, finding that he can have an increase here, may come to the other committee and ask for another increase. We may have from that other committee a report in that direction. Those officers would then be increasing their salaries without any reference being paid to the Clerk of the House or to the Speaker. I certainly think that the best mode in a case of this kind would be that a recommendation on the part of the committee might be referred to the Commission on the Internal Economy of the House, of which the Speaker is the head. Then the matter would be according to the rules and would be more just to other officers of the House of Commons. If the hon. gentleman does not object, I would move the adjournment of the debate so that we may have time to consider the matter, unless he wishes to withdraw the motion.

Mr. CHARLTON.

Mr. DESJARDINS. I thought it had been understood that the report would come up for the concurrence of the House as soon as the other discussions had been finished. Last week I moved the adoption of the report, and the hon. the Minister asked me to postpone it until after the debate that was going on would be terminated. The matter has already been called to his attention and I understood that he would be ready to-day to consider the report. I have no interest whatever to press the adoption of the report before the House of Commons is ready to consider it. In the meantime I might observe this, that the committee is making this recommendation now in the way that they have always made such a recommendation and according to the practice that has been always followed. For my part, I am ready to accept the recommendation made by the Minister of Public Works, that it be referred to the Commission of Internal Economy or to the Speaker, as it can be done in such a manner that no injustice will be done to any other officer of the House. We are just following the practice now which has been followed since the creation of the official Debates.

Mr. LAURIER. There is no doubt whatever that the principle of the contention of the Minister of Public Works is right, but there is no doubt also that the officers connected with the Debates of this House have always been treated in a different category from other officers. This was contended for some few days ago by this side of the House, and my hon. friend, the chairman of the committee, did not support the views we took then. However, it is better late than never, and I am very glad to see that my hon. friend has resumed his privileges as chairman. For my part, I am ready to support him in the position he takes to-day. I would not support such a report with regard to any other officers than the officers of the Debates; but I come back to the position I laid down a moment ago, and also a few days ago, that the officers connected with the Debates are a special class, and have always been treated as such since the commencement of the Debates, and this report is only one of a long line of similar reports which from time to time have been adopted by this House.

Mr. SCRIVER. As a member of the committee, I desire to repeat substantially what my hon. leader has just been saying, that the committee have always looked on the persons connected with the Debates as in a somewhat different position from the other officers of the House, and what we have done in this instance is only in the line of what we have been doing in the past. Indeed, the present recommendations are of very much less importance than many that we have made before, especially that relating to the permanent translators, in which we recommend not only that their salaries should be increased, but that they should be employed permanently, and that was accepted by the House as a matter of course.

Mr. CHARLTON. I may also say that some three or four years ago the committee recommended to the House that the salaries of the reporters should be raised, and that report was adopted by the House. In fact, in every instance in which any change has been made in the emoluments received by any person connected with the Hansard staff, that change has been made on the recommendation of the committee; and I do not see how the committee could exercise control over the Debates, or could be made reasonably responsible for the proper conduct of the Debates, unless they had that power of making recommendations to the House. Here is a case where three officials on the Hansard staff are acknowledged to be underpaid, and that is especially the case with regard to Mr. Boyce. The increase for Mr. Boyce was recommended by the committee last year, but the report was not acted on, and during a year or more Mr. Boyce has been serving at a rate of pay which the committee last year reported was insufficient. If the matter now goes before the Commission of Internal Economy it will perhaps be laid over for another year, and cause considerable hardship to Mr. Boyce; for even if the recommendation of the committee is adopted, he will still be an underpaid official. Although, as a constitutional question, the Minister of Public Works no doubt takes a correct view of this matter, I think it will be better to continue the practice which has been in vogue hitherto, and allow the committee to exercise that jurisdiction over the officers of the Debates which they have exercised hitherto, and in this case to act on their recommendation.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. What I ask is to have the report postponed in order that we may consider it for a couple of days, after which the chairman of the committee may bring up his motion again. My remarks about the Commission of Internal Economy apply specially to Messrs. Hartney and Brewer, who are officers of this House. The other officer, Mr. Boyce, as I understand, is an officer under the committee, and not a regular officer of the House, and that would make the circumstances different. Under these circumstances, we would like a little time to look into the matter, and the House will perhaps agree to my motion to adjourn the debate.

Mr. DESJARDINS. It is understood that I shall be able to bring it up again in the same way.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes, in the same way, but the hon. gentleman will be kind enough to let me know when he intends to bring it up.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

REPRESENTATION OF BEAUHARNOIS.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House that he had received from Mr. Justice Bélanger, one of the Judges selected for the trial of controverted elections, his judgment relating to the election for the Electoral District of Beauharnois, by which judgment the sitting member had been declared to be duly elected.

THE CRIMINAL LAW.

Mr. THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 100) respecting the application to Canada of the Criminal Law of England. He said: In each of the Provinces there is a date at which the criminal law of England ceases to have application, and the result is a want of uniformity in the criminal code of Canada. The object of this Bill is to fix as the date the 1st of July, 1867, and to provide that the law of England, except in so far as it has been amended or repealed by any Provincial Act then in force or an Act of the Parliament of Canada subsequently passed, shall be applicable to Canada.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Would not that make a number of decisions on matters of criminal law that have been given by the different courts of the Provinces no longer applicable, and unsettle as well as settle? It would make a very slight difference, if the criminal law of England should be applicable; but at a subsequent stage, I will bring down a table showing the changes this would make.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

FISHERY BOUNTY CHEQUES.

Mr. FLYNN asked, Whether the Fishery Bounty cheques have been distributed to the fishermen yet? If not, when will they?

Mr. FOSTER. In some districts they have been already distributed; in others, they are being distributed. They differ for different districts.

MEGANTIC POSTAL SERVICE.

Mr. TURCOT asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to establish postal service between the villages of West Broughton and Lemesurier, in the County of Megantic, in view of the fact that while the said villages are but six miles apart, communication sent by mail must traverse a circuit of two hundred and sixty-two miles each way, and that there is a comparatively large business between the two places?

Mr. McLELAN. It is not the intention of the Government to establish such postal service.

UNOCCUPIED LANDS—OLD LEASES.

Mr. DAVIS asked, Whether the lands covered by old leases, which have not been stocked or occupied, are to be kept closed to settlement for an indefinite period?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No, these leases are being cancelled as rapidly as possible.

POSTAL SERVICE—VICTORIA COUNTY.

Mr. TROW (for Mr. BARRON) asked, Has the Government received petitions from the public in the vicinity of Uphill, in the County of Victoria, asking them to establish a daily postal service between Uphill and the village of Victoria Road? If so, when was the first petition or request in that behalf received? What answer was made to the petitioners, and what does the Government intend to do in the premises?

Mr. McLELAN. The Government has received petitions for a daily mail service over this route. The first petition received was dated 19th, October, 1886 and addressed to Hector Cameron, Esq. The reply given was that the Postmaster General would not accede to the petitioners' request.

INDIAN TREATY, PEACE RIVER AND ATHABASCA.

Mr. TROW (for Mr. BARRON) asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to make treaty with the Indians north of Treaty Six, in the Peace River and Athabasca District. If so, when?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is not the intention of the Government to make such a treaty now.

EMPLOYMENT OF SNETZINGER.

Mr. TROW (for Mr. BARRON) asked, Whether one Snetzinger was at any time employed as carpenter or otherwise in the Government shops at Cornwall? If so, was he dismissed? What was the date of his dismissal, and what was the reason of such dismissal?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Snetzinger was first employed on the Cornwall canal from January, 1885, until the end of that year, and also during the year 1886. He was also employed in January, February, March and April, 1887, and ten days in May, after which he ceased to be employed. His wages were two dollars per day.

INTERNATIONAL REGULATIONS.

Mr. AMYOT asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to submit to the proper party the draft of an international regulation, compelling the trading vessels of the Dominion of Canada to take the necessary precautions in the direction of making themselves distinguishable, during the night-time, from vessels of war; these vessels being thereby obliged to proclaim their non-belligerent character by some distinctive mark, most easily seen, by some mode of placing the masts, the yards, or form of hull, about which it would be impossible to make a mistake?

Mr. FOSTER. It is not the intention of the Government to submit to any party the draft of such an international regulation as is described in the question.

PROTECTION OF FISH.

Mr. AMYOT asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to appoint for the Gulf of St. Lawrence and for the Canadian waters of the Pacific, magistrates provided with the necessary powers for the protection of the fish within the limits reserved to us by treaty; and also for the protection of sea fowl and their eggs; these magistrates being obliged to reside on the coast itself and in the neighborhood of the places where the greater part of the depredations are committed?

Mr. FOSTER. The Government has its fishery officers appointed in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, as well as for the Canadian waters of the Pacific. These officers have magisterial powers, and they will be added to as is necessary for the proper protection of the fisheries. With reference to the sea fowl and their eggs, that is a matter which is under the jurisdiction of the Local Government.

WHALE FISHERIES.

Mr. AMYOT asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to prevent the whale fishery from being carried on during a certain period in Hudson Bay and vicinity? In case permission is granted to foreigners to engage in such fishery in Hudson Bay and vicinity, whether it is the intention of the Government to impose a license fee upon each vessel so engaged, and to prescribe the method in which such fishery shall be conducted?

Mr. FOSTER. It is not the intention of the Government to take any steps in that direction at present.

COLLISIONS ON THE HIGH SEAS.

Mr. AMYOT asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government, with the view of preventing as much as possible collisions on the high seas, to propose a law which will include the following provisions:—1. Prescribing to passenger-carrying steamships one track for the outward and one other track for the homeward passage, in order to divide what is now one course into two parallel courses; 2. Laying down a maximum speed in narrow channels in foggy weather; 3. Increasing the power of the lights carried, and bringing them more into harmony with the present high rate of speed possessed by these vessels?

Mr. FOSTER. That is a matter which is under the consideration of the Government.

HUDSON BAY SALMON RIVERS.

Mr. AMYOT asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to lease out the salmon rivers emptying into the Hudson Bay or in its vicinity?

Mr. FOSTER. That is under the consideration of the Government.

POSTMASTER, VICTORIA, B. C.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, Whether Robert Wallace, late postmaster at Victoria, B. C., has been superannuated? If so, what is his annual retired allowance under the Superannuation Act? Has time been added to his term?

Mr. AMYOT.

of service? If so, for what reason? What was his salary at time of retirement; who has been appointed in his place, and at what salary?

Mr. McLELAN. Mr. Wallace has been superannuated. The amount of his annual retiring allowance is now under the consideration of the Treasury, upon an appeal. No time has been added to his term of service. Mr. Webster has been appointed. His salary on retirement was $2,400. Mr. Noah Shakespeare has been appointed in his place at $2,000.

ALBERT RAILWAY COMPANY LOAN ACCOUNT.

Mr. ELLIS asked, What is the total amount of the Albert Railway Company loan account? To whom was the money paid? What security has the Government for the advances paid? Is the Albert Railroad now in operation?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The total amount voted as a loan was $15,000. There has been paid direct to the company on account of the loan, on reports of the chief engineer, and authorized by Order in Council, $13,778. The Government holds as security a mortgage on the road executed by the president and secretary of the company. I am not aware whether the road is now in operation or not.

SUBMARINE CABLE FROM PELEE ISLAND.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex) moved for:

Copies of all petitions, correspondence and reports respecting a submarine cable between Pelee Island and the Mainland.

He said: Although this public improvement for which we ask is in a portion of the country from which I come, still it is a matter of public interest, and one which all those who are interested in our inland marine should heartily support. Most of the wrecks which occur on Lake Erie occur in places which, if they were served by this cable, would not witness so many wrecks, and a great many more lives and property would be saved, and these lives and this property would have been saved if this cable had been laid down a few years ago. I hope the Government will see their way to going on with this work during the present summer. It is a matter of great importance to our vessel owners and to those engaged in our lake trade, and I think that all the details have been in the Department of Public Works for some years. I would be glad to see that the Government would deal with the matter without further delay. Last autumn some work was proposed to be done, and I do not hesitate to say that the construction of a submarine cable would be paid three times over by the cost of the loss of property which takes place. When a wreck takes place, the sending over to Windsor or some other port, and the cost of telegraphing from that place to the port where relief can be found causes a great deal of difficulty before the relief can come to the vessel which requires it, but if we have a submarine cable to the nearest wrecking point, a great quantity of property will be saved by the expedition with which the saving party will arrive at the wreck. I urge this question on the favorable consideration of the Government. It is not a local matter but it is a Dominion matter. It is a matter which should engage the attention of the Government at once, and particularly in view of the fact that the American Government are now improving at the rate of millions of dollars the navigation of their waters and are building lighthouses. The whole expense for the construction of this cable is a few thousand dollars, and I believe it would be greatly appreciated by our sailors and our fishermen. Just before I came here for the Session, I had to receive a deputation of lake captains, who urged me to bring this matter again before the Government. It has been brought before them from year to year, and the persuasive style of the Minister of Public Works has not been sufficient to catch the ear of his colleagues. It is possible that more experience in this matter may enable him to obtain a favorable result this time.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This matter has gone before my colleagues, and I hope this time that their ears will be opened.

Motion agreed to.

PROHIBITION.

Mr. JAMIESON moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient to prohibit the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors, except for sacramental, medicinal, scientific and mechanical purposes. That the enforcement of such prohibition, and such manufacture, importation and sale as may be allowed, shall be by the Dominion Government through specially appointed officers.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It was understood that we would simply take the unopposed notices of motion first, and then go back to the others. Otherwise this motion might block every other motion.

Mr. JAMIESON. I thought this motion could not be opposed.

THE NORTHERN LIGHT.

Mr. WELSH moved for:

Return of all correspondence, telegrams and reports upon the Northern Light (including hull, machinery and boilers) for the year 1887, and from 1st January to date; also, all correspondence, telegrams and reports relative to the steamer Alert, and her fitness as a winter boat in the Straits of St. Lawrence; also, all estimates and expenditure proposed to be laid out in the attempt to fit Alert for the winter crossing.

He said: I want to offer a suggestion to the hon. Minister of Marine which will save him some trouble. Sometime about the 1st March, I moved:

For a return showing the names and salaries of all Captains in charge of Government steamers, together with the salaries and allowances at present payable to and received by them, together with all petitions, correspondence, telegrams, &c., relative to the paying of the Captain of the Northern Light since 1st January, 1878. Also for a return showing the names and number of men employed in or about the Northern Light during last summer, from the time she ceased running in the spring of 1887, until she again resumed in the autumn of the same year.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have to inform the Minister of Marine that I hold in my hand the return to this motion, but it does not contain the number of men employed about that steamer since she was laid up last spring until the ensuing fall. What is the meaning of sending in half a return when this House ordered a full return? I intend to have a full return, and if it is not brought down, if the Order of the House is not attended to, I intend to make a motion for a commission of enquiry in this matter. I can assure the Minister of Marine that he will not find an hon. gentleman on the front Government benches that will support him in this act.

Mr. FOSTER. I instructed my officers to comply with the Order of the House, and that report was handed in, and I supposed it thoroughly complied with the Order of the House. From the excited manner in which the hon. member made his remarks to the House, I inferred that his chief grievance was with reference to the number of men employed. It may be that the number of men employed was not given. If there is any omission it can be very easily remedied, and could have been just as easily remedied if my hon. friend had shown less feeling. I can assure him that there is no intention of depriving the House of full information. In fact, if my hon. friend will wait a little while we may make him a present of the Northern Light.

Mr. WELSH. I know there was a great number of men employed on the steamer last summer, making repairs, when there was no captain in charge of her, and without any one to superintend their work; and I wanted to know the number of men so employed, and the amount of money paid to them, in order that the House might see the manner in which the business of that department is conducted. That was my motive. There is no feeling in the matter, so far as I am concerned; although the matter may appear to the hon. gentleman one to cause a little excitement. The truth is, I feel sore about this matter, and if I don't get this return, I will make the hon. gentleman feel sore, if I am not very much mistaken.

Mr. FOSTER. That is undoubtedly the way in which the mistake has arisen. My officers have given the number of the crew and the officers of the ship that were employed, and not the others.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman said that if my hon. friend had a little patience, perhaps in a short time they would make him a present of the Northern Light. Is it the intention of the Government to supersede the Northern Light with any other vessel?

Mr. FOSTER. It is.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If so, have arrangements been made for the purchase of another vessel, and where and when will they be carried out?

Mr. FOSTER. It is the intention of the Government to supersede the Northern Light by a new vessel, and arrangements are now being made with that end in view. I will be able to explain the matter more fully to the House later on.

TRAVAUX POUR LA DESCENTE DES BOIS ET BILLOTS SUR LA RIVIÈRE OTTAWA.

M. AMYOT: Je demande—

Qu'une humble adresse soit présentée à Son Excellence le gouverneur général pour prier Son Excellence de vouloir bien faire transmettre à cette Chambre un état indiquant le coût total de la construction des divers travaux exécutés pour la descente des bois et billots sur la rivière Ottawa et ses tributaires jusqu'au 30 juin dernier; aussi un état indiquant la dépense annuelle de l'entretien de ces ouvrages pendant les cinq années antérieures au 30 juin dernier, sous les différents chefs de reconstruction, réparation, et frais d'administration, à chacune des stations, avec le nom de la rivière ou du tributaire où la dépense a eu lieu; et copie de toute demande reçue de particuliers ou de compagnies à charte pour l'acquisition par voie d'achat ou autrement de tout ou partie de ces ouvrages et améliorations sur la rivière Ottawa et ses tributaires.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN: Il y a un ou deux renseignements demandés par cette motion qu'il sera peu facile et probablement impossible de donner. Néanmoins je tâcherai de les fournir aussi approximativement que possible.

M. AMYOT: L'honorable ministre pourrait-il nous donner une idée du temps où nous pourrions avoir ces documents. Il serait très avantageux d'avoir ces renseignements avant la discussion sur un bill qui est actuellement devant le comité des chemins de fer.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Dans ce cas, je crois qu'il faudra diviser le rapport en deux, parce que je crains qu'une bonne partie des documents que l'honorable député demande ne pourront être préparés à temps. Je comprends parfaitement ce que l'honorable député a en vue en faisant cette motion, et je ferai tout en mon pouvoir pour faciliter la production de ces documents.

Motion accordée.

PROHIBITION IN THE TRAFFIC IN INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

Mr. JAMIESON moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient to prohibit the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors, except for sacramental, medicinal, scientific and mechanical purposes. That the enforcement of such prohibition, and such manufacture, importation and sale as may be allowed, shall be by the Dominion Government through specially appointed officers.

He said: Mr. Speaker, a resolution in reference to the prohibition of the traffic in intoxicating liquors has been twice introduced into this House within the past few years, and there has been a full discussion of the whole question on each occasion. Consequently, I do not deem it advisable on the present occasion to make anything like an exhaustive address in support of the resolution. In fact, it was and is not my intention to say more than a few words, and I shall be perfectly satisfied, so far as I am concerned, if we can reach a vote on this question within the next half hour. I think it will be advisable to dispose of the resolution this afternoon, as I am informed and observe by the Order paper—I was not here on Friday evening—that if it is not disposed of by six o'clock, it will have to pass over in order that the arrangement in reference to resuming the debate on the Fishery question this evening may be carried out. I am not aware of anything new having come up in the country on the question of the prohibition of the traffic in intoxicating liquors since last Session, when I submitted to this House a resolution in similar terms to the one I have just proposed. I am not aware that the evils flowing from the traffic in intoxicating liquors since that time have abated in any way, and I am still as fully convinced as I was on that occasion that it is the duty of this House to provide by legislation, not for the regulation, but for the entire prohibition of that traffic. It may be said that we have a local option law, and that it is the duty of those who are opposed to the traffic in intoxicating liquors to try that law which is already upon the Statute-book. Well, it is quite true that we have a local option law, and it is also true that that law, to a very large extent, has been laid hold of by the people, and adopted in a large number of counties and cities in this Dominion. But I have always contended, and I now contend, that the Canada Temperance Act is not a fair test of the question of the prohibition of the liquor traffic. I am not aware that either in this or any other country has any law yet been passed which can be said to be a fair test of prohibition. In the United States, I believe, several States of the Union have passed a prohibitory liquor law, but their power is limited, and, after all, it is only partial prohibition. Although the sale and the manufacture is prohibited by these States, it is beyond their power, as has recently been held by the Supreme Court of the United States, to prohibit the importation, inasmuch as that would be an interference with trade and commerce. Now, it is well known that the Canada Temperance Act, in the counties in which it is adopted, is only directed to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors. Consequently, it is only partial prohibition. I believe we should go further, and enact a law which will not only prevent the sale, but get at the root of the evil, by prohibiting the importation and manufacture of intoxicating liquors. We have dealt, since this House assembled, with some very important questions bearing upon the trade and commerce of the country, but it is my contention that the question now before the House, however lightly some members may be disposed to treat it, is the most important question which has been before the House since we have met this Session. I am not sure that it is merely the duty of the representatives of the people to deal with questions of trade and commerce alone, or what may be called purely secular questions. I believe it is the duty of the Parliament of this, and every other country, to deal also with questions affecting the morals of the people. I know of no traffic which, to the same extent, affects the moral condition of the people as the liquor traffic. In discussing this question, I am prepared to concede that it has a very important bearing upon some interests in the country which are regarded as of very great importance. I am quite aware that those engaged in the manufacture and on this sale of intoxicating liquors would be most materially affected, were a prohibitory measure passed by this House, but in my judgment it is the duty of Parliament to pass every law which it deems to be right, and to have that law enforced in the interests of the people. I am not now going to discuss the question as to whether it would be right or not to grant compensation to those engaged in the traffic, but will simply give expression to my own opinion on that point, and that is that if the option were given to me at the present moment of securing the prohibition of the liquor traffic and doing away with the great evils which flow from that traffic, I for one would be prepared to put my hands in my pocket, as a ratepayer of this Dominion, and contribute my share in compensating these parties. However, I am not prepared to admit that those engaged in the traffic are entitled to compensation. Notice after notice, intimation after intimation, has been given to those parties, from time to time, that the traffic in intoxicating liquors was considered by the people as inimical to their interests. The passage of the Temperance Act of 1864 by the Parliament of Canada was a notice, the passage of the Canada Temperance Act of 1878 was a notice to those parties that the people and Parliament of this country considered that the traffic was inimical to the best interests of the country. Consequently, if parties, since the passage of those Acts, have gone into the manufacture or into the traffic, or have taken up the selling of intoxicating liquors in any way, they have done so with the notice to them upon the Statute-book of this country. Now, I trust that this resolution will receive very careful consideration at the hands of the representatives of the people. I know that those who are endeavoring to rid the country of this great evil are not looked upon with favor in certain quarters. I know they are regarded, and sometimes spoken of, as cranks, and as parties who want to destroy the peace of the country, and we are told that we are endeavoring to entrench upon the liberty of the subject by prescribing what men shall eat and drink. I know that very serious objections are urged in certain quarters to the passage of what are called sumptuary laws. But I believe that those who are advocating the prohibition and abolition of the liquor traffic are acting, not only within their rights as citizens, but in the best interests of the country. It may be true that men have an abstract right to eat and drink what they please and as they please, but when men who drink intoxicating liquors not only injure themselves but injure those who are dependent on them—and it is not alone those who drink that suffer, but every interest in the community suffers—I believe it to be the duty of Parliament to step in and prohibit this traffic. I believe that the pathway of this traffic is strewn with the ruined lives and wrecked hopes of thousands and tens of thousands of the best citizens of this and every other country. It may be that Parliament is not yet prepared to give its sanction to a prohibitory liquor law, it may be possible that even the people of this country are not yet prepared to carry out such a law, if it were placed on the Statute-book. But I expect to live to see the day, and I believe many other members of the House will live to see the day when we shall have on the Statute-book a law prohibiting the traffic in intoxicating liquors; that the people of this country, in consequence of the great evils flowing from this traffic, will revolt from it and will put the ban of the law upon it. Now, although I have spoken much longer than I intended to in introducing this resolution, I have a few more words to say. It may be said, in reply to the remarks which I had to make and the resolution which I have had the honor of submitting to this House, that it was entirely unnecessary to submit another resolution during this present Parliament; that, in the first Session of this Parliament, when it was fresh from the people, we had a resolution on this subject submitted and we had the deliverance of the House upon it, and that therefore it was unnecessary again during the continuance of the same Parliament to submit another resolution on the same subject. I may say that, when that resolution was presented last year, there was a very thin attendance of the House, and it was not a fair expression of the views of the House. I may also say that, since last Session there has been a serious change in the personnel of the House in consequence of vacancies which have taken place and have been filled by bye-elections. In addition to that, it is the desire and it is the determination of the promoters and friends of temperance in this country to keep this question before the Parliament of Canada and before the country at large. We are resolved that we will keep the question to the front, that we will educate the people and that we will agitate the people in regard to this question, and will agitate in Parliament in reference to it until we secure what we are striving to obtain, the entire prohibition of the liquor traffic. With these few remarks, I submit to the House the resolution which I have proposed, and I trust that it will receive that attention from the House which its merits demand.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman has brought this motion forward for the second time. Of course, if the hon. gentleman was prepared to propose a Bill to carry out the motion which he has submitted to the House, in case the majority supported him, there would be no objection to his putting a motion of this sort before the House, but it is hardly consistent with parliamentary practice that the hon. gentleman should ask the House to assent to this as an abstract proposition. The hon. gentleman has had some propositions before Parliament to amend the Canada Temperance Act, but that is somewhat different in principle from the motion which he has made now. The principle of the Canada Temperance Act is very different from the principle which is embodied in this resolution, or in any Act which could be founded upon it if a majority of the House was found to favor it. The principle of the Canada Temperance Act is the principle of local option. It recognises that, in regard to any matter dealing with the licensing laws, each locality should decide for itself. When you come to legislate in regard to what may be regarded as a sumptuary law, you find that it is wholly inoperative unless it is sustained by a majority of the people in a particular locality. The measure to which I have referred was put on the Statute-book ten years ago by the Government of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie). That Government assumed the responsibility of putting that Act on the Statute-book, and assuming that responsibility they followed the principle which was laid down in a resolution proposed by the leader of the present Government, that it was the duty of the Government to assume the responsibility. They did assume the responsibility. The question whether we should place a prohibitory law on the Statute-book was made the subject of enquiry by the Government. They enquired into the operation of the law in the State of Michigan, and into the operation of the prohibitory law in the State of Maine, and also in regard to the operation of the prohibition law which was put on the Statute-book in the Province of New Brunswick, and afterwards repealed, and the Government came to the conclusion that it was in the interest of temperance and in the interest of prohibition to adopt the optional law and not to adopt the law looking to total prohibition. I have myself always been in favor of prohibition, but I have never been in favor of the adoption of a measure that the majority of the people did not sympathise with. That would be inoperative, that would not in any degree suppress the habit of drinking, that would leave that habit as much in force as it was before, and would turn the sympathy of any district away from the cause of temperance and lead it in a direction where it would try to set the law at defiance. For that reason I did not support the motion which the hon. gentleman proposed before. It seems to me that, before undertaking any legislation of this sort, we should know the opinion of the country on this question, and how are we to know whether the people in a particular locality will support the principle of prohibition or not? The hon. gentleman knows, or at least I know, that in my own constituency the Canada Temperance Act is in operation, and that there is no measure which it is so difficult to efficiently carry out as a prohibitory measure; and I know that, unless the overwhelming majority of a people in the locality favor the measure, it will do as little to suppress the habit of drinking to excess as if there was no such law at all. What we want is that the public sentiment should be in favor of prohibition, and then to follow it up by legislation which can be efficiently carried out. The Canada Temperance Act leaves it to the people in the locality itself to say whether they want prohibition or not. I know that in the rural districts, where it is tried, it works admirably. The farmers know that when their sons go out, they are not gathered in a drinking hole, they are not acquiring habits of dissipation, and that even those who are not total abstainers are not violating the law in any respect. But the towns and cities present a wholly different state of things. I am not at all sure that if you were to-morrow to try a measure of prohibition in any one of our cities, you would have as little drinking as you would have under a strict license law. Now, what the hon. gentleman ought to desire, and what the House ought to desire, is not simply and formally to put upon the Statute-book a law that is never put into operation, or that remains a dead letter, but it should be to put upon the Statute-book such legislation that the people themselves will sustain and will carry into operation, a law that is operative in favor of sobriety and good order, and not a law that excites opposition in a very considerable section of the community, the violation of which the people wink at, that will rather tend to a demoralisation and to a want of respect for law, than to good order and good habits in the community. Sir, holding this view, I would not support the motion of the hon. gentleman, not because I am not in favor of the principle of prohibition wherever the people are willing to carry it out, but because I am not in favor of putting upon the Statute-book a measure that would do away with existing restraints, and that would leave a very considerable section of the country exactly in the position as if there was no legislation at all. Now, when the hon. gentleman proposed to amend the Canadian Temperance Act with a view to making it more efficient, I think he was taking a step in the right direction; he was proposing to amend a law that is based upon wholly different principles from the resolution which he is now proposing. If, Sir, it were found that the people throughout a Province generally favored prohibition, I think the measure ought to be carried in that Province; if it were found to be so in several Provinces, then it would be well it should be carried in those several Provinces; if it should be found that the public sentiment of the entire Dominion were in favor of the measure, then it should be carried throughout the Dominion. But, Sir, it does seem to me that when in some of those localities in which the measure has been optional, it has been carried and afterwards repealed by a majority where it was formerly put into operation by a majority, it is scarcely a fitting time to propose to the House a measure of prohibition. This whole subject is entirely in the hands of the people themselves. Why, Sir, we know that the hon. gentleman proposed here amendments to the Canada Temperance Act, and they were kicked out in the Senate. The hon. gentleman said: "I will vote for an elective Senate." Well, Sir, I proposed in this House a resolution in favor of that view, and the hon. gentleman helped to vote it down. Then, when the hon. gentleman saw that the Senate was opposed to his measure, and when he saw that a majority of the Senate held those views, and we proposed that the Government, who can control the Senate, that exercises a potent influence over the Senate, should assume the responsibility of those amendments to the Canada Temperance Act, and there was a chance, not only of carrying them through this House, if the hon. gentleman had been in favor of it, but there was also a chance, upon that line, of carrying them in the Senate—did the hon. gentleman support my proposition? No, Sir, he voted it down. And when last year the hon. gentleman had a motion upon the paper, and it was proposed to put it upon the Government Orders so as to give an opportunity for legislation of the sort desired, what did the hon. gentleman do? Why, Sir, he assured hon. gentlemen on this side of the House that he did not want to put it upon the Government Orders, that he was a Government supporter first, and a temperance man afterwards.

Mr. JAMIESON. The hon. gentleman is stating what is not true—if I may so so.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Did the hon. gentleman appear in his place.

Mr. JAMIESON. Whoever said that in reference to my conduct last year, said what was not true.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I put this question to the hon. gentleman: Did he not know there was a proposal to be made to put his motion upon the Government Orders so that there would be an opportunity of reaching it?

Mr. JAMIESON. I will explain to the hon. gentleman, if he will permit me. There was some conversation in reference to that matter, and the friends of prohibition on both sides of the House were called together and the matter was submitted to them, and they decided not to force the question in the manner indicated by the hon. gentleman, and I submitted to the action of that meeting.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Who were at the meeting?

Mr. JAMIESON. The member for Broome (Mr. Fisher) was one; there were about a dozen at the meeting, representing both parties in this House, all temperance men. I may say that I never saw the hon. member for Bothwell, (Mr. Mills) at any meeting or on any occasion when it was necessary to advocate temperance in this House.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I did not undertake to prostitute my position as a member of Parliament by doing what the hon. gentleman has done in this House upon that question; I did not profess to support a motion that I took the earliest opportunity of opposing afterwards—that is what the hon. gentleman has done. I do not profess to give an opportunity to the Government to put it out of my power to put a motion that I desire to make, or to decline to allow a motion to be put upon the paper along with Government Orders. That is what the hon. gentleman did on that occasion last year.

Mr. JAMIESON. I deny it again, and I insist that the hon. member for Bothwell is wrong in the statement he is making with reference to my conduct last year.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Why, Sir, we know the hon. gentleman.

Mr. JAMIESON. The House will remember that the hon. gentleman was opposed to the present constitution of the Senate, and on entering the Government, for five long years, he never did anything towards reforming that body.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman says he never saw me at one of those temperance meetings.

Mr. JAMIESON. No.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No, Sir, he did not. But I happened to be a member of a Government that assumed the responsibility of putting the only measure upon the Statute-book on this subject that is to be found since the Union, and Sir, we did not receive the support of the hon. gentleman in that undertaking, we did not receive the support of the hon. gentleman's political allies in that undertaking. I remember, Sir, that there was a prominent temperance man, a member of the Government, that preceded us in office, the late Finance Minister, the Hon. Mr. Tilley; I remember that he was seven years a member of the Government, and never proposed legislation on the subject. I remember that the moment the Hon. Mr. Tilley returned to office, the political associates of the hon. gentleman, and some of those who pose as temperance men with him, met Mr. Tilley here and complimented him upon the progress of the temperance work—not work that had been done by Mr. Tilley, or through his instrumentality, because it was done by the Government of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie). Did they thank my hon. friend for East York for what he did, for the sacrifices which he made, the opposition which he incurred? No, Sir, nothing of the sort was done. Why, Sir, it is well known that the hon. member and the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) hunt in couples. The hon. member from South Lanark appears here as an opponent of temperance, and receives the support of the hon. member for North Lanark, (Mr. Jamieson), who is the advocate par excellence of temperance; and so the one secures the liquor support for the temperance candidate, and the other secures temperance support for the liquor candidate; and we have the temperance candidate for North Lanark and the anti temperance candidate for South Lanark. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman will find that that policy is pretty nearly played out in this House, and he will find that it is very nearly played out in the country. The hon. gentleman has appeared for two or three Sessions as a legislator in favor of temperance; but he has, instead, been its impeder, he has stood in the way of legislation. The hon. gentleman forced himself to the front in undertaking to amend a measure put upon the Statute-book by a Government that the hon. gentleman has always opposed, while the hon. gentleman never dared to ask the men who sit on the Treasury benches, whom he hourly supports, to take up this question and to amend a measure which a former Government put upon the Statute-book. Sir, that is the position of the hon. gentleman. And the public will thoroughly understand it. What does the hon. gentleman do now? He brings up his measure within one hour of the adjournment when he knows that another subject is to be taken up after recess, and that in all probability his motion will not be reached again this Session. He has taken precious good care not to permit this measure to occupy a foremost place in the notices of motion; he took precious good care last year that his motion should not occupy a foremost place, and the result was that last year his motion was never reached, and a vote was never taken on it, and so seeing how eminently successful he was last year in preventing legislation of a practical character, giving the people an opportunity of acting in accordance with their moral conviction, he comes here now, and leaves the measure proposing to amend the law—it has not yet been reached or dealt with—and he proposes to take up an abstract resolution which may secure him certain temperance support in his constituency by those who do not take the trouble to ascertain exactly how the business of the House is conducted. I think the hon. gentleman has succeeded eminently well in showing exactly where he stands upon the temperance question. He has said that he is ready to support a measure of prohibition. He proposes to ask the House to vote on the subject of prohibition—certainly he does. He says that when the people favor a measure we place it on the Statute-book. So we do. When men are guilty of forgery the public are ready to punish them, and so it is with regard to theft. Is such the case in regard to the subject of prohibition? Does not the hon. gentleman know that it is not? If he wishes a measure of prohibition to be practical it must have the sympathy and support of at least a majority of the people in the locality where the law is to be operated, and it is therefore unwise and highly inexpedient in the interests of really genuine temperance to propose a measure with which public opinion does not sympathise and which it will not support. We have on the Statute-book a measure of prohibition. There is nothing to prevent the people from making it law throughout the entire Dominion from one end to the other. If there are defects in this measure let them be pointed out, and they can be corrected, and the people can be given an opportunity of saying whether they will have prohibition or not. Does the hon. gentleman propose to force prohibition down the throats of those opposed to it? Does he suppose such a measure would be operative? Does he not know what is done up the Ottawa just beyond his own constituency, where the Act was carried by a narrow majority, and does he believe that in the large lumbering districts where the vast majority of the men are opposed to prohibition such a measure will be operative? He knows it will not. What the hon. gentleman proposes is merely buncombe, and the reign of buncombe is over; it was a reign of usurpation, and we trust this the last opportunity in which any of its friends will exhibit themselves in this House.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

Mr. JAMIESON. As I have a right to reply I will now avail myself of the opportunity to do so. I do not like to appear before the House again so soon, but the conduct of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has been such as to call upon me to reply. If the hon. gentleman had discussed the question on its merits I would not at this stage of the debate have asked the privilege of again speaking in regard to the question before the House. It seems to me that the conduct of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) is of a most extraordinary character. He, forsooth, is the great champion of the cause of temperance, at least he was a few days ago in this House when he sought to embarrass not only the Government but the friends of the Government. I am now glad, however, to find that he has shown his hand. I think not only the members of this House but the people of the whole Dominion will appreciate at its true worth the conduct of this new apostle of temperance in Parliament. The hon. gentleman has charged me with bringing up this motion at an inopportune hour. Every hon. member knows that this is the first opportunity I have had since the Session opened to bring this question before the House, and the hon. gentleman ought to remember that this debate will close at six o'clock simply for the purpose of giving the hon. member for Bothwell an opportunity to air his eloquence upon a certain important question. If he considered this question so important as he would indicate by his remarks, let him forego the opportunity of addressing the House to-night on the other question, and let us have this question discussed to the very bottom. I think it is most unfair on the part of the hon. gentleman to attack me for the manner in which this resolution has been brought before the House, because it was utterly out of my power to bring it forward at an earlier period of the Session, or on any other occasion than the present; but I apprehend that if I had refused to avail myself of the opportunity of bringing the question before the House at the present time, the hon. member for Bothwell would have been the first member to have risen and charged me with endeavoring to shirk a duty that had been placed in my hands by the Dominion Alliance. The hon. gentleman has referred to the Canada Temperance Act, which was placed upon the Statute-book by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), when he was at the head of the Government. I am quite prepared to give the Government of that day due credit for anything they did in connection with the temperance question.

Mr. MILLS. But you voted against them all the same.

Mr. JAMIESON. But the principle was admitted before the Canada Temperance Act became the law of this country. In 1864 a Conservative Parliament placed on the Statute-book of the country another measure, the Temperance Act of 1864, which was the first measure ever introduced and placed upon the Statute-book which conceded the principle of local option. Although I am quite prepared to admit that the Canada Temperance Act was an improvement on the old Temperance Act of 1864, still the principle of the two measures was identical, and I do not know that the Government were entitled to so much credit for that measure after all. I will tell the House why. In 1874 the temperance people of the Dominion, representatives from every Province of the Dominion, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Ontario, and I believe Manitoba, met in convention in the city of Montreal in order to devise the best means for promoting the cause of temperance in the Dominion. They passed a resolution giving a committee authority to approach the Government of that day for the purpose of securing a measure under which a popular vote would be taken upon the question. But when the committee reported at a subsequent meeting that was held for the purpose of receiving that report, it was found that the Premier of the Dominion at that time refused to grant what the temperance people asked, a plebiscite on the question, on the ground that there was no constitutional precedent under the British Crown for such a procedure. So that the Government of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) did not concede to the temperance people of the Dominion at that time what they asked; they did concede a half-way measure, the Canada Temperance Act, and although we were thankful at the time to get it, still it was not what we asked, and I would prefer to-day to have this question submitted to the popular vote of the Dominion rather than have the question tested by a measure of partial prohibition which necessarily is unsatisfactory as a proper test of the question. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has attacked me for the course I pursued two years ago on the motion which he submitted to the House in regard to a reformation in the constitution of the Senate. Allow me for a few minutes to point out the course of the hon. gentleman on that question a few years ago. In 1874, when his friends were in power, he submitted a resolution to the House with the same object in view. Did he pursue the same course as he pursued on the last occasion? Not at all; the circumstances were different, his own friends were in power, and instead of moving his motion as an amendment to go into Committee of Supply, he moved it as a substantive motion. The Hansard will show that on the last occasion on which that gentleman submitted that motion to this House I rose and said that if the hon. gentleman would place the motion before the House on that occasion in the same manner in which he did on a former occasion, I would support it; but he did not do anything of the kind, because on a former occasion his own friends were in power and he did not want to embarrass them. On this occasion his political opponents were in power and his action was for the purpose of embarrassing them and for nothing else.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Does the hon. gentleman know that the proper time for moving a motion relating to any defect is when going into supply, and it is not regarded as a vote of want of confidence?

Mr. JAMIESON. If it were the proper time to take it up why did not the hon. gentleman, on a former occasion, bring it up in the same way? What is more, Sir, he charges me with insincerity upon this question. It will be recollected by every public man in this country that notwithstanding the fact that the House gave assent to the proposition which he submitted in 1874, to reform the constitution of the Senate, that he not only did not look for further action on the matter but that he entered the Government of the day and remained a member of that Government for four long years, and we heard no more about the reform of the Senate. Let me ask what did the hon. gentleman ever do with a view to carry out the spirit of the motion which had received the sanction of this House? I do not desire to enter at any great length into this question of his references to me. The hon. gentleman charges me with insincerity because a few days ago I voted against a motion which he submitted to this House. I think it is due to myself and to the temperance Conservatives on this side of the House, that I should enter into a further explanation in reference to this matter and give to the House my reasons for pursuing the course which I did. It is well known that a body of temperance men in this country called the Dominion Alliance, for the suppression of the liquor traffic. It is organized of non-partisan members, and Reformers and Conservatives meet there on a common ground for the purpose of promoting the cause of temperance. I am and have been for years a member of that Alliance, and it has been a principle acted upon in that Alliance that any temperance legislation to be brought before this House ought first to receive the sanction of the Alliance; that every movement in reference to the amendment of the Canada Temperance Act, or with reference to the prohibition of the liquor traffic, should originate with the Dominion Alliance. On the very day and up to the very hour that the hon. gentleman made the motion to this House, I had been acting in the Dominion Alliance and in accord with the temperance Liberal members on the other side of the House. We had been sitting at a committee meeting around a table that very day discussing questions in reference to the action we would take in the House on the question. What was my surprise to find the hon. gentleman who never yet manifested any zeal for the cause of temperance, except on an occasion when it was likely to embarrass those who were opposed to him, and who has never yet appeared at a meeting of the Dominion Alliance, or any other organization for the purpose of promoting the cause of temperance in this country, get up in his place and place a motion before this House under circumstances which he must have known would call for a condemnation of the resolution at the hands of the majority of the members of this House.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Why so?

Mr. JAMIESON. Because at the time he knew it would be voted down by the members of this House. I would not vote against it simply because it was a vote of want of confidence in the Government, but I voted against it because it was a breach of the fundamental principles on which the Dominion Alliance was organised.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Nothing of the kind.

Mr. JAMIESON. It is of the kind, and not only have the Liberal members of the Dominion Alliance who are not represented in this House endorsed the course which I took but they have said I could not take any other course.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Not they. Name.

Mr. JAMIESON. Yes, among others Mr. Spence, the secretary of the Dominion Alliance, who is as good a Liberal as the member for Brant (Mr. Somerville) is. He said the resolution was an untimely one to be submitted to the House. The Montreal Witness whose sympathies are altogether with the Liberal party condemned the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) for the circumstances under which he put that resolution to the House and every fair-minded temperance man in this Dominion has taken the ground which I took on the question.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. JAMIESON. Yes, they did; and I am prepared to submit my conduct to the people of this Dominion on that question. I believe so far as this question is concerned that the people of this Dominion have more confidence in myself as a representative than the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). I am bound to characterise the statement made by the hon. member for Bothwell a few moments ago in reference to my conduct last year as a—well—I do not know what to characterise it as that would be within the rules of Parliament, but I will say it is a wrong statement from beginning to end, and whoever gave that information to him I suppose they were “guying” him because they thought he would swallow it in the manner in which he did. There is not one word of truth in it from first to last. When we found we could not get a measure before the House last year—

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Why?

Mr. JAMIESON. An old parliamentarian asks why? On a former occasion I forced this question through this House, but was the cause of defeating several other measures. I am satisfied now that this is not a proper course to pursue and that it is not a course which is recognised by the House as a fair one. I do not know whether we could have succeeded last year in forcing the question to the House or not. I called together the men from both sides of the House; we called them to confirm our actions and a similar question was submitted to them as last year, and the decision of that committee was that it was too late in the Session to press temperance legislation and it would not be fruitful of any good to us if we had pressed it, because we would not be able to get the question disposed of in such a manner as to have it complete.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Might I ask the hon. gentleman if he notified all the temperance men of the House to go to that meeting?

Mr. JAMIESON. No.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Who were selected?

Mr. JAMIESON. The hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher) undertook to notify the members favorable to temperance on his side of the House and I undertook to notify the members favorable to temperance on my side of the House. In that way the meeting was brought about.

Mr. FISHER. What meeting are you referring to?

Mr. JAMIESON. The one that was called last year to bring up this question. You recollect it?

Mr. FISHER. I am not aware of any meeting at which it was decided that we should not push the temperance question as fast as we could.

Mr. JAMIESON. Well, I am, and I think there are gentlemen in this House who were present at that meeting.

Mr. CHARLTON. I would like to ask the hon. member how many members he invited from his own side of the House to attend that meeting?

Mr. JAMIESON. I am not prepared to say at the present moment, but possibly about a dozen were invited. There are a certain number of gentlemen who are connected with temperance movements and temperance organisations, and who are favorable to prohibition, and we generally invite them. I think the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has been invited, but I am not sure that he ever attended. Now, I am sorry that this discussion has assumed the character that it has, but I think the hon. members of this House will at least excuse me for the course I have taken.

Mr. LANDERKIN. No, we will not.

Mr. JAMIESON. Then, I suppose you will sustain the course pursued by the hon. member for Bothwell, who instead of urging this question on its merits, used it as an opportunity of making a personal attack on myself. But I can say this—my own constituents, and I believe every honest man in this Dominion, will give me credit for being at least sincere on this question, and doing what I can for the purpose of advancing this policy.

Mr. SCRIVER. It is now so near six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, that it is very evident that this question cannot be disposed of before you leave the Chair; and, under the rules of the House if the debate is not adjourned, the order will disappear from the paper. Therefore, with the view of keeping the question before the House, I would move the adjournment of the debate.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. As the House is very thin this afternoon, and as the question has not come to a vote, I think the debate should be adjourned, so that the House may have an opportunity to consider the matter and deal with it as they think proper.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

CLAIM OF WARREN ALLEN.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) moved for:

Return of all papers and correspondence relating to claim for compensation by Warren Allen for an ice-boat burnt to save the lives of the crews and passengers of the ice-boats, in the month of January, 1885, while crossing from Prince Edward Island to New Brunswick; and also for the use of an ice-boat and a crew, engaged in search of the missing boats.

He said: As the hon. gentleman will see, I am making a motion in relation to the claim preferred by one of the ice-boat men, who, during the year 1885, lost his boat in a storm. It will be remembered that one of the members of this House was among the passengers on that unfortunate occasion, and although this man was not in the employ of the Government in any sense of the word, but was the owner of a volunteer boat which was making crossings at the time, still the circumstances strongly favor his claim. The Government boats carrying Her Majesty's mails and a number of passengers were caught in this awful storm, and Mr. Allan's boat was accompanying them. In order to save the mails and the lives of the passengers, the boat, in the last extremity, was broken up and burnt. No doubt the heat thus obtained was the means of saving the lives of the passengers and of saving the mail. I think altogether the claim is a very good one, and is based on the highest grounds. Mr. Allan's property was burnt for the preservation of Her Majesty's mails, and also for the preservation of the lives of the unfortunate passengers. I do not know whether the hon. member for King's County is in his seat or not, but I know that he was one of the passengers, and he can bear personal testimony to the facts I have stated. My hon. friend's life was in danger, and he was many months recovering from the effects of the trip. I am aware that the Government were not themselves in charge of the boat, and the only ground on which I recommend this claim is that this boat was burnt in order to afford warmth to the passengers and crew, and thus enable them to weather the storm. I think, therefore, the claim, small as it is, should recommend itself to the just consideration of my hon. friend, and I sincerely hope he will see it in his power to satisfy it. I have heard this claim urged by a great many gentlemen irrespective of politics. I do not know what are Mr. Allan's politics. In fact he is not a constituent of mine at all, but is a resident on the other side. Everybody speaks favorably of the claim, and I sincerely hope the hon. gentleman will give it his attention.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I will let the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries know what the hon. gentleman has said about the case. The hon. gentleman is perfectly right in saying that this is not a question of politics. There cannot be any politics in a matter of this kind, that saving the lives of the passengers and the mails. I am sure my hon. friend will consider the case if he has not already done so.

Motion agreed to.

It being six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

FISHERY TREATY.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Charles Tupper: That Bill (No. 65) respecting a certain Treaty between Her Britannic Majesty and the President of the United States, be read a second time.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The subject which the House has under consideration this evening is one of unusual importance. In matters which concern ourselves and ourselves alone, if we make a mistake, it is possible for us to retrace our steps. Our blunders may impede our progress for the time being, but they cannot put ultimately any obstacles in our way. But that observation will not apply to the Bill which is now under consideration. Every step we take is a step in a direction from which there is no return. Every act that we do is final. And if a blunder is made, if we do something that is detrimental to the interests of the country, it will wholly be beyond our power to correct the errors into which we have fallen or the mistakes we have made. It is therefore of very great importance that we should carefully consider the subject now before us. It is important that we should not hastily come to the conclusion, and I confess that I am wholly unable to understand the extreme haste with which the hon. the Minister of Finance and his chief are disposed to press forward a matter of such vital importance to the country. We know that the concessions we are called upon to make are of very great magnitude. We know that the concessions are wholly upon the one side; we know that we are not in this matter standing as the aggrieved party. The complainant is the United States. It is the country to the south of us that has demanded concessions from us, and we, at all events, before we are called upon to approve of what has been done by those who claim to represent us—we ought to know whether they are prepared to accept the extraordinary concessions which have been made or not. Now, I understand that within twenty-four hours this subject is, in all probability, likely to be dealt with at the capital of the neighboring Republic. In all probability, within the next twenty-four hours, the Senate of the United States will either postpone or reject the treaty that has been negotiated. Why, then, are the Government so anxious? Why is the Government so anxious to press this to a conclusion? Why should we commit ourselves to a proposition, which, if rejected, will simply be made the starting point for further concessions at a future period? If this question were allowed to stand over, if Parliament were not called upon to commit itself on it at this moment, should the Senate of the United States within the next twenty-four hours reject the treaty we would then be as free to start again from the point at which the hon. gentleman started a few months ago as he was at that time. But if this House, representing the entire country, is called upon at this moment to approve and does approve of what has been done, and if what has been done should be rejected by the party to whom the concessions are made, why, when we start again to negotiate with our neighbors to the south of us, we will have to start from where we left off in this Parliament at this moment. We cannot, once the House has committed itself to the provisions of the treaty, take exception to anything there in conceded. A new embassy would say naturally: You, the representatives of the nation to the North—those for whom you speak have already agreed to concede what you now object to. This we knew you were ready to concede without hesitation, and we expect something more at your hands. And so the hon. gentlemen seem not to be satisfied with the humiliation which they have brought upon themselves and the humiliation they have brought upon the country by the propositions which are now before us for ratification, but, before they are at all sure, or, as I believe, when they are very sure, that these propositions will not be accepted by the Senate of the United States, they seek to commit this House to them. Why this indecent haste to commit this Parliament to the propositions of the Minister of Finance before we know whether the neighboring Republic, or those who represent the neighboring Republic, accept these concessions at our hands? Has Lord Salisbury importuned this Government to hurry the matter in this way? Is he afraid that the headland question may be raised again by the people of Canada, that these questions between the two countries may rise again in consequence of the exasperating regulations in regard to customs and in connection with the Department of Marine and Fisheries? Why do hon. gentlemen opposite press us to give an answer or to give an opinion on this subject before we know what opinion will be expressed by the Senate of the United States? We have everything to gain by awaiting the action of the Senate of the United States, and we have a great deal to lose if they should reject this treaty after we have affirmed it. What does the Minister of Finance want to gain by this House affirming that treaty? Does he propose, or is it his desire, to convince an exasperated nation that those who represented them on this commission made a bad bargain, and that the arrangement which was made is so satisfactory to the people of Canada that they have not hesitated to accept it immediately and without dispute? That is to call upon us to make an arrangement which we know to be false. We know what our position is. We know that it is one of humiliation, and we ought to be spared the further humiliation of having these extraordinary concessions rejected by those to whom they have been made. The Minister of Finance has told us in his speech that the protection of the fisheries has never been made a party question. I believe that is true. I believe that the protection of the fisheries was earnestly desired by both sides of the House, but the protection of the fisheries and the concession to another country of the sovereignty over our fisheries, or a common right to our fisheries, is a wholly different thing, and when the hon. gentleman speaks of the protection of the fisheries and then refers to the provisions of this treaty, he is referring to two things as far apart as they can be. This treaty does not provide for protection; it is a surrender. The conditions in this treaty which, possibly within the next twenty-four hours, the United States will either have postponed or rejected, are not provisions by which proper protection is to be given to our fisheries, but is a concession of more than half of the area which we claim to be within the jurisdiction of this country. There are many thousand of square miles, which we claim to be under Canadian jurisdiction or under the jurisdiction of Newfoundland, which are proposed to be surrendered to the United States under this treaty. Two years ago we were promised a vigorous police policy to protect our fisheries. That policy, we were told, was supplemental to the so-called National Policy. It was on the same lines, it was for the same purpose, it involved the same principles, it professed to be intended for the interests of the people of this country, but it proved to be anything but that. It was inefficient, it was exasperating. Why, we had before us last year abundant evidence, furnished by the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) and the hon. member for Queen's, P. E. I. (Mr. Davies) showing that hundreds of vessels from the United States engaged in fishing within the three-mile limit; and that, while harsh customs regulations were in force, and while harsh and unjust police regulations were carried out, so as to irritate the people of the neighboring Republic and to give them an opportunity of exciting the resentment of their fellow countrymen, there was really nothing done to protect our own fishermen. Two years before the Washington Treaty was denounced by the United States, this Government were notified, and they were advised that it would be well, before that provision of the Washington Treaty came to an end, to enter at that time into negotiations with the United States, so that there would be no worrying police regulations, because at that time those fishermen had still the right to engage in fishing in our waters with the fishermen of this country. The same view was taken by Lord Derby, who was then Secretary of State for the Colonies. That nobleman addressed three communications to the Government of this country without receiving any response. It was not until he sent the fourth that they gave him any answer and the concluding words of that fourth despatch were:

It was not necessary that the Government should appear in the position which they seemed to have considered it necessary for them to appear, as suppliants. It was only necessary for them to invite communication and negotiation; but hon. gentlemen upon the Treasury benches had a great idea of their own dignity, and one would suppose from the observations which I have read, that they had studied the diplomatic negotiations which were carried on two centuries ago, when the treaties of Osnabruck and Westphalia and Madrid were negotiated, when the ambassadors took different sides of the room, and watched others' legs when anyone moved, because the man who stepped first was supposed to be sacrificing his dignity. In one place, there was a special building put up for the ambassadors to assemble in, and in that there were as many doors as there were ambassadors, so that no one could have precedence of another; and there was also a round table provided at which they might sit so that no question of distinction might arise when their negotiations were being carried on. It seems to me that it is in this spirit that the hon. gentlemen occupying the Treasury benches have approached a great question affecting the friendly relations between this country and the neighboring Republic, a question of the most vital consequence to this country, whatever it might be to the country to the South of us. We find in the history of hon. gentlemen opposite a continuation of these lofty pretensions and this proud reserve. We find that they have passed these officious customs regulations which could not help us, but must exasperate the feelings of our neighbors to the South. Then, we have the fisheries regulations which in some cases were cruel and unjust as well as unwise and unnecessary. See what were the means employed by these hon. gentlemen to promote the well-being of this country and to secure friendly relations with those of the neighboring Republic? First, Sir, they proposed to be extremely generous; they said to the people of the United States when it was too late to carry on negotiations, when Congress had no longer an opportunity of expressing an opinion upon the subject, or of agreeing to any proposition that might be made: You may have free use of our fisheries for a season, if the President will permit fish to be carried free into the neighboring Republic. Well, Sir, the President informed these gentlemen of what they ought to have known before, that he had no power to make any such concession, that he had no power to repeal an Act of Congress, that the proposition ought to have been made while Congress was in session, so that they would have had an opportunity of considering it. And so the American fishermen were given the use of our fisheries for a season without any compensation, and without any reserve. Then we were told that they cared nothing for the generosity that we had extended to them, that they were in no mood to make any concession, that the Gloucester fishermen were still opposed to the free admission of Canadian fish to the American market; and so they were to be taught by a policy of retaliation the power which this country possessed. Sir, we were told that Canada was the great maritime state of the new world, that our fleet was almost as large as that of the neighboring Republic, and that while we did not want to quarrel with them, while we did not want to adopt a policy of exclusion, while we were ready to trade with them if they were disposed to trade, we were quite able to live without them, and that we were quite able to show them that we were capable of protecting the fisheries that we possessed on our coast, and so the policy of Jingoism was begun.

"We do not want to fight, O no!
But, by Jingo! if we do,
We've got the men, we've got the ships,
And we've got the money, too."

It was in that spirit that the hon. gentlemen entered upon the consideration of this question. Sir, what defence did the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries make the other right? Why, it is that we were standing upon our legal rights, that what we did was within the undoubted rights that Canada possessed under the Treaty of 1818. He told us that he had not strictly enforced the provisions of that treaty; he said there were many cases in which the fishermen of the United States were allowed in our waters, privileges which they had no right to claim under the treaty. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman's policy was vacillating, it was capricious, it was arbitrary. It may have been that in every instance that he mentioned he made the concessions which he speaks of; but, Sir, there were many instances in which he did not make concessions. And what defence does the hon. gentleman make when it is complained that his conduct was occasionally arbitrary, vexatious and unjust? Why, Sir, he says: It is not in the bond; I complied with the law; I kept within our rights; I did not do to you any thing that the law did not authorise me to do; and so, because I did not violate the treaty of obligations between the two countries, you have nothing of which to complain. Well, Sir, I deny altogether that position. I say it was the duty of the hon. gentleman to act in accordance with the principle of humanity and of modern civilisation. It was his duty to do no harm, to put no impediment in the way of the fishermen of a friendly power, as long as he was not giving them facilities for violating the law of the land. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman, I say, in many instances, did that which was altogether unjustifiable. I hold in my hand a report of some of the complaints of some of those fishermen, and I will read a few with reference to the action of the officers under the charge of the Department of Marine and Fisheries. There was the case of the Sarah B. Putman, of Beverly, Mass., which was driven from the harbor of Pubnico, in a storm, 27th March, 1886. That was the complaint. Now, the hon. gentleman will not say that the Treaty of 1818 gave his officers a right to force a vessel to leave the harbor in a storm.

Mr. FOSTER. How do you know?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am pointing out the charges that have been made by the people of the United States against the Department of which he was a member.

Mr. FOSTER. By whom was that charge made?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Well, we will answer the hon. gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER. Please answer now.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No, I will not. I purpose to make my own speech in my own way. We know that those hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches are the last parties who will submit to interruption, and I will, in this speech, follow their example. Now, I will say this. It does not matter whether that statement was well or ill founded. It was the kind of statement that was made to the American people, it was published abroad in their newspapers, it was that which formed public opinion in the United States, and it was that which compelled those gentlemen to make the discreditable surrender which we are this evening considering; and what I complain is that these hon. gentlemen, knowing the country with which they had to deal, knowing the jealousy with which they guard the interests of their fishermen, were not sufficiently careful to give them no case of complaint, and were not sufficiently careful to see that when a complaint was made, it should be redressed, or answered at the time, if untrue. Now, there was another case, the Rattler, which was a ship from Gloucester. It is complained that she was warned off at Canso, N. S., in June, 1886; that she was detained in the port of Shelburne, where she entered seeking shelter, and that she was ordered out from that port. Then again there was the case of the Caroline Vought. She was from Booth Bay, in the State of Maine, and was warned off at Paspébiac, N.B., and was refused an opportunity of taking water on board. Now, Sir, the right to take water is one of the rights under the treaty, and what I am reading at this moment are complaints of American fishermen, not that the Government had acted in a narrow and inhospitable spirit, but that they had acted illegally and contrary to the provisions of the treaty by which their rights were secured. Then again I will take a few cases of the next year. There was the case of the Christina Ellsworth, a schooner of Eastport, in Maine. The complaint of her master was that in every harbour she entered she was refused the privilege of buying anything, that she was compelled to enter at every custom house, that she found that the customs charges at every place, almost, were different from what they were at the preceding place. Then there was the case of the Stowell Sherman. She was ordered, in distress of weather, out of Cascumpec Harbor, P.E.I., after having entered it in a storm. Then there was the Walter L. Rich, a schooner of Wellsfleet, Mass. She was ordered out of Malpeque Harbor, P.E.I., in unsuitable weather, for fishing, and was compelled to return to her own port without having an opportunity of fishing, in consequence of the refusal of shelter by the Canadian authorities. Then the Newell B. Hawes, that made harbor at Shelburne, N.S., she was ordered out at 5 o'clock in the evening, in the face of a storm. Her commander refused to go, and at 7 o'clock the next morning she was ordered out to sea although there was a dense fog which made it quite impossible that she could leave the port safely. Then there was the Helen F. Frederick, of Cape Porpoise, Maine. She was ordered out of Port Latour, U.S., where she had gone for shelter and water. Now if those representations are all well founded, then all of those cases mentioned were in violation of the rights secured by the treaty. There are many other cases which show harsh and unnecessary police regulations, but I mention these that were brought under the attention of the Government of the United States and made the subject of diplomatic discussion between the Governments of the United States and Great Britain in consequence of the complaints set forth. Then there was another class. There are four purposes for which fishing vessels of the United States may enter the harbors of Canada. There are other purposes that have grown up since for which they might fairly be allowed to enter without doing any injury to our fishermen, without in any way affecting them as competitors in the markets of the world. One of those is the occasional taking on board persons as mariners. In some cases where mariners were sick, where parties were disposed to leave the fishing vessels, where arrangements had been made for taking others on board, they were not allowed to ship seamen in ports of Nova Scotia, and the vessels were obliged to return to American ports and those who had engaged as fishermen or mariners on those vessels were compelled to take rail and go to some port in the United States before they could go on board and enter American service. The vessels that made complaint on this score were William Keene, Pleiades and Margaret S. Smith. Then there was a third class, such as the case of the Neponset. She was a schooner from Boston. On 27th August, 1886, she was anchored in Port Hawkesbury, Cape Breton, and immediately reported at the custom house. Being short of provisions her master asked the collector for permission to buy more food, but he was twice refused. He then expressed his intention of seeing the United States' consul at Port Hood three miles away. The custom house officer forbade his landing at that port to see the consul; but he did so in spite of the prohibition of the custom house officer. He saw the consul, and was informed that if he attempted to buy provisions in all probability his vessel would be seized. He asked permission, as he was sick, to return to his own country; that was refused, and he travelled through the woods to a station where he boarded a train in order that he might, contrary to the customs and police regulations of Canada in those matters, return to his own country for medical assistance. It is almost impossible to read these statements without feelings of indignation. It is a discredit to any Government to deal with fishermen of a neighboring country in so harsh and so cruel a way as those parties were dealt with under the vexatious regulations made. We know what the consequence has been. It has been, as the Minister of Finance has said, the union of 60,000,000 of people against this country. What is the testimony of the Minister of Finance on this subject? His hon. friends adopted their National Policy nine years ago. It has had nine years' operation on land, and it has been tried two years at sea, and we know the result. We have the testimony of the hon. gentleman himself. The hon. gentleman, in this discussion, said:

"Yesterday we stood face to face with a non-intercourse Bill, sustained by the united action of the Senate and House of Representatives, sustained by almost the whole political parties, Republican and Democratic, of the United States, sustained with few exceptions by a prejudiced, irritated and exasperated people of 60,000,000 lying to the South of us."

How was it those people were so united, irrespective of party, against this country? How was it that the two Houses of Congress, the press of the United States, the people of the United States entertained such feelings of hostility to this country? It was in consequence of the regulations those hon. gentlemen made and which they attempted to enforce. It was intended to force the United States to come to terms, it was attempted to deal otherwise than on principles of common sense with those who controlled the Government of the neighboring Republic. The Minister of Finance has changed his position. He was at one time hostile to the present policy, and that not long ago. The Finance Minister perhaps had as much as any hon. gentleman opposite to do with the framing of the policy that has resulted in these disasters. Since the hon. gentleman visited Washington his opinions have undergone a change, and he has come back entertaining views much more in accord with those of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House.

than we have for a long time heard expressed by those occupying the Treasury benches. We remember that a few years ago the Finance Minister declared himself a free trader. He told us he was not a one-sided free trader. He declared that in order to bring about free trade we must do the people of the United States the credit of imitating them, we must adopt their policy. We know that Sir Francis Hincks when he held the position occupied by the hon. gentleman, came down one afternoon with a certain policy set out in his Budget speech, and at eight o'clock, after being subjected to the pressure of the hon. gentleman, receded from that position and adopted a policy quite different. The hon. gentleman approved it and defended it in this House. It was adopted; it continued twelve months and then met its death at the hands of its friends. The hon. gentleman at that time said: "Why, you see the very moment we propose to put a duty on coal the Congress of the United States removed their duty; you see what an extraordinary effect can be produced by imitating the United States in their fiscal regulations." It happened as was pointed out, that this action of the United States Congress was prior, in point of time, to the action of the Dominion Parliament, and could not, therefore, have been influenced by their actions, but although that was explained at the time it did not prevent the hon. gentleman from pursuing this argument. The hon. gentleman's visit to Washington has had a remarkably sobering effect, it has worked wonders in his political sentiment. He has come back entertaining wholly different views of the situation from those he entertained twelve months ago. The hon. gentleman, twelve months ago, was confident that if the United States adopted a non-intercourse Bill, if they carried out the policy to that effect, it would not, after all, do us great harm. It is true he deprecated the policy, but he told us some extraordinary advantages that we would derive if such a policy were adopted. I will read what the hon. gentleman said, so that it cannot be alleged that I have misrepresented:

"Deeply as we would deplore so mad, so unjustifiable an act on the part of a great country like this great Republic of the United States, adopting such a barbarous policy as that of non-intercourse with a friendly power, we stand in the proud position of knowing that if that policy were adopted to-morrow, we have perfected our lines of communication, and have the most complete means of communication from the furthest and most remote section of our country down to the sea. As I said before this cloud, this only cloud has a silver lining. I would deeply deplore it; every member of the House, and every intelligent Canadian would deeply deplore any interruption of the commercial relations which exist between this country and the United States, but I cannot forget that, if the policy of non-intercourse were adopted, it would lead to the development of those channels of communication between ourselves, and that the commerce of Canada which to-day is building up New York—I am speaking of the through traffic—which to-day is building up Boston and Portland, would be carried through exclusively Canadian channels to Canadian ports, and would build up Montreal, Quebec, St. Andrews, St. John and Halifax with a rapidity which the people of this country can scarcely understand."

Now, Sir, I do not know whether the Grand Trunk Railway, the Canadian Pacific Railway or the Canada Southern Railway would quite agree with the views of the hon. gentleman. I do not know what the traffic of those roads would in a large degree consist of if the policy of non-intercourse had not been carried out. I do not know what traffic would have reached those cities of which the hon. gentleman speaks if there were to be no traffic from the United States passing through Canada. But, Sir, I am not going to stop to discuss that question, because it is only remotely connected with the subject in hand. The hon. gentleman went on to say that:

"That policy (referring to this policy of threatened retaliation) has only to be carried a very short step further to lead Her Majesty's Government to the conclusion that they would owe it to Canada and to themselves, as being the power under which Canada is happy to serve to meet that policy of non-intercourse by such a different mode of treating the grain from the United States of America and the grain grown in Canada, as would vivify the industries of this country, especially the farming industries of this country, to an extent which would make the most marvellous change of this Dominion."

Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman threatened the Government of the United States and the people of the United States not merely with a retaliatory policy on the part of Canada but with a retaliatory policy on the part of the United Kingdom. Was the hon. gentleman authorised to make that threat? Had he any communication from the Government of Lord Salisbury intimating to him that if the United States adopted a policy of non-intercourse—a policy of discrimination such as they here shadowed out they would adopt —

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman will read the passage that preceded that which he has read, he will see it does not stand in the light he has placed it at all. I gave my reason.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes, he gave his reason but he told the House and the country that if the United States adopted such a policy that the Government of the United Kingdom would retaliate.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not, and the hon. gentleman will see I did not when he reads the whole passage.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I have read enough to show—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. You garbled the passage in such a way as to make it say what I did not say.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman has said what is not a fact.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I have read what I have here. If the hon. gentleman sends out and gets the Hansard I am ready to read it. I say that neither the beginning, the end, nor the middle nor any other part of the speech can alter the statement he has made here and I would like to know whether His Excellency the Governor General received any communication from the other side of the water in reference to this matter. I would like to know on what authority the hon. gentleman threatened the great Republic to the South with the indignation and wrath of the Government of the United Kingdom. The hon. gentleman was fond of using high sounding phrases and he may have thought after his return from the United Kingdom that he had something to do with the Government of that great country as well as with the Government of Canada. I will venture to say that the hon. gentleman had no authority to make that statement. I venture to say he had no authority to hold out such a hope or to make such a threat. We know the views the hon. gentleman has expressed in that passage are views as foreign as any well can be to those held by any political man of standing on either side of politics in the United Kingdom. Then, Sir, the hon. gentleman has told us the consequence of the policy that he and his colleagues have pursued. What did he find the state of things at Washington? He said in this debate:

"Yesterday we stood face to face with a Non-intercourse Bill, sustained by the united action of the Senate and House of Representatives, sustained by almost the whole press—Republican and Democratic—of the States, sustained with few exceptions by a prejudiced, irritated and exasperated people numbering 60,000,000 lying to the South of us."

That is the statement of the case as it now stands, and I ask the hon. gentleman to contrast what he said twelve months ago with what he said here last week. I ask the hon. gentleman to contrast the policy he shadowed out twelve months ago with the policy he is supporting to-day. I congratulate the hon. gentleman on his progress. I congratulate him on the progress which he has forced his chief and those associated with him to make in connection with that question. Sir, the Minister of Finance last year professed to stand by the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries; to-day, Sir, in that paragraph which I have read the hon. gentleman stands by neither of his colleagues, but he stands by Mr. Phelps. Mr. Phelps said the policy of Canada in reference to her fishery and custom house articles was barbarous, harsh, inhospitable, contrary to common law, contrary to common justice, and that it produced such a state of irritation on the other side that however anxious the President and his colleagues might be to carry out negotiations with Canada, the state of exasperation was such that it was quite impossible such negotiations could be successfully entered into. That was the exasperation produced twelve months ago by the course pursued by the Government. What does the Finance Minister now say on this question? Let me read the observations which the hon. gentleman made in his speech. He says:

"But what would be thought of Canada if a vessel of the United States loaded with mackerel or fish of any other description were driven by stress of weather and perhaps in a sinking condition compelled to resort to a Canadian port, and if instead of allowing her to tranship her cargo or sell it on paying duty and go to a marine yard for repairs: We said no, you must throw overboard the whole of your cargo because we find you are not allowed to bring your fish into Canada under the Treaty of 1818?"

That, Sir, is the question put by the hon. gentleman. I ask whether any hon. gentleman on this side of the House has pronounced a more severe censure on the colleagues of the Minister of Finance than the hon. gentleman has himself pronounced. This is the very thing that was complained of in the case of the Eliza A. Thomas. The Minister of Marine justifies himself by saying: Such are the provisions of the Treaty of 1818, and the Minister of Finance justifies the provisions made in the treaty that is submitted to us for consideration by saying: That those are fair and proper provisions and that to have acted on different principles would have been harsh and ungenerous and would be contrary to the principle of natural justice. Sir, it did not require a treaty to enable the people of this country to act on the principle of natural justice. We did not require to bind ourselves by a formal document that we might act on the principles of humanity and common sense. We did not require to bind ourselves by a treaty to say to the American people that a vessel is wrecked on our shores, her cargo may be saved, her fish may be put on board another ship or on board a railway car and sent to the neighboring Republic. That was possible without a treaty quite as well as with a treaty, and it was in consequence of the inhuman and the impotent regulations made by the hon. gentlemen opposite that this state of things was brought about. Sir, there is this very extraordinary thing connected with those negotiations. Article 10 of the treaty provides that the fishermen of the United States may enter our harbors, that they may do so under certain conditions to tranship their fish, that they may do so to purchase certain supplies that they may do so without reporting every time if it were half a dozen times a day to the customs. And what did the Minister of Justice say in defence of these strict regulations in the memorandum which he prepared? Why, Sir, he said this:

"It is impossible to enforce the fishery laws for the protection of our fisheries without a strict enforcement of these customs regulations."

That is what the hon. gentleman said last year. The hon. Minister of Finance in this treaty says it is not necessary. He says these concessions may be safely made. He says it is possible to protect our fisheries efficiently, and prevent them being poached upon by the fishermen of the United States without any of those strict regulations which the Minister of Justice said were absolutely necessary for their protection. Well, Sir, who is right; the Minister of Justice in his memorandum, or the Minister of Finance in article 10 of the treaty? Now, Sir, I am inclined so think that the strict regulations were not so necessary as the Minister of Justice supposed. I am inclined to think that the Government had other objects in view than the protection of those regulations. The Government, finding that they were not so very successful by the policy of delay in securing terms with the United States, thought they would see what they could do with a policy of vexation. Well, they succeeded admirably; they succeeded in exasperating sixty millions of people, and in being forced to concede what under other circumstances would never have been demanded. Sir, the hon. gentleman told us that he had not met anybody at Washington who did not say that the Treaty of 1854 was mutually advantageous to both countries. He said that everyone he had met and conversed with on this subject entertained the same opinion as to the mutual advantages that were conferred by that treaty; and the treaty was repealed, not because it was not commercially satisfactory, but because of political irritation that existed between the two countries. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman would have led the House to believe that the political irritation to which he referred was due to the depredations committed by the Alabama. Sir, that was not the case. The treaty was repealed in consequence of the action of the Tory party in this country. Why, Sir, we know how the defeat of Pope was ridiculed. The hon. gentleman who now leads the Government led the Government at the time of the civil war. We know that when Parliament met at Quebec the hon. gentleman and his colleagues rose and cheered and sang "Dixie" when it was reported that Hocker was defeated at Chancellorsville. No American came to Canada and met the hon. gentleman or any of his supporters, who did not feel that he was in a country that was controlled by those who were hostile to him. So the American people took the first opportunity of putting an end to a treaty that was commercially satisfactory to both countries, in consequence of the avowed sympathies of hon. gentlemen opposite for the South. Why, Sir, we know the sentiments that were expressed at that time. Those hon. gentlemen told us that democracy was a failure, that the people were not capable of governing themselves, that they required an aristocratic or monarchical element as ballast for the political ship in order that it might sail safely for any length of time; and so they rejoiced at what seemed the disruption of the American Republic. Not because the people of that Republic had done them any wrong, but because they were hostile to a free government, and were anxious that their predictions as to its failure should be, as they apparently were, confirmed. Now, Sir, we have had a second exhibition of hostility, which had its origin in the policy of retaliation, of which I believe the hon. gentleman claims to have been the author; at all events, so far as I know, he was the first to suggest it. Well, Sir, I am glad the hon. gentleman has made progress; I am rejoiced to see that he now entertains views of a different character. The hon. gentleman is now inclined to believe that freer intercourse with the neighboring Republic would be of no disadvantage to this country. But the hon. gentleman told us that the Treaty of Washington was a wise treaty—that everybody now praised it, although we on this side at the time were violently opposed to it. I would like anyone to mention a single clause of that treaty which is now approved of to which we were opposed at that time. There is not one. We were opposed to the free navigation of the St. Lawrence being granted to the Americans without our consent and without our receiving anything in return. There is no river in Europe that is made navigable to those high up the stream through to the sea, that is not also navigable to those at the mouth as far up as the river is used for navigation. The same is true of every river in South America; but that was not the rule secured to us by the Washington Treaty. The people of Chicago have a right to use the St. Lawrence for all time to come for going to the sea and returning to Chicago; but we are not free to navigate Lake Michigan or to go to Chicago. He knows that we did not receive the free navigation of the River Columbia or the rivers of Alaska. He knows that we surrendered the use of our canals without getting anything in return. There is not a provision of the Treaty of 1871 of which we complained then that we do not complain of to-day. The hon. gentleman has told us that we do Mr. Chamberlain an injustice in holding him responsible for the concessions that were made. I believe, Sir, that is not true. I believe Mr. Chamberlain was not more anxious to make concessions to the United States than was the hon. gentleman himself or the hon. gentleman who sits besides him. Mr. Chamberlain recently said, in addressing the people of Birmingham:

"The Canadian Government and its representatives were most desirous of terminating a state of irritation dangerous in its possible consequence to Canada."

Mr. Chamberlain says the hon. gentleman was anxious to terminate this state of irritation, but how came there to be a state of irritation? It is a mistake to suppose that in this case concessions were made simply at the demand of the Government of Great Britain. The hon. gentleman knows the state of exasperation in which he found the public sentiment in the United States; and knowing that it was dangerous to this country, knowing that the American Government could do us immensely more mischief than we could do them by a policy of non-intercourse, he was anxious to come to terms at any price; he was just as anxious to make concessions as Mr. Chamberlain. Mr. Chamberlain visited this city; he saw the Prime Minister and no doubt learned the situation. He ascertained the views of the First Minister quite as well as the Minister of Finance, knowing that he and his colleagues were responsible for the condition of things that existed in the United States, I have no doubt was quite as anxious to make concessions as was the British representative who came from Birmingham. The hon. Minister of Finance devoted a great deal of time in praising the commissioners; but there is one thing which he did not explain to us, but which he will perhaps explain before the debate closes, that is, how Mr. Bayard came to name him as the British commissioner. The hon. gentleman knows that in Mr. Bayard's letters, Mr. Bayard expresses, not only his readiness to enter into negotiations with the Government of the United Kingdom, with the view of coming to a better understanding, but also names the hon. gentleman as the British commissioner he was most anxious should carry on the negotiations. At whose suggestion was the hon. gentleman named? It would seem, from his statement, that the Imperial Government was rather inclined to name his colleague, Sir John A. Macdonald, but that hon. gentleman, with that modesty for which he is distinguished, gave up his right to the honor, and allowed it to be conferred, in accordance with Mr. Bayard's suggestion, upon his colleague the Minister of Finance. The hon. gentleman says that we owe a great deal to the right arm of Great Britain in this controversy. I do not think that the military power or the diplomatic resources of England were of the slightest use to us. On the contrary, I believe they have done us much mischief. I believe that the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches would scarcely have ventured to enter upon their policy so impudent, so offensive to the people of the United States, and so mischievous and disastrous in its consequences to the people of this country, if they had not supposed the Government of England would have helped them through the difficult crisis upon which they had entered. What has happened forces us to recognise the fact that the 60,000 of people to the South of us are supreme on this continent, that the Munroe doctrine, on the whole, is pretty well established on this continent, and that while the Government of the United Kingdom are ready to aid us by any amount of good advice, they will never be disposed to aid us with anything which can be of more effect. They recognise the fact that the Government of the United States is supreme, that whatever power or liberty we possess, we enjoy in a large degree by sufferance and that it is necessary we should act with great care and prudence in order that we may tide over the difficulties by which we are surrounded in consequence of the action of hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches. They point out the necessity of making a new departure, of establishing new relations, of altering the course upon which we have entered, and adopting one more in consonance with the circumstances and facts with which we are surrounded. The hon. the Minister of Finance has told us that he made a proposition in favor of unrestricted reciprocity, that he proposed to leave the fishery question in abeyance by making other provisions by a collateral arrangement such as that which existed before. I have no reason to question the accuracy of the hon. gentleman's statement. But what puzzles me is this. The hon. gentleman's chief at Washington, Mr. Chamberlain, declared himself against such a policy before he left the United Kingdom. The hon. gentleman's chief who sits beside him (Sir John A. Macdonald) declared himself against such a policy some time ago. Now, how was it that the hon. gentleman, in spite of the avowed declaration of Mr. Chamberlain in England, and in spite of the avowed declarations of the hon. First Minister here, offered unrestricted reciprocity to the United States? Supposing the American Government had taken up that proposition and accepted it. Supposing they had said: You have offered us unrestricted reciprocity, we are ready to accept it and to enter into negotiations on that basis. Was the hon. gentleman prepared to stand by his policy? Was Mr. Chamberlain, notwithstanding his declaration on the other side of the Atlantic, prepared to stand by his policy? I would like to know. There are a great many people in this House and on both sides of the Atlantic who would like to have a solution of this question. The right hon. the First Minister did not seem fully to realise the extraordinary change that had taken place. The hon. gentleman has been saying for a long time "heads up." But the hon. the Minister of Finance came back from Washington and said: "tails up"; and it was a most disagreeable position for the First Minister as well as for those who sit around him. I would like to know how it was the hon. gentleman obtained the consent of the First Minister to the policy that he did not seem altogether to realise, even after the hon. gentleman's return and after we had entered into these negotiations. I am rather inclined to think that the hon. gentleman had the assent of the First Minister to a proposition of the sort, but I am inclined to think the First Minister was disposed to give that assent, knowing the Americans desired that interpretation of the treaty, with a view of checkmating hon. gentlemen on this side. Let him take this side of the House for one moment into his confidence, and tell us whether he does think that the hon. Minister, who sits beside him, in making that proposition with his assent, did not, after all, bungle it a little, and produce an impression different from that which the First Minister intended to produce. I am sure if the hon. gentleman would make a clean breast of it, I am sure if he would freely avow the sentiments he entertained, I am sure if he would tell us what he instructed his Minister to do, and how far afield he was in following strictly those instructions, we would have a considerable amount of light thrown upon this proposition of unrestricted reciprocity by the hon. the Minister of Finance—the more especially that the hon. the Minister of Finance said it would be just as foolish to propose unrestricted reciprocity to the United States as it would be to undertake to construct a railway to the moon. Yet, notwithstanding the folly of the proposition, the hon. gentleman made it. Now, I shall ask the attention of the House for a few minutes to some of the provisions of this treaty.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Well, I think that the time I have occupied, I have applied to the discussion of some of the features of this question, which were brought under the attention of the House by the hon. gentleman's colleague.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Certainly.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The most important provision of this treaty is that relating to the surrender of our sovereignty over a large area of water, an area which must embrace in the neighborhood of 20,000 square miles. The hon. gentleman has but to look at the map to see what an extraordinary area of what we suppose to be a part of our Dominion, and in that I include Newfoundland as well, we have given up. I wish to call the attention of the House to the position taken by the United States on this headland question. The United States have never maintained that the contention we have put forward with regard to the bays and headlands is peculiar to the Convention of 1818. On the contrary, they admit that the Convention of 1818, in laying down the shore line, simply followed the rules of international law,—that, in fact, if there had been no treaty at all, and we had exclusive dominion over our waters, the same question would have been raised as has been raised in this treaty. The hon. gentleman shakes his head, but I say that would be so. That contention, again and again, has been put forward by the United States. The United States insisted upon the maintenance of these rules, that is the rules relating to the headland question, believing them to conform to the well established principles of international law. They believed them to conform to the law of nations which treats of the maritime boundary of States as being three miles from any shore, bay, creek, river, &c., precisely as does the Treaty of 1818. The Convention of 1818 did nothing more than lay down the rule of international law in this particular. If that is so, and they themselves state that in the case and argue it before the Halifax Commission on that point, what is our position? It is exactly the position of the United States. Whatever right they have over the bays on their coasts, we have over the bays on our coasts. The maximum size of a bay in any other country cannot be greater than that in our own country. What have the Supreme Court of the United States and their Attorney General and the district courts decided in regard to the bays on their coasts? They have decided that the bays belong to the States in which they are situated, or are in common to the States which they may divide. Justice Storey, in a very important case, held that the Bay of Delaware was not a part of the high seas because, as he said, it was between the jaws of the land and was therefore a part of the land. That same rule has been recognised by the opinion of the United States courts, by the opinion of their Attorney General, and does anyone suppose that, if the Minister of Finance had said to the American representatives, if you dispute our pretensions in regard to our bays upon our coasts we must refer this to an international commission, and the rule on our coasts is precisely the same as the rule in regard to bays on your coasts, in regard for instance, to the Bay of Delaware, which is 15 miles wide, to Chesapeake Bay, which is 12 miles wide, to Massachusetts Bay, which is 40 miles wide, and we claim the same right to those bays as you claim to come into our bays, and if there is a dispute, it must be submitted to arbitration, and it will apply to your bays as well as to ours—does any one suppose that the American Government would, in face of the decision of their own courts, and the opinion of their own law officers, have insisted against us that we were not doing justice, or that we should have such an arrangement made as between the two countries? I believe it was in the power of the British commissioners to dictate their own terms on that matter, and that the Americans, anxious as they are to enter into our waters for fishing purposes, would never surrender their rights over their own bays in order to secure that; and it was impossible, after the line which they had taken before the Halifax Commission, for them to have successfully contended against us if we chose to stand out against that contention. Then I call attention to the decision which was given by the Queen's Bench in England. There was a case of murder which took place in the Bristol Channel, which is more like one of our bays than any other arm of the sea in the United Kingdom. I think it is 20 miles wide at the mouth, but it was decided by the Court of Queen's Bench that it was not part of the high seas, but was a part of the counties between which it ran. Then there is a decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council as to the dispute which took place as to Conception Bay on the east coast of Newfoundland, which is 20 miles wide. It was held that that was part of the island and not part of the high seas. In view of the decision of the Privy Council, in view of the decision of the Queen's Bench in England, in view of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, the district courts and law officers of the United States, in favor of the contention which we have always put forward, I say that it was only necessary to say to the people of the United States or to the negotiators on their behalf: If you dispute our contention, the whole question of the bays on your coast as well as the bays on ours must be referred to some impartial tribunal, and we are ready to abide by that; and I have no doubt whatever as to what would have been the result. It is utterly impossible that the American commissioners could have contended for a different rule being applied to Canada if our case had been fairly put on the impregnable grounds which were open to those who were the Canadian commissioners, if they had seen proper to insist upon those grounds. We have heard a reference made to the North Sea Treaty, for the purpose of defending the concessions which have been made in this treaty in regard to bays and headlands. There is no analogy between the North Sea Treaty and the treaty which is now spread before us. In the North Sea Treaty there were half a dozen parties concerned. There were Norway, Denmark, Germany, Holland, Belgium, France and the United Kingdom. They were all interested. There were bays extending into the territories of each of these powers, and there was a provision agreed to that any bay which was more than ten miles wide at its mouth should be common property for fishing purposes. That provision was made because it was a matter of common convenience, because each party to the agreement had something to concede, and each had something to gain. The rule which was adopted was one which is not applicable to our case. It was not a treaty made under any international law, but for the convenience of each, and for the benefit of the fishermen of each of the different countries which were interested. Is that our position? What bays on the other side have been thrown open to us? What bays more than ten miles wide on the American coast have we obtained any right to enter? From the first to the last this has been a concession on our part. There was no analogy between this case, this treaty which we have now before us for consideration and the treaty which has been referred to in regard to the North Sea. I would like to ask the House for a moment to look at articles III, IV, and V. Article III declares that all bays less than ten miles wide are to remain the exclusive property of Canada, that bays more than ten miles wide are common fishing property until you reach a point where the bay is less than ten miles wide, and then the line is drawn. Article IV specifies certain bays which are more than ten miles wide, which are to remain the exclusive property of Canada, but there are many bays which are omitted, such as Placentia Bay, Hare Bay, Bonaventure Bay, Conception Bay, St. George Bay, and other bays on the shores of Newfoundland.

which were formerly regarded as the exclusive property of the Crown and are now made the common property of all nations. I asked the hon. gentleman to give an explanation of Article V. He did not give an explanation of the article but he gave an example of a bay which would come within the provisions of that article. That is only one case. I think article V will come within a construction which will limit the provisions contained in article III. It is negative in its provisions. It simply says:

"Nothing in this treaty shall be construed to include within the common waters such any interior portions of any bays, creeks or harbors as cannot be reached from the sea without passing within three marine miles mentioned in article I of the Convention of October 20, 1818."

Now, the hon. the Minister gave us an instance where there were two or three islands scattered in the mouth of a bay, and he said that, where that was more than six miles wide, that would be common fishing ground. But that does not appear in this clause, which says that "nothing in this treaty shall be construed to include within the common waters any such interior portions of any bay, &c., as cannot be reached from the sea without passing within the three marine miles mentioned in article I." Take the Bay of Minas, that is twenty miles across, that has an entrance eight miles wide—does the hon. gentleman say that you could exclude American fishermen from that bay? I say that it is as clear as noon day that they are admitted under the provisions of that article. If a bay is more than six miles between headlands, and it widens out into a basin more than ten miles wide, then it becomes common fishing ground as long as the parties keep more than three miles from the coast. It is clear that under that article, the American contention of the Treaty of 1818, is allowed to operate in the case of a large number of bays upon the coast of Nova Scotia, and upon the coasts of Newfoundland. Now, that being the case, the hon. gentleman will see that, in the first place, he has restricted our contention by the surrender of a large number of bays, by far the greater number, that are over ten miles wide, and then he has further restricted it by surrendering all those that are more than six miles between the headlands, if they widen out into basins more than ten miles wide. I say it is as clear as anything can be that that is the construction which will be put upon that article, and it seems to me that must have been the construction that was intended. With no negative provisions such as are contained in that article, it is quite impossible that the hon. gentleman and those who advised him, could have failed to understand the scope of its provisions. I have sometimes seen it stated in the press which supports the hon. gentlemen, that it would be no use to raise the question as to the rights of the Americans to bays upon their coasts, because there are no fish in them. Well, Sir, this is not a peddler's question, it is a question of sovereignty; and there are other considerations besides merely the right of fishing, or the use of those bays for fishing purposes, to be borne in mind. We cannot expect always to be at peace, we cannot expect always to be just in the circumstances in which we are placed now, and it is of the utmost consequence to us that those large bodies of water upon our coasts which we have hitherto claimed to be a portion of our territory, should have remained such that our sovereignty over them should be maintained. Why, Sir, if the United States, in bays and harbors in which there are no fish, which have no value for fishing purposes, so tenaciously uphold their pretensions, of how much greater consequence is it to us to uphold and maintain our rights in the bays upon our coasts, when they are valuable for other than maritime purposes, and those of defence. Yet, the hon. gentleman has not in a single instance, so far as we know, raised the question of the pretensions of the United States. Sir, we know what the Americans are at this moment maintaining with regard to Behring Sea. Here is a sea nearly 2,000 miles in length and more than 2,000 miles in width, of which they claim dominion to one-half; and at the very time when they are claiming dominion over a sea which, from point to point, is more than 2,000 miles across, they are denying to us our sovereignty and dominion over bays that are more than ten miles across, and that concession the hon. gentleman, by this treaty, has made. I do not pretend to say that the hon. gentleman, in conceding some of the pretensions with regard to commercial intercourse, has made provisions that are detrimental to the interests of this country. I think that these might well have been conceded, I think they ought to have been conceded without a treaty at all. I think it was unfortunate for this country that these questions were raised. It was the meddling oversight of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and the Minister of Customs that raised these questions. I do not say that the responsibility wholly rests with them, for I have no doubt whatever that in this matter they had the support and approval of their colleagues; but I say that the exasperation which the hon. gentleman says he has done so much to allay, the irritation which he says, and which we saw from the negotiations, stood in the way of all negotiations for a time, the exasperation and irritation which the hon. gentleman makes the justification of the unnecessary concession he has made, are due to the action of those hon. gentlemen with reference to their commercial policy upon our coasts. If the hon. gentleman had not adopted his fishing regulations, if he had not undertaken vexatiously to worry and annoy American fishermen, if the hon. gentleman had not made vexatious customs regulations, which the Minister of Justice said were absolutely necessary for the protection of our fisheries, but which the Minister of Finance, with his new experience, declares were wholly unnecessary, and may be safely conceded, and are conceded by this treaty. I say it is unfortunate they were raised at all, because by raising them, they had not only conceded what ought never to have been denied, but they have also conceded that which was absolutely necessary to the due protection of this country in case of difficulty and of danger. Sir, the hon. gentlemen, while professing to feel great interest in the fisheries, have done little or nothing to furnish adequate harbor accommodation and protection to the fishing vessels which are engaged in the deep sea fishery. We know that is where the real difficulty exists, and from this treaty we know, if we did not know before, that it is the deep-sea fisheries which the Americans regard as of the utmost consequence to them. The hon. gentleman has proposed negotiations for our inshore fisheries. Have the Americans accepted the offer of the hon. gentleman? They tell us that they are very valuable, they are growing more and more valuable from day to day. But that is not the opinion of the American fishermen, because they have refused to negotiate for them, they consider them of no consequence; what they regard of consequence are facilities for engaging in the deep-sea fisheries, and the hon. gentleman has adopted a policy which has provoked retaliation and brought about concessions that will go a long way to put American fishermen in a better position for engaging in the deep-sea fisheries than they ever were before. What now does he propose to do? To equalise the condition of things and to improve the position of the deep-sea fisheries of the Maritime Provinces? The hon. gentleman has proposed nothing, he has suggested nothing, he has left those fishermen to take care of themselves. He first exasperated, then he conceded to the American fishermen what was necessary to allay their exasperation. And so we are in the humiliating position of being called upon here to-night to ratify what these hon. gentlemen have done in sacrificing a large portion of the territories of this country, of our sovereignty over that territory, without at all being aware that those sacrifices and concessions will satisfy the people of the United States. Why, Sir, it would at least have been dignified if the hon. gentleman had waited a short time to see whether the American people would approve of what has been done. The hon. gentleman knows that to-morrow his treaty will be postponed or rejected, and before it is postponed or rejected he wants to commit this House to this proposition so that it must be made the starting point on all future negotiations. The hon. gentleman feels that the position of the Government is one of humiliation and that the Parliament of this country ought to be made sharers in the discredit of the work that has been done.

Mr. WELDON (Albert). The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) at the close of the debate on the fisheries treaty on Friday night or Saturday morning when discussing with the Finance Minister the reasons why there had been a miscarriage of some arrangement for the closing of the debate during that sitting of the House, took occasion to administer a rebuke to those members of the House who were not sworn of the Privy Council or who had not special acquaintance with the fisheries question, because they had ventured, among the number being my hon. friend the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Kinney), the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Eisenhauer) and the hon. member for Shelburne (General Laurie) to take part in this debate. There are eighty odd young members of this House, and I think it did not well become a Liberal leader to express this illiberal sentiment. Those of us who represent maritime constituencies, however young we are in Parliament and how ever unable we may be to debate those questions with older and stronger men, we yet feel it to be our duty and our right to speak on these questions as well as we may. I must to-night coming to the fishery question compliment the Minister of Marine who has for two and a-half years now held that portfolio on the happy termination of the long and arduous struggle in which he has been engaged. Last summer in the city of St. John the right hon. the First Minister took occasion to pay a splendid compliment to this young colleague in view of the courage and patience and the courtesy which he had shown in the most difficult duties during those two years, which more than, or certainly as much as any two previous years since Confederation, called for the exercise of the very highest qualities in the administration of the Department; and that compliment found a re-echo all through New Brunswick. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) opened his speech to-night by asking why it was that the Administration was in so great a hurry, why they were bound to close this debate, why they must come to a conclusion before we know what action had been taken by the American Senate. But here is a bargain, and if it is to be ultimately ratified by the Imperial Parliament, by the Dominion Parliament, by the Newfoundland Legislature and by the American Senate it will never be carried out if each one is waiting for the other, for some one must begin. We have had the present Bill on our Order Paper and we have commenced; and what could be more business-like and proper than that having begun we should conclude the matter? The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) says the treaty will be rejected, or he thinks the treaty will be rejected. He seems to share that feeling. Why will the Americans reject the treaty if it is on the part of Canada such a base and abject surrender, as the hon. gentleman says it is? There is scarcely an offensive adjective in the English language that the hon. gentleman has not applied to this treaty. The old ground has been travelled again. The hon. gentleman has repeated the old charges that we were harsh, exasperating, impolitic, irritating, in the administration of our laws for the last two years.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The Minister of Marine says so.

Mr. WELDON (Albert). I will not say, as the right hon. gentleman who leads this House said with respect to another Opposition member, that the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) is a perfect Bourbon, forgets nothing and learns nothing. The hon. gentleman is an imperfect Bourbon, he learns nothing, but he forgets everything. He forgets, if he was present in the House, the adequate answer which the Minister of Marine and Fisheries gave to those charges. He has not in substance made a new charge, but he has given the appearance of novelty to old statements by giving the names of five or six new vessels, and he has taken the responsibility, as a member of the Canadian Parliament, speaking to five millions of people and beyond, to say what the responsible Ministers of the United States never said and never dared to say, namely, that in the case of the vessels Rattler, Caroline, Vought, Sarah B. Putnam, Newell B. Hawes, Stowell, and Sherman we were guilty of cruelty and inhumanity. Let us go into this matter a little more fully. The facts are that specific charges of inhumanity against the Canadian Government in regard to those fishing vessels were actually distributed through the American press. What was the origin of the distribution of that news, what did it begin with, whence did it all come? It came from this. The American Senate appointed a committee to take evidence as to the extent of those illegal inhumanities on the part of the Canadian Government. Their commander, the late Spencer F. Baird, sent out a circular letter, which I will read to substantiate what I said, to his subordinates in these terms:

"UNITED STATES COMMISSION OF FISH AND FISHERIES,

"WASHINGTON, D. C., 5th February, 1887.

"SIR: I forward herewith for your information a copy of a communication from Mr. R. Edward Earle, in charge of the division of fisheries of this commission, accompanied by a list of New England fishing vessels which have been inconvenienced in their fishing operations by the Canadian authorities during the past season; these being in addition to the vessels mentioned in the revised list of vessels involved in the controversy with the Canadian authorities furnished to your committee on the 26th January by the Secretary of State.

"The papers containing the statements were received from the owners, masters, or agents of the vessels concerned, and though not accompanied by affidavits are believed to be correct."

"Very,

"SPENCER F. BAIRD,"

Commissioner.

"HON. GEORGE F. EDMUNDS,"

"Chairman Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate."

I have here the letter of Mr. Earle, to whom Mr. Baird's letter was written. After stating:

"Some time since, at your request, I mailed circulars to owners or agents of all New England vessels employed in the food-fish fisheries."

He says as follows in the concluding sentence:

"I enclose for your consideration a list of these vessels, together with a brief abstract of the statements of the owners or masters regarding the treatment received. The statements were not accompanied by affidavits but are believed to be entirely reliable."

Evidence was not taken, witnesses were not examined or cross-examined, and there were none of the guarantees which the British law throws around evidence to prevent imposition, but, on the contrary, those unsupported, unsworn statements were sent throughout the United States, but I am proud to say the Secretary of State would not take on himself the responsibility which the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), has taken to-day of distributing those infamous falsehoods broadcast throughout the whole country. To come to the question proper: It was to all of us a feeling of relief when we learned that the Finance Minister and his confreres had returned from Washington with a treaty. The one disturbing element in the relations of the two great powers, Great Britain and the United States, for a hundred years has been this fishery question. That was the devil, so to say, which the diplomatists would lay for a time but never exorcise. We adopted a measure in 1818, we obtained a temporary adjustment in

1854, we had a temporary adjustment in 1871, but we have before us in the schedule of the Bill the draft of a treaty which, if ratified, will put an end forever to those quarrels of a century's standing. Let us very briefly clear our minds of all matters of detail and once more very rapidly turn our attention to the main substantial outlines of this matter. In all our fishery negotiations with the United States we have held in our hands three properties, and it is desirable that in considering this question we should keep them distinct. First we have exclusive fishing in the three-mile limit, and our legal right in this matter has never been contested. We have, secondly, our exclusive fishery in the territorial bays or in the words of the old treaty, "British bays" and, thirdly, we have the advantages of neighborhood to the fishing grounds. How are we to deal with these, one after the other, in this treaty? The policy of 1854 was to sell our rights in that matter for a market and we sold the rights of our fishermen in the inshore fisheries for a market, a market for our fishermen it is true, a market for the farmers, a market for the miners and a market for the lumbermen. You may say that was "robbing Peter to pay Paul" and the friends of the fishermen 30 years ago felt that way about it, but there is the fact. I will not dwell as the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) did on the cause of the termination of that treaty. No doubt he was in part right when he attributed the abrogation of the Washington Treaty to the ill will between the Northern States and ourselves. But that is not a fair statement of the entire cause in my judgment. I think the material reason why the Elgin Treaty of 1854 was abrogated in 1866, was that there was a profound jealousy in the city of New York and with the carrying companies west of New York, of the St. Lawrence route and the St. Lawrence cities. That had something to do with the abrogation of the Treaty of 1866. Now, I come to the record of this three-mile limit policy in 1871. Under the Elgin Treaty we sold our inshore fisheries for a market. In 1871, we sold them for gold. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) said that every view he had in respect to the Washington Treaty of 1871 he held to-night. I say again he is not correct and that he has a bad memory. If he will look back on a speech he made in 1871 he will find some predictions of his that certainly have not been verified. The hon. gentleman is much more successful in his historical than his prophetic utterances. The role of a prophet is dangerous to all men, and they who prophesy least have least to take back. At the time of the Halifax Commission the hon. gentleman made a speech in which he said it was utterly impossible for a commission to decide on the relative value of Canadian and American fisheries, leading us to suppose we could get nothing out of that commission. Well, we did get something out of the commission. We got a round five and a half million dollars. It may have been a small sum altogether, but it was quite a respectable sum and enough to falsify this prophecy so confidentially made by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). What is our policy in this treaty with respect to the inshore fisheries? In one statement made the other night by the hon. the Minister of Justice, in his encounter with the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I., (Mr. Davies), and a statement which got a quicker response from this House than any other statement made, and which, in my judgment, there was no more statesmanlike remark made in the course of this debate—I refer to the statement that it was a wise policy for the Canadian people, looking to their future, to hold those inshore fisheries and to preserve the fisheries within this three-mile limit, and that we have pursued a wiser course here than we did in 1854 or 1870. Those marginal seas, as we call them, are, so to speak, the fisherman's farm. Our fishermen leave the shore at early morning before daylight, take their boats, lines and nets and go to their farms on the sea and return with the fruits of their labor at night. Our farmers in the same way go out in the early morning to their fields and bring in their harvest in the harvest time at night. If we preserve this policy which is embodied in the Treaty of 1888, the result will be, Mr. Speaker, that we will keep our fishermen at home, that we will make our fisheries a productive and a permanent industry in the country, and when by-and-bye the day will come when we will have, as all growing people must have, to raise a navy and support a navy for her own defence we have there the nucleus of a fine body of men out of which a navy can be made. It is a statesmanlike principle to guard our fisheries for our own people, and just as necessary as to guard our forests, our mining area or our marsh lands and not sell them en bloc to a stranger. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) said that the headland question was the great question, and I quite agree with him. It has been the material cause of the quarrel between the two peoples. It has been in controversy since 1818, and I agree with him that the difficulty, however, is largely a difficulty as to a principle of law, for the words of the treaty are reasonably clear. Hon. members all know very well the several contentions on this question. The rule, of course, is that the high seas are free from the dominion of any one and that the property in the fish there is free to all. Everyone understands that some small bays are part and parcel of the State that has its headlands and strand lying between them, but the controversy lies as to how large a bay must be before it may properly be called a high sea. When the plenipotentiaries met last November in Washington they had before them the old Treaty of 1818, which simply says:

"Whereby American fishermen renounce forever their right to come into British seas."

The word "British" is not defined and the whole question has been how are we to come to the meaning of "British" or to its equivalent word "territorial?" The hon. gentleman said that in our administration of the law we had gone to the American Government in a spirit of 200 years ago and that our policy was a mediæval one. I tell the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) that his law is mediæval law, and that he has quoted to this House on this subject exploded authorities of the last century. He has quoted here the opinions of Judge Story, which are opinions given many years ago. I wonder why he did not quote Chancellor Kent who was an authority on this subject many years ago. With his permission I will quote from Woolsey who has reviewed the opinions of those men who held that bays stretching from quite distant headlands such as from Cape Ann to Cape Codd and from Nantucket to Montauk Point and from that point to the Capes of the Delaware and from the South Cape of Florida to the Mississippi were within the limit. Woolsey holds that those are not territorial waters and he says:

"But such broad claims have not it is believed been much urged and they are out of character for a nation that has ever asserted the freedom of doubtful waters as well as contrary to the spirit of more recent times."

The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) quoted the Attorney General of the United States but he did not do us the favor to say what Attorney General. He did not tell us and the opinion may be as old and obsolete and mediæval as the opinion of Judge Story. The hon. gentleman proposed to deal with the opinions of the English court on this matter. He said the common law courts in England dealt with this matter and he spoke of a case where the English court claimed to have jurisdiction over a vessel in the Bristol Channel. That particular point of the Bristol Channel is in the county of Glamorganshire in Wales and the channel is properly speaking but the mouth of the river and bears no analogy whatever to any of the waters in controversy in this country, for example the Baie des Chaleurs. He dealt more fairly and stated more appositely the case when he dealt with a decision of the Privy Council in the Conception Bay case, in which the question was raised as to the authority of the Newfoundland Legislature over a point of land 4 miles from the inner part of Conception Bay, where a cable company had placed a buoy. The hon. gentleman misled this House. I do not say that he deliberately and intentionally misled the House but he led us to understand that the English court in that case proceeded upon a rule of law, that a point four miles from the shore of Conception Bay was a part of the high seas. I say that is not the ruling of the court in this case and the ruling of the court is quite the contrary. They said that the British Parliament had declared that Conception Bay was part of the British waters and a British court is bound by the words of an Imperial statute whatever their opinion of the law may be. I will read what Lord Blackburn said in giving judgment on this Conception Bay case. Lord Blackburn had not made up his mind on this point but the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) seems to have made up his mind on it if Lord Blackburn did not:

"It does not appear to their lordships that jurists and text writers are agreed what were the rules as to dimensions and configuration, which, apart from other considerations, would lead to the conclusion that a bay is or is not a part of the territory of the State possessing the adjoining coasts, and it has never, that they can find, been made the ground of judicial determination."

The hon. gentleman said that there had been judgment in different courts; Lord Blackburn says there has been no judgment with which he is acquainted.

"If it were necessary in this case to lay down a rule, the difficulty of the task would not deter their Lordships from attempting to fulfil it. But in their opinion it is not necessary to do so. It seems to them that, in point of fact, the British Government has for a long period exercised dominion over this bay, and that their claim has been acquiesced in by other nations, so as to show that the bay has been for a long time occupied exclusively by Great Britain, a circumstance which, in the tribunals of any country, would be very important. And, moreover (which in a British tribunal is conclusive), the British Legislature has by Acts of Parliament declared it to be part of the British territory, and part of the country made subject to the Legislature of Newfoundland."

I think, Mr. Speaker, that this effectually disposes of that aspect of the case. By the law of nations, what are our rights in land-locked bays like the Bay of Chaleurs? We can only find the law of nations from two sources—the opinions of the great text writers and the courts, and the history and practice of nations. I do not know any subject in international law about which there is so much controversy, disagreement and confusion as the subject of the jurisdiction of nations in land-locked bays. I have obtained in the library the opinions of all the authorities on this subject that I could find, leaving out English and American authorities, and I will venture to give them to the House. Azuni, Vol. I, p. 46, after asking the question: How wide at the mouth a bay must be before the State which owns the two defining headlands and the intervening strand loses exclusive dominion over such bay, answers: "Nevertheless, there is no consensus of opinion, and no accord in national practice, respecting the extent of this sovereignty." Bluntschli, at section 309 of his book on International Law, says, "Where the width is but small." Reyneval, in his law of Nature and Nations, Vol. I, p. 299, says that there is great uncertainty, "but the extent of this property is not determined by a uniform rule." Prof. De-Martens states that there are conflicting theories, and seems to favor the range of a double-cannon shot, so that the bay could be defended from both sides. Fiore, Vol. I, p. 374, says: "We speak of bays of small extent, not those of great width." De Hautefeuille, Vol. I, page 93, says: "The authors, unanimous upon the principle of sovereignty, over the territorial sea, are far from agreed as to its extent." Some says "100 miles, some says 60, some 30 miles, and some the horizon." Vattel, a standard author of not so many years ago, expresses himself in similar terms. In the light of these opinions, who can say that the great writers on the law of nations are agreed. The hon. gentleman says there is a definite rule, but they say there is not a definite rule, and that in the absence of public law, you are utterly at sea as to what your rights are in these land-locked bays. Passing away from the writers, we have but one other means of determining what are our rights, that is the practice of nations. The hon. gentleman has undertaken to deal with these matters, but I may be pardoned if I remind him that the practice of nations is reasonably definite and clear. We are not alone in our fishery troubles. The fisheries on the North Atlantic coast are not the only fisheries in which England has been interested. There are extensive fisheries on the eastern side of the British Islands, and there are fisheries in the North Sea, with reference to which England has a treaty with France, made in 1839. In determining with France what should be regarded as the maximum limit of her jurisdiction, England in that treaty had agreed to the ten-mile rule. In 1868 in a treaty with Germany with reference to the fisheries in the North German Ocean, she has also agreed to the ten-mile rule. Then there is the Treaty of 1862, to which the hon. Minister of Finance alluded, in which the same rule was followed. I call the attention of the House to these facts in order to show that while there is no consensus of opinion in the writers on international law, there is a uniformity in the practice of the great nations of Europe; and I do not see how our negotiators could have expected to obtain more than the ten-mile rule; yet article 3 closes all the small bays by the ten-mile rule, and article 4 closes all the large ones by individual delimitation. Hon. gentleman claim that Canadian fishermen have under this treaty been deprived of their lawful fishing grounds, but the only possible ones are the Gulf of St. Lawrence and the Bay of Fundy. The hon. member for Northumberland stated the case fairly the other night when he stated that all parties are agreed that the Bay of Fundy is regarded as part of the high seas, partly because of the great width of the bay, and partly because the northern headland is in the United States. The hon. member for Queen's, P. E. I., (Mr. Davies) delivered a very interesting speech, a speech very highly prized by this House, not altogether because of its own inherent merits, but because of very spirited rejoinder which it provoked from the hon. Minister of Justice. I think, if the hon. member for Queen's would speak frankly to-night as to his feelings when the Minister of Justice had done with him, he would say with Sir Andrew Aguecheek, "Plague on it! had I known him valiant and so cunning in defense, I would have seen him damned before I challenged him." The hon. senior member for Halifax, (Mr. Jones) took high patriotic ground that was delightful to see. We know the hon. gentleman and respect him highly, but the patriotic role is not his normal role; and when he said that as a Canadian he was prepared to make sacrifices for the sake of the Empire, I was astonished. He takes the ground that this treaty and the interests of Canada have been sacrificed by the exercise of Imperial pressure and the same position was taken, and more strongly taken, by the hon. member for Northumberland. But, I desire, to impress this point on hon. members, that Great Britain, in negotiating this treaty for her Canadian people, has preserved to them the ten-mile rule, and has held for them bays much wider than ten miles, while in negotiating with reference to the rights of her own English people in the German Ocean she has not gone so far or secured such great rights. She has held out more strongly and stubbornly to protect us than she has done to protect her people at home. Mr. Speaker, I must apologise for occupying the time of the House so long. I shall sit down by saying that I share in all sincerity the feelings of the hon. member for Halifax when he said he was glad to see a cause of quarrel between the two nations removed. I think we all express the hope that this treaty will be ratified, we cherish the relief that this treaty will be ratified by the Canadian Parliament, and I cherish the hope that this treaty, in which undoubtedly we have made concessions, will be ratified by the Americans. It is a treaty that undoubtedly comes long below what we argued for; it is undoubtedly a treaty of concession. We hope the Americans will ratify it, and thus remove the cause of ill-will which has been standing for many years. But if they should not ratify it, our labor would not be in vain. Here is a treaty endorsed by an overwhelming majority of the Canadian Parliament and people, and the responsibility of putting which through their Senate has been accepted by the American executive. It commands the support of one powerful party in the United States, and with that enormous weight of opinion at its back, whether it be rejected or accepted, it will establish the rule that will hereafter control the conduct of both nations.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I hardly think the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat was quite justified in insinuating that I was desirous of stopping the discussion the other night. On the contrary, we were anxious to prolong it, and to give himself and other hon. gentlemen on that side, as well as ourselves, an opportunity of expressing their views. It was his own leaders who were most desirous of shutting off that discussion on that occasion and depriving us of the pleasure of listening to the hon. gentleman. It appears to me there is really some little inconvenience in this present doctrine of dual sovereignty which appears to be exemplified on the other side of the House. No doubt there have been occasions in our own history, in the old relations between the two Canadas, when it was found convenient to have two heads to the Government; and, in older times, there were two consuls in Rome, but really on the present occasion it must be admitted this arrangement comes rather hard, particularly on what I may call, I hope without offence, the inferior members of the Ministry. These hon. gentlemen are, I am sure, desirous, as they ought to be, of keeping in accord with the powers that be; but, Sir, it is very hard indeed for even political vicars of Beay to render proper obedience to the powers that be, when the powers that be do not know their own minds, from week to week, and do not appear to agree with each other as they ought to do. Sir, I think that the First Minister in particular, ought to consider the feelings of his colleagues. He has been accused on various occasions of rather looking on most of his colleagues as his clerks rather than his colleagues. It is not for us to say how far that suspicion is correct, but I am bound to say that some of his proceedings of late do appear to give it a good deal of color. In the present instance, take the case of the hon. the Minister of the Interior, who, I am sorry not to see in his place. How hard a case was his. He was called upon to reply on a recent occasion; and after he replied, we find the hon. gentleman the Minister of Finance coming down and riding ruthlessly over all his arguments. Well, perhaps the hon. the Minister of Finance may plead there was not much argument to ride over. Indeed, I virtually agree with him there; but that made it none the easier for the hon. the Minister of the Interior. Then there is the case of the Minister of Justice. The Minister of Justice was called upon to back up his leader in response to the attack made on the Government by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) and he rose equal to the occasion. He not only expounded the law of the occasion, but he declared, with his hand on his heart, that he would be a traitor to the best interests of his country if he advised, or the Government advised, that we should bend to the caprice and suit our policy to the dictation of any petty demagogue in the United States Congress. I submit that after those patriotic sentiments, it was cruel to the Minister of Justice, who depends on his character to a great extent, that within a week he should be compelled to draft a proclamation, and draft it very badly, declaring reciprocity in these identical articles which, but a week before, he declared could not be let in without treason to the constitution. I do not know how this constant diet of humble pie may agree with hon. gentlemen opposite. I am bound to say, as regards the hon. Minister of Justice, that it does seem to agree with him; but it must be a hard thing to have to swallow all the time, and all I can say with respect to these hon. gentlemen, is that it ought to be considered in their wages.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). He is the master of Dotheboys hall.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am certain of this: I have known men occupying that position who would not have consented to play such a part for seven times $7,000 a year,—aye, or for seventy-seven times $7,000. Now, we have again the case of the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. He was obliged, like his colleagues, to devote great labor and great toil to compiling despatches, in which he set out at great length and with very considerable force how imperative it was for us to do all these things which he did, for the purpose of maintaining our fisheries. He showed us that our fisheries were perfectly worthless unless those customs regulations were enforced; and these identical privileges which we are now asked to concede were conceded to the American fishermen. The avowal was very hard on the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I think the hon. gentleman really ought not to call upon his colleagues, at any rate at such very short notice, to swallow their own words in this perfectly reckless fashion. I listened with some attention to the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries the other evening, and I must say that his arguments savored strongly of fish. They were very fishy. There is no doubt, however, that the hon. gentleman, however well he may have succeeded in pleasing his friends on the other side, failed thoroughly to account for the language which he and the hon. the Minister of Justice had seen fit to use on a previous occasion with respect to these identical privileges which they now agreed to concede. I think in this case that there is no man here who has taken the trouble to examine those minutes and despatches which those hon. gentlemen laid on the Table, and to compare them, line by line, with the treaty which we are now called upon to adopt, who will not agree with me in saying that it is practically impossible for us, or for any men, to conceive that this is a treaty we can be proud of. It may be a necessary dose to be swallowed, we will discuss that presently, but most assuredly, after the stand which was taken by the hon. gentleman a year ago and two years ago, no human being can say that any Canadian can be proud of the attitude which this country finds itself to-day. Now, my main reason for desiring to speak to-night is that on the occasion of a recent debate, to which I may be pardoned for alluding, I called the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite and their colleagues and this House to the fact that there was practically no argument which they could bring forward to induce us to adopt this fishery treaty. I have been fully justified in the arguments that I have brought forward in defence of the right of Canada, to make her own treaties and her own terms with the people of the United States. Let me for one moment recall to the attention of the House the argument which I then addressed to them. I pointed out, in the first place, that the position of Canada in regard to the United States was entirely exceptional. I pointed out that strict right, strict legal right, must yield to the good of the Empire at large, and I pointed out that the Empire itself had adopted a totally different rule as regarded the United States from what it had adopted with regard to any other country under the sun, and therefore I drew the conclusion that unrestricted reciprocity was an exceptional thing and was not contrary to the general good. What has been the argument advanced by the Minister of Fisheries? Why, point to point, step by step, that hon. gentleman has explained to this House that the position of Canada as regards the United States, is wholly exceptional, he has explained to us that our strict legal rights must yield to the general good of the whole Empire, that the English Government have, and have for good reasons I doubt not adopted a totally different rule in dealing with the United States from that which they have adopted in dealing with any other country under heaven, and therefore he drew the deduction that these unexampled concessions, as he rightly called them, might be expedient in this case. It followed, as I had warned the hon. gentleman and his followers that it would have to follow, that these unusual and unexampled concessions might be made in such a case. It is rather remarkable—I do not mean to say for a moment that it is to his discredit—to observe the isolation in which the hon. gentleman appears to stand in the present Cabinet. The hon. gentleman's arguments are not the arguments of his colleagues, the hon. gentleman's language is not the language of his colleagues, the hon. gentleman's ways are not the ways of his colleagues, and the resolution which he arrives at differs very widely from theirs. I observe that the hon. gentleman declared, and declared correctly in this particular instance, that the Canadians pay the duty, which is rather different from the doctrine which has been avowed by his colleagues, and not only by his colleagues but by nearly everyone who supports him on that side. He dwelt—and there I am in accord with him—upon the particular importance of the friendship of the people of the United States for the people Canada and the people of England. There again he was right, and it would be well if some of his colleagues had shown a greater appreciation of that great fact. The hon. gentleman told us, and he told us truly, that a Non-Intercourse Bill, or a Retaliatory Bill, whatever it might be called, would be a great injury to the people of Canada, but I do not hear that he took his colleagues to task, that he took them by the throat, when they proclaimed the opposite. The hon. gentleman told us also that he undertook to attempt to obtain unrestricted reciprocity, but he told us also that the Americans would not accept it. The hon. gentleman may or may not deserve well of his countrymen. There may be a difference of opinion in regard to that. But I will say that he has deserved exceedingly well of the party with which he is connected. There can be no doubt that he, and he alone, saved them in 1837, and I believe that he has saved them again in this negotiation from the consequence of their own ill-judged folly in almost dragging us into a collision with the people of the United States. My hon. friend who last spoke was quite right in saying that it was a very dubious question whether or not it was wise for us to proceed now to the ratification of this treaty. There are many reasons why we should not. There may be also something to be said in favor of our doing so; but in any case the Government must bear the responsibility. I have doubts whether we are doing a wise thing in ratifying this treaty at this moment, but I am aware of the differences which exist in political constitution between ourselves and the people of the United States, and it may be, as we are constituted, that we are nearly as much committed to the action of our Government now as the United States would be by the action of their Senate, so I am disposed to place the whole responsibility on the Government. They may be acting under pressure from the Imperial Government, or they may be acting under pressure from the Government of the United States, with whom they came to this arrangement. I am not going to press them for an answer in regard to that. The matter is one of grave doubt, and I am going to leave the responsibility resting upon them. But there are other matters of grave doubt which are involved. First, it is better, on the whole, for us to concede these things, and, in the next place, how far has the action of the present Government deserved the approbation or the censure of the House in this matter? As to the first point, no one can dispute the fact which the Minister himself has admitted, almost in so many words, in his speech, that, by some misfortune or some blundering, call it what you will, this treaty or this negotiation was entered into at a time which was as inopportune in the interests of Canada as it could be. I say, and I notice the hon. gentleman has echoed what I said, that you could not have entered into a negotiation for the settlement of our fishery disputes at a more unpropitious time than this, just before a presidential election in the United States, and I think the Government were to blame for allowing the matter to drift so long when it was necessary to enter into the negotiation at a more opportune time. Then, in the second place, I believe, whatever quibbles may be used, that all the concessions are on the side of Canada. I have been unable to see from any statement which has been made by hon. gentlemen, that they have gained one single thing for which they have contended. Still further, I notice that all matters favoring Canada were carefully eliminated from the second Treaty of Washington as they were from the first. There were other matters affecting our fisheries which should have been dealt with on the north-west coasts of this Dominion as well as on the north-east, and, in dealing with any other power than the United States, the British Government would have insisted that the negotiations should have included all the fishery matters in dispute, including the fisheries action of the United States officers in the Behring Sea, of which we have as much reason to complain, at least, as the United States have to complain of the action of our officers in regard to their fishermen in the north-eastern corner of the Dominion. Why was not that allowed to be made a part of the discussion by the commissioners? I am afraid that it was eliminated for the same reasons for which the undoubted wrongs of Canada were passed over and were unnoticed in 1871, because it was not convenient for the American Government to be called upon to enter into that question at that time, because every argument which they gave in favor of the action of their officers in the Behring Sea would have been in antagonism with their contentions in regard to the St. Lawrence and the Atlantic fisheries. I fail to see where we have obtained any support from the British authorities on this subject. Undoubtedly, dealing with any other power on earth, the British authorities would have insisted that the negotiations should cover these points, but in our case these points were eliminated from the discussion, and even Mr. Chamberlain himself stated that our legal rights in Canada were surrendered in this matter, and he justified that on the ground of the vast importance of the friendship of the American people for the people of England. Sir, under these circumstances, it is utterly impossible for us to pretend that we had a right to any substantial assistance whatever from the presence of the English plenipotentiaries; and I heartily endorse the statement of the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) that the interests of Canada would have been much more likely to have been attended to successfully if we had, in a matter which concerned us chiefly, been allowed to name our own negotiators and conduct our own negotiations, and until we have the power to do that, I do not believe, for my part, that we have any very great chance of carrying these negotiations to a successful termination. Then my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) called attention to the fact—I have as yet heard no answer whatever to his argument—that there would be very great practical difficulty in enforcing this agreement. He called attention to this fact: Now that you have admitted the Americans to traverse the three-mile belt, practically at their own pleasure, unless you maintain an enormous fleet of cruisers at almost every point frequented by these fishermen, you will find it entirely impossible to prevent them, whenever they get an opportunity, from exercising their craft; the Minister of Finance himself admitted in so many words that the fishermen were an uncontrollable and intractable class of men, in other words, that if they get an opportunity of catching a few hundred barrels of mackerel within the three mile limit, they were perfectly certain to use it unless a cruiser were alongside. That, Sir, I take it, you will find to be the actual state of the case. You will find that under one pretense or another, American fishermen will traverse this belt at their own pleasure and will, as it was contended a year ago, under those circumstances, fully enjoy all the rights and privileges of the inshore fisheries which the last speaker was so anxious to preserve. Lastly, Sir, I point out that this is wholly and entirely at variance, be it right or be it wrong, with the pretensions which the Government advanced but a year ago. This treaty may be an honorable treaty or it may be a dishonorable one, but one thing is sure, that if it be right, the conduct of hon. gentlemen a year ago was the maddest folly, inasmuch as rather than yield concessions which they say now they can honorably yield, they persisted, as the Minister of Finance has told us, in exasperating a people whose friendship he rightly declared to be of the vastest importance, not only to us, but to the people of England as well. Well, Sir, what was the answer of the Minister of Finance to all this? Practically he admitted it all. He admitted, as I have said, that the treaty was negotiated at a very unfavorable time, but he went on to tell us that we must bow to the logic of facts, we must look at the situation, the hon. gentleman said, all round. It was a great mistake, the Minister of Finance thought, that we should have exasperated the Americans. He dwelt upon that repeatedly. He called attention to the fact that our policy had been such as to exasperate the Americans. He called attention again and again, it could not be too often emphasised, that in the minds of the English people the friendship of the United States was of immense importance to us and to the Empire, and he practically told us that on mature reflection—and I dare say he was quite right—we could not long resist a non-intercourse Bill. Last year he did not think so, but this year, after a visit to Washington, he has grown considerably wiser. I think that hon. gentleman, when he was brought face to face with the difficulties of the situation, showed himself superior in judgment to his colleagues, and recognised that they had made a tremendous mistake, and he prepared to execute his strategic movement to the rear at the earliest possible moment. Sir, he recognised, and we have got to recognise, that in matters of this kind, to a very great extent, owing, no doubt, to their position as a European and Indian power, the English people are, to a great degree, powerless to assist us, and that being so, for peace's sake, as the hon. gentleman truly said, we of Canada must be prepared to give up our rights. Now Sir, I am not disposed to contravene the position of the hon. Minister of Finance altogether, but what I desire to point out here, and what I shall point out elsewhere, is that from the whole tone and tenor of his apology for this fishery treaty we are now discussing, you must draw of necessity these two inferences: first of all, that the position of Canada toward the United States is taken wholly and entirely out of all ordinary categories. Sir, we have got the right to deal with the United States as we have the right to deal with no other nation. The plain truth of the matter is this, and it is time, and it is right, that that truth should be known, the suzerain state cannot practically treat as against the United States, and therefore that suzerain state has no right, as against the United States, to claim from us that allegiance which she would have a right to claim if she was able and willing to protect us, as

Mr. Chamberlain put it, in our admitted legal rights. Sir, we knew this before. Those of us who were not blind and deaf to the whole situation, saw that this was the case the moment the first Treaty of Washington was concluded, and the moment Great Britain informed us that she was unable to obtain compensation for Canada for the wrong which had been admittedly perpetrated on our territory by American citizens, although it was as clear as daylight that the Americans could advance no argument which would justify them, or justify any arbitrators in admitting their claims for damages in the case of the Alabama and her consorts, which did not go with tenfold more force to justify the people of Canada in demanding that their claims should be considered for wrongs done them in time of peace by Fenian marauders on our shores. Sir, I say that was clear from 1871, I say that is now beyond all possibility of dispute. I say that it follows, therefore, that the hon. gentleman is quite right, and that I am quite right, in saying that we must make, from this time forth, the best bargain we can with the United States, and that we must do it alone. Mr. Speaker, it is worth while, in this connection, to call attention to a very remarkable document which was laid upon the Table of the House, that is, the personal and unofficial letter written by Mr. Bayard to Sir Charles Tupper, under date, Washington, 31st May, 1887. I think, Sir, that this House will do well to ponder on what Mr. Bayard has there said:

"WASHINGTON, D.C., 31st May, 1887.

"MY DEAR SIR CHARLES,—The delay in writing you has been unavoidable. In the very short interview afforded by your visit I referred to the embarrassment arising out of the gradual practical emancipation of Canada from the control of the mother country and the consequent assumption by that community of attributes of autonomous and separate sovereignty, not, however, distinct from the Empire of Great Britain. The awkwardness of this imperfectly developed sovereignty is felt most strongly by the United States, which cannot have formal relations with Canada, except directly and as a colonial dependency of the British Crown, and nothing could better illustrate the embarrassment arising from this amorphous condition of things than by the volumes of correspondence published severally this year relating to the fisheries by the United States, Great Britain, and the Government of the Dominion. The time lost in this circumlocution, although often most regrettable, was the least part of the difficulty, and the indirectness of appeal and reply was the most serious feature, ending, as it did, very unsatisfactorily.

"It is evident that the commercial intercourse between the inhabitants of Canada and those of the United States has grown into too vast proportions to be exposed much longer to this wordy triangular duel, and more direct and responsible methods should be resorted to."

I say that is plain common sense on the part of Mr. Bayard, who thoroughly well understood the position of Canada toward the United States and towards England; and I regretted to find that the Minister of Finance, whom I thought would have been disposed, as he appeared to be in his reply to Mr. Bayard, to have accepted and endorsed Mr. Bayard's statement, should, on the other hand, have declared that he thought it was infinitely more desirable for us to deal with the United States under the ægis and protection of Great Britain. I, for one, wholly and entirely repudiate that part of the contention of the Minister of Finance. I say that Canada has grown to that stature that in dealing with the United States she ought to be allowed to deal directly; and I say it will beten fold more to the interests of the people of Canada that we should deal directly without reference to Downing street or the British Ambassador at Washington either. There is another inference that must be drawn from the very striking words that the Minister of Finance has used, and that is this: It appears to me to be only too clear that Canada lost and the Government lost a very great opportunity in this matter. It appears to me the Government, besides losing a great opportunity, placed us in a most humiliating position, and they ran a very great risk. When I come to examine this correspondence which passed between Mr. Bayard and the hon. gentleman opposite, I cannot but feel that in all human probability, if we could pierce through the diplomatic secrecy which inevitably enshrouds these negotiations, the House would find that when the hon. Minister met Mr. Bayard, as I think he did in Easter, 1887—I think I am correct in that—several weeks before these letters were written, when the hon. gentleman was brought face to face with Mr. Bayard, when he realised where we were and whither we were drifting, he and Mr. Bayard must then have come to the conclusion, which Mr. Bayard announces in his letter, that the real and true means for the extrication of Canada from all these difficulties was a treaty of unrestricted reciprocity almost identically on the lines that I myself have proposed. Why, this is what Mr. Bayard indicates. Does any one suppose that Mr. Bayard on 31st May, 1887, five or six weeks after he had conferred with the hon. gentleman, would have made that proposition unless he had some good reason to suppose that it would be acceptable to the Minister of Finance at all events? Sir, I believe that the Minister of Finance in that respect was decidedly in advance of his colleagues, and that if they had given him a free hand, if they had allowed him in 1887, in April or May, when he met Mr. Bayard, to reply to the invitation which Mr. Bayard gave in that paper, we might have had unrestricted reciprocity to-day, and I believe that would have suited the hon. gentleman, who had, at all events, inclination enough, and who had intelligence enough to understand how vastly superior such a mode of settling the difficulty would have been to the one to which we have had recourse. But that opportunity passed, that opportunity was lost; and when later on, just on the eve of the presidential election, the hon. gentleman did then make a sort of proposition in that direction, then, of course, we could not be surprised that the American authorities should tell him under those circumstances they were not at liberty to undertake negotiations which they might have undertaken and might have successfully carried out some eighteen months ago. I have said this country is humbled. I do not mean to say that this country is necessarily humbled from concluding this treaty, but this country is humbled in this: That its recognised Government has advanced pretensions, has made declarations, has done acts which are wholly and utterly inconsistent with the line that they now call upon Parliament to take. Why, in the outset of the despatch we are told:

"The fisheries could not be preserved to our people if every one of the United States fishing vessels that were accustomed to swarm along our coasts could claim the right to enter our harbors, to post a letter or send a telegram or buy a newspaper, to obtain a physician in case of illness or a surgeon in case of accident, to land or bring off a passenger, or even to lend assistance to the inhabitants in fire, flood or pestilence or to buy medicine or to purchase a new rope."

In other words, if American vessels were allowed to enter the three-mile limit the Finance Minister declared that our fisheries could not be preserved and our inshore fisheries would be worthless. And then the hon. gentleman goes on to state on another occasion:

"Such a surrender on the part of Canada would involve the abandonment of a valuable portion of the national inheritance of the Canadian people, who would certainly visit with just reprobation those who were guilty of so serious a neglect of the trusts committed to their charge."

I might go on and multiply these quotations ad nauseam, but these are enough to show clearly and distinctly that the hon. gentleman took, during the negotiations, an entirely different position from that which the Government occupied twelve months ago. They have done the very things which they declared they could not do without surrendering the national inheritance of Canada. According to their own statements they have done those very things which they said would destroy the whole value of our inshore fisheries and, more than that, they have, as the Minister of Finance told us in so many words, performed this surrender and humiliation after first of all exasperating a very powerful neighbor, whom the Finance Minister tells us it is in the highest degree in our interest to conciliate and to keep on good terms. Sir, among other things the hon. gentleman gave us a very curious bit of secret history. It appears—and it was a very remarkable admission to make, although it was only fair on the part of the Minister of Finance to make it—that this famous visit of Easter, 1887, made to Mr. Bayard did not originate from the Minister's own seeking. It appears there was a go-between, there was a third ambassador concerned; it appears that the Government of Canada and the Minister of Finance were indebted to the friendly intervention of Mr. Erastus Wiman for bringing the Secretary of State and the Minister of Finance together. Now, I am bound to say that I believe in so doing Mr. Wiman rendered this country a very valuable service. I have no doubt whatever from what has transpired that had not Mr. Wiman proposed and arranged that interview, had not the Finance Minister gone down to Washington or New York whichever it might be and interviewed Mr. Bayard, I have no doubt from the dangers which menaced Canada, from the dangerous complications that were ahead, a very perilous state of things might have ensued. I think it is only due to a man who has been much abused and much vilified by the hon. gentleman's colleagues, by his supporters and the press supporting those hon. gentlemen that attention should be drawn here and in the most public manner to the service that Mr. Wiman rendered to his native country on that occasion, and I trust both the hon. gentleman and his colleagues and supporters and the press supporting them now that the Minister of Finance has practically recognised this great service on the part of Mr. Wiman, will speak of that gentleman in future with the respect due to one who has rendered a very important service to his country. I believe myself the hon. Minister of Finance likewise rendered a valuable service in this, that although like his colleagues he had been misled into a very vicious policy, when he was brought face to face with the situation he then understood how critical it had become, and from that time he applied himself seriously and in earnest to extricate us from the dilemma in which we had been placed. I cannot but believe that the hon. gentleman in his heart of hearts had desired—and as I said I think there is no disguising the fact after what Mr. Bayard has said—that he at any rate informally acquiesced in the proposal which Mr. Bayard made to us, to close this difficulty on lines something closely akin to unrestricted reciprocity. Sir, the hon. gentleman, in the course of his speech, made a very remarkable allusion indeed, and to which I wish to call the special attention of this House, to the subject of commercial union. The hon. gentleman told us that he did not meet a man of any party among American statesmen who would not hold up both hands for commercial union with Canada, but he also told us that “the proposition of unrestricted reciprocity”—and mark those words—“of free trade with the United States, with the privilege to make our own tariff with the rest of the world,” he says, “I did not meet a man with an intelligent head on his shoulders who would talk about such a thing for a moment. Sir, they treated that proposition with scorn.” What was the proposition that those gentlemen treated with scorn, and what was it that the hon. gentleman had suggested to them as unrestricted reciprocity? The hon. gentleman continues: “They said: Do you suppose that we intend to make a free trade arrangement with Canada, to adopt free trade with England and to destroy the position that we occupy in relation to all the vast industries of the country.” Sir, does the hon. gentleman suppose that any man on this side of the House, or any sane individual, would be idiotic enough to suppose that the Americans would consent at the present moment to enter into an arrangement with Canada which involved free trade with England and all the world. Does not the hon. gentleman know perfectly well that if that was the construction he placed on unrestricted reciprocity; if, as appears from the very words he has quoted, he gave those American statesmen to understand that unrestricted reciprocity with Canada meant free trade with England and practically therefore with all the rest of the world of course they would refuse it. Sir, that is not unrestricted reciprocity. We know very well, and I was at pains to make it manifest, that if we get unrestricted reciprocity with the United States we must discriminate in a great number of articles against the mother country. Sir, I say that the hon. gentleman has shown conclusively here that no American statesman; not one of all those he met on the other side, had said the least thing in opposition to such a scheme of unrestricted reciprocity as was proposed from this side of the House or as any man here has supposed possible. What they declared and what appears from the hon. gentleman's own language in the clearest terms was, that they were not prepared for free trade with England and consequently as I have said with the rest of the world. I am a little at a loss to understand how the hon. gentleman could have so misrepresented the case as it is apparent from his own words he did misrepresent it. He must have done this I think for the express purpose of getting a refusal, and of being able to tell the House that he offered unrestricted reciprocity and that all American statesmen has refused it. He may have desired to obtain that reply or otherwise those men would never have replied to him as he states they have done. They did not reply: We cannot make a free trade arrangement with Canada; but they did say: We cannot adopt free trade with England, we cannot destroy the position we occupy in relation to the vast industries of this country. I have this to say that the speech of the Minister of Finance shows in the clearest possible manner the insincerity, to say the least of it, of the attacks that were made from that side of the House on the gentlemen on this side of the House with respect to this question of unrestricted reciprocity. If it was so disloyal, if it was so unreasonable and if it was so treasonable, how was it in the name of wonder that the hon. gentleman could have come to enter into negotiations with Mr. Bayard or to make a proposition which he himself says amounted to unrestricted reciprocity. Sir, the practical fact of the matter is that the Government has been at sea on this question as it has been at sea on almost every other question connected with our relations with the United States. Apparently the Government of Canada have adopted this one guiding rule and this one only “brag and bluster and bully,” and then when you are confronted with a determined foe haul down your flag. That appears to be the policy of the Government and nothing else. That was the policy pursued with the Province of Manitoba. Have we forgotten, Sir, how a year ago this House echoed with denunciations of the gentlemen on this side because they propose a course in accordance with right and justice to Manitoba. Sir, the concession was not made in answer to remonstrances, the concession was made in answer to threats, and not until those threats had assumed the most formidable proportions did hon. gentlemen relax their tyrannical interference with the rights of our sister Province. So, Sir, has it been in the case with those fisheries. There was bully and bluster and brag and various vexatious customs relations which irritated and exasperated the Americans as my hon. friend told us, and then, Sir, when they are brought face to face with the results of their own conduct, and when they found there was serious peril, they hauled down their flag and we are compelled to make this capitulation, for it is nothing else, and this surrender of our admitted legal rights. So it was, Sir, a week ago with respect to this statutory proposal which their Minister of Justice and First Minister declared could not be granted without treason to the rights of the people of this country. A week after when a retaliatory Bill was put on the Table of Congress we found those gentlemen issuing a proclamation granting the very concessions which they declared could not be made without treason to the country. Sir, I venture to say that perhaps within a twelve month, at all events within no very distant period, will it be found—if those hon. gentlemen remain where they are—that they will deal with the proposal I had the duty to submit the other night. I have this one thing to say to them. I fear it will be found in that case as it has been found in many others, and as is apt to be found in all such cases that the longer they wait the worse our bargain will be. This is a simple repetition of the ease of the Sybil's books. The longer you delay a fair understanding the higher the price you have to pay and the worse your bargain will be. I am not going to detain the House any longer, I thank the hon. members for the patience with which they have listened to me, I trust that the hon. gentlemen who have found themselves in such a position as this will at any rate bear in mind the humiliation they are inflicting upon the people of Canada and will conduct the controversy in such a manner that if they are finally obliged to recede, they may not be confronted with their own declarations that to recede as they now propose to do is treasonable and contrary to the best interests of the country.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat with his usual style has varied the discussion by forgetting the subject before him and attacking those who sit opposite him. He describes the policy of the present Government as a policy of brag and bluster. Has he not described exactly his own attitude at the time he made that speech? Was his speech anything from beginning to end but an exhibition of brag and bluster? He says the Government have also been at sea with their policy—they have had no guiding line. Mr. Speaker, we have been at sea three times, and we came safely to land each time. The hon. gentleman was at sea too, but he suffered shipwreck; that is the difference between the policy of the Government and the policy of the Opposition. There is no pleasing hon. gentlemen opposite. We cannot know what their line of opposition is, because there are so many lines. The hon. gentleman who spoke last says that he does not think there was much humiliation in making the treaty, but the humiliation was in the pretences of the Government—in their various despatches of a year ago. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) says it was one vast surrender, one vast humiliation. The hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) says that it was no humiliation—that those concessions ought to have been made two years ago. How are we to find out where we are wrong? We can justify ourselves by the views of any one member of the Opposition by quoting the speech of some other member of the Opposition. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) commenced his attack by repeating his statement, that he made a little while ago, that among the greatest blunder we had ever committed was having taken this inauspicious moment for attempting to make this treaty. But, Sir, the treaty is the consequence of the communication that passed a year ago between my hon. friend and Mr. Bayard. The hon. gentleman, after stating that it was the most inauspicious blunder that was ever committed by a government, commends Mr. Wiman, and says he conferred a great benefit on Canada by asking my hon. friend to go down and commence the negotiations which ended in this treaty. After the negotiations commenced a year ago, were we to stop them? We were either right or wrong. In following up the lead or the hint which had been given by Mr. Wiman, which resulted first in this semi-official communication between those two gentlemen, which was followed up in England, and which after long correspondence and long diplomatic delays culminated in this treaty—after the negotiations were once commenced, we should have been guilty of a great rudeness in the first place, and a great diplomatic blunder in the second place, if we had taken any step either by laches or by positive refusal, to break off the negotiations which we had to a certain degree created under the wise instigation and advice of Mr. Wiman. But it is very singular, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. gentleman thinks it was a great blunder and stupidity for us to attempt to make a treaty in the immediate proximity of a presidential election; and yet, if you look at the hon. gentleman's own resolution, which we voted down the other day, you will find that he, in the immediate proximity of a presidential election, says:

"It is further expedient that the Government of the Dominion should take steps at an early date to ascertain on what terms and conditions arrangements can be effected with the United States for the purpose of securing full and unrestricted trade therewith."

The hon. gentleman actually lays it down as our duty to open negotiations at this moment, the most inauspicious time, just before the presidential election, when party strife and party rivalries would prevent any successful negotiations. It was all wrong in us to make any proposition a year ago and attempt to carry it out; it is all very right in the hon. gentleman to suggest that now we should commence de novo negotiations for a treaty. How does the hon. gentleman reconcile the position? I am sure he cannot.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes, I can.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He might try, but his success would be just as dubious as was the success of the whole resolution the moment before the vote was taken upon it. The hon. gentleman wandering away from the subject, takes up the old cry that we should make our own treaties, and he says that England dare not back us—that England would support her colonies against any other nation, but would not venture to do so against the United States. The hon. gentleman has read very carefully the speech of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, and he knows everything that is contained in it. My hon. friend took the opportunity of stating that he had received full support from the representatives especially chosen by England—to use a phrase fashionable now-a-days, unrestricted support from Mr. Chamberlain, the British ambassador—aye, and from the British Government that stood behind all three; and if there is anything wrong in that treaty, if there is any humiliation concerned in it, that humiliation has not been forced upon Canada by the British Government, or the British plenipotentiaries associated with my hon. friend; my hon. friend takes the whole responsibility or shares the responsibility of having made that treaty. After my hon. friend made that statement, there was no appropriateness in the hon. gentleman bringing in the old cry that Canada should make her own treaties. In effect, Canada has made her own treaties of late years, and will in future make her own treaties—

Mr. MITCHELL. Not much.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. And she will have this advantage, that when those treaties require to be enforced, she will have not only the moral, but the material support of the mother country at her back. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) was exceedingly severe in his attack, first upon the conduct of the Government in the last two or three years, and then equally severe upon their abandonment of that course. The hon. gentleman quoted with approbation apparently, the statement made by fishermen who are caught in the act of poaching, in the act of breaking the law, and who of course at once complain to their Government. Why, Mr. Speaker, the smuggler who is caught in the act and whose goods are seized, always complains against the officer who seizes the goods. So the trespasser on our waters, who is caught preparing to fish or with a cargo of fish which he has just taken, always complains to his Government; and it is a mistake and a mistake and a misfortune in the practice of the American Government that they do not do as England does and as Canada has always done—before they communicate the unauthenticated charge of the poacher or trespasser or smuggler inquire into the facts; but they assume it to be true with or without proof, they make it a matter of diplomatic correspondence, and send a complaint to the British ambassadors. England will not take that course, Canada will not take that course. Whenever a Canadian makes a charge of being illused by the American Government or officials, before we formulate the complaint, before we forward it to Her Majesty's Government or representatives, we take care to collect the evidence. We make sure that we have proof of the case before annoying the American Government by transmitting the complaint and claim for damages under it. We ascertain by a reasonable amount of evidence that there is a prima facie case before we formulate the charge or claim any damages. The American Government takes the other and the more unfortunate and more unwise course, and hence all this irritation. Every man, every rascal who has wilfully broken the law, who has been breaking the law with the knowledge and the desire to break it, makes, when he is caught in the act, his complaint; that complaint is published in the next newspaper, and the American Government without enquiry sends it on to the British Ambassador. Thus these complaints are sent to Canada and we have looked into them, and the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries has shown, how utterly devoid of all semblance of truth these complaints are, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has, as I have already said, stated he does not see there is so much humiliation in the treaty itself; that it is a concession we ought not to be proud of, perhaps, but which we were compelled to accept. It was said of the treaty of Amiens, between England and the first Napoleon, that it was a treaty everybody was glad of but nobody was proud of. The hon. gentleman, I suppose, considers this treaty as being in the same category. The treaty of Amiens was, however, a treaty of peace, it was a treaty that gave England an opportunity to rest, and it was a treaty that enabled England to prepare and carry out successfully the more fierce contest that afterwards arose. However, this treaty is one that we may fairly congratulate ourselves upon. It is a treaty of mutual concessions. It is a treaty of peace, it is, a harbinger to be hoped, of years and years of peace, of friendly intercourse, of increasing trade, of developing commerce, and of friendly and social as well as commercial increase. It is emphatically a treaty of peace made between two peoples speaking the same language, and having the same principles of government, and the same principles of civilisation and of social intercourse and social position. If, at any rate, it be considered only as a treaty of peace, it is of the highest value, and we would have the right to be proud of such a treaty if it bring in all those results, unless there were any unworthy concessions in the arrangement which brought about those results. Is there anything unworthy in this treaty? It is one of mutual consent. Hon. gentlemen opposite say it is one of unconditional surrender, and that there is no concession on the part of the United States. In the first place, with respect to the question of the head land, that has been disposed of by the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon). When you find that the ten miles span between the headlands has been adopted by so many nations, there can be no humiliation in our adopting the same measure. The hon. gentleman says we ought not to have yielded, that we ought to have left it to arbitration, and that we should have succeeded in our extreme pretensions. Sir, the system of arbitration is preferable to war, but I do not think Canada or England has found great advantage by those arbitrations, that the hon. gentleman advocates for the first time.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I did not say that.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. My hon. friend said certainly that it ought to be left to a tribunal, and that a tribunal could not find otherwise than that our pretensions were well founded. We have had several arbitrations, and the complaint of Canada has been that they were unsuccessful. We would have to leave this question to be settled by some friendly power. What chance would we have to get justice against the United States and against this provision in a treaty among any of the nations, most of whom have already adopted the ten miles distance as the measure of the bays which belong to a country? Leave it to France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, which have already agreed that that is a reasonable provision and sufficiently indicates those bays that ought to be considered as belonging exclusively to the nation of whose country they form indentations, and we would not have the slightest chance of getting a favorable ruling against a provision and contention of that kind. The hon. gentleman says we have received no concessions. If the hon. gentleman will read those despatches that he speaks of carefully, he will find that the United States contended that, notwithstanding the Treaty of 1818, notwithstanding the restrictions of that convention, subsequent commercial treaties with England had so widened the principles of trade intercourse that those restrictions held originally with respect to the convention of 1818 were swept away. You will find Mr. Bayard contends that under the various commercial arrangements and treaties between England and the United States, the United States had a right to buy bait. You will find that contention in every one of his despatches. That contention was opposed in the correspondence of Canada, and in the various minutes prepared by the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. They also concluded that under a fair reading of the Washington Treaty of 1871, under the binding clause, they had acquired the right of transshipment of their fish. That was resisted and properly resisted by Canada. They had no such rights as they contended they had; the treaty arrangements between England and the United States had in no degree affected the construction of the Convention of 1818 and the restrictions in that Convention. Those were the contentions of my hon. friend, and those two points have been conceded by the United States. No concession, the hon. gentleman has said, has been made by the United States, but everything has been surrendered by Canada. The United States have had everything asked for. They contended that they had a right to buy bait and that the refusal of the Canadian authorities to allow the fishing vessels to buy bait was an infringement of the treaties between England and the United States for which they claimed redress. You find in this treaty that they give up that whole point, that they agree that no vessel can buy bait except by a license from Canada, and, if the vessel does not get that license, it is liable to all penalties of a breach of the law. Is that not any concessions? Then, they cannot get the right to buy it unless they give our fishermen the right to sell their fish in the United States. There was no concession in regard to the transshipment either. If you read the letter and the despatches of Mr. Bayard, you will find that the Americans claimed that they had a right to transship under the treaty between the two nations, and they claimed that this was not only a hardship but an irregularity, that we should refuse them the right to transship their fish, having adopted the bonding system. Now, under the treaty, they give up that system, and they ask us, and we give them the right to transship their fish so soon as we have the right to sell our fish to them. In fact, this is a treaty of mutual concession. It is a fair treaty and a just treaty, a treaty which is honorable to both parties. The hon. gentleman says, why did you make such extreme pretensions if you were not going to carry them out? Are there any of these pretensions that the hon. gentlemen do not say now are legal? Do hon. gentlemen opposite say we were not justified in making these pretensions? Is not the charge now made that we have given away our just pretensions? Then, if that be so, we cannot be charged with acting with brag and bluster in making those pretensions which the hon. gentlemen opposite are obliged to admit were justifiable by the law of nations and by the treaties themselves. You will remember that there was a special reason why they pretensions or these claims of right, because they are not only pretensions but they are claims of right, were made. They were made at the initiation of this correspondence, at the initiations of these attempts to bring on negotiations and carry them to a successful result. At the time those negotiations were commenced, it was supposed by Canada, and it was in fact supposed by the United States as well, that the question of the fisheries would arise, and certainly when Canada was asserting all her rights, she asserted these extreme pretensions that the hon. gentleman speaks of, because it was supposed that the Americans would ask for the right to the inshore fisheries. We supposed, when negotiations were commenced, that, as in 1854 and as in 1871, the right to fish within the three-mile limit would be asked for by the Americans. How we were to be compensated, whether by an extension of trade or by a money payment, was in the future of uncertainty, but we supposed that would be one of the demands which the Americans would make. In that case, it was necessary for us to hold out the utmost of our claims against the possibility of their desiring to get the three-mile inshore fisheries, and to insist that these inshore fisheries should be protected under the strict terms of the Convention of 1818. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) spoke about the humiliation of our giving away the territorial rights of Canada for money in 1871. I remember very well when that treaty was discussed in this House.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I said nothing about giving away territorial rights in 1871. I simply spoke in reference to the territorial rights under the treaty which is now under consideration. I spoke of certain sacrifices which were made by the Treaty of 1871, but I said nothing whatever about the territorial rights.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman spoke about his objections to giving away the inshore fisheries for money.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No, I did not.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Then I am much mistaken. Perhaps this is caused by the recollection of the fierce attacks which were made upon me in 1872 by the hon. gentleman and those who surround him, when I was called Judas Iscariot, when I was told that I had sold the territorial rights of Canada for thirty pieces of silver. I do not know whether some hon. gentlemen did not say that I was Benedict Arnold. At any rate I remember that the hon. gentleman's leader, who, I regret to see, is not now in his place, Mr. Mackenzie, declared that he looked with loathing upon that portion of the treaty which provided for an arbitration under which the Americans were to pay a money consideration for the difference between the value of our fisheries and theirs. That idea was rung all through the country, and I had some fear for my personal safety when I returned from Washington, because of the sacrifice which I had made of the honor of Canada, according to the statements of these gentlemen; but, after we went out of power, and those hon. gentlemen came in, their views changed, they carried to successful completion that arrangement, and the then Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who is now no more, Sir Albert Smith, got his title for carrying to successful completion the sacrifice which they said I had been guilty of. That hon. gentleman got that honor for the work which was done, in fact, by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell.) The whole treaty at present is, as I have stated, honorable to both sides. There are mutual concessions on both sides. In the first place, in reference to the headlands, there is a reasonable arrangement, because all civilised nations have accepted the same limitation. Then, as respects bait, we have agreed to give bait to the American fishermen, if they allow our fish in. Of course, we give them all other supplies. We have allowed them to come into our ports and purchase supplies, also for their homeward voyage. That is a kindly and a humane thing to do, that, if a fishing vessel has exhausted its supplies, it should be allowed to come into our ports and purchase its supplies; and, on the other hand, we gain for our traders and merchants the sale of those supplies. It is the same thing in regard to transhipment. It is of great advantage to the fishermen to be able to tranship their catch by our railways, instead of being compelled to go far away from their fishing ground. On the other hand, our railways get the advantage of that transhipment, and a very considerable item it was in the receipts of the Intercolonial Railway before it was stopped. So, Sir, you can go on with every one of the items of this treaty, and you will find that it is governed by a spirit of mutual concession, by a spirit of give and take. It is honorable to both nations, it is honorable to all parties, and above all things, it is beneficial to all parties, as it puts an end to all this irritation, it puts an end to all these quarrels and it makes us good neighbors instead of bad neighbors; and my hon. friend and the plenipotentiaries who acted with him, and the majority of this House, I am sure, will see, and justly see, the blessings that will be given to peacemakers.

Mr. LAURIER. I do not rise with the attention of adding to this already lengthy discussion. I frankly admit that upon this question I have not made such a study as would enable me to discuss it ad libitum. I rise simply for the purpose of stating for the fourth or fifth time, since it is not yet understood on the other side, what is the policy of the Opposition upon this question. Sir, in the course of a long parliamentary career the hon. leader of the Government has had to meet many different accusations. He has just told us that he has been compared to Judas Iscariot, he has just told us that he has been accused of being another Benedict Arnold. There is one thing, however, which the right hon. gentleman has never been charged, he has never been charged with dulness of intellect; and I am surprised, knowing his qualities as we see them exemplified in this House, that, after having heard the speeches which have been delivered on this side of the House on this question, he does not yet understand the policy of the Opposition in regard to it. Sir, it has already been explained by my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies), by my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Jones), by my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and lastly, by my hon. friend from Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and I tell him for the fourth or fifth time now that the policy of the Opposition upon this question is simply this: That, while asserting that the treaty is a surrender of most valuable rights that belong to Canada, still, it is the duty of Canadians to adopt this treaty, because it will put an end to a most dangerous state of things. That is the only reason we have to advance for the course which we propose to take on this occasion. The treaty is a concession of rights that belong to us, that should have been retained to us; but still, Sir, in face of the dangerous aspect which things have taken, it is better to adopt the treaty and have this vexed question settled forever. We agree altogether on this side of the House with the statements which were made the other day by the Minister of Finance when introducing this question, that the greatest calamity which could befall the civilised world would be an armed collision between the two great branches of the Anglo-Saxon race. When we consider that England and the United States to-day are the two foremost among civilised nations, that their trade exceeds the trade of all other nations, we are appalled at the results that would follow an armed collision between those two nations. I say further, it would not only be a fratricidal war, but it would be almost as criminal and as guilty as a civil war. There is no reason whatever why the two branches of the English-speaking race, the United States and Canada and England, should ever come to war, and if such an event were ever to take place I would look upon it, and everybody would look upon it, as the greatest catastrophe which could befall the civilised world. The position of things in reference to this question was such that an actual war between England and the United States was neither a remote nor an impossible contingency. Much more, Mr. Speaker, we are already threatened with imminent commercial war. A Bill had been passed by the American Congress which empowered the President at any moment to close all commercial relations between the United States and Canada. We all agree with the language of the Minister of Finance upon this question when, speaking upon the probable result of such a commercial war, he said:

"I need not tell you that that Bill meant commercial war, that it meant not only the ordinary suspension of friendly feeling and intercourse between two countries, but that it announced much more than that. If that Bill had been brought into operation by the proclamation of the President of the United States, I have no hesitation in saying that we stood in a relation to that great country of commercial war, and the line is very narrow which separates a commercial war between two countries from an actual war."

That was the position with which we were face to face and that is the position which this treaty would put an end to. Now, Sir, what was the cause of that unfortunate condition of things, that prospect of war between the two nations? The cause was no other than the harassing policy which had been followed by the present Government with regard to American fishermen. There was no other cause. It is to be noted that the American Government did not contend for any other powers under the treaty. The hon. gentleman said a moment ago that the American Government had advanced contentions from which they have receded under the present treaty, that they had contended under the treaty for the right to purchase bait. Nothing of the kind. I take direct issue with the right hon. gentleman, and I say unhesitatingly that the American Government never contended that under the treaty they had a right to purchase bait, and that point cannot be made clearer than by the language of the President himself when transmitting the treaty to the Senate. This is what he said:

"The right of our fishermen under the Treaty of 1818 did not extend to the procurement of distinctive fishery supplies in Canadian ports and harbors; and one item supposed to be essential, to wit, bait, was plainly denied them by the explicit and definite words of the Treaty of 1818, emphasised by the course of the negotiations and expressed decisions which preceded the conclusion of that treaty."

So, Mr. Speaker, the statement of the right hon. gentleman that the Americans, under the treaty, yield any of their former pretensions, falls to the ground. They get everything, we receive nothing in exchange. As I said, the cause which produced this unfriendly feeling between the two countries, the cause which threatened us with retaliation was the policy followed by the present Government with regard to American fishermen. We have been told to-day that the American fishermen were not subjected to any harassing process, that it was only the smuggler, only the poacher who complained and who was ever complaining under such circumstances. But that is not the view taken by the American Government. The American Government did not take the view that it was only the poacher and the smuggler that were harassed by the regulations of the Government; on the contrary they take the ground that it was nothing but the policy of the Canadian Government that had been harassing in every instance. Again I cite from the message of the president:

"The history of events in the last two years show that no feature of Canadian administration was more harassing and injurious than the compulsion upon our fishing vessels to make formal entry and clearance on every occasion of temporarily seeking shelter in Canadian ports and harbors."

It was these customs regulations touching American fishing vessels, compelling them to make entrances and clearances on every occasion, which harassed the American fishermen and created intense indignation that resulted at length in the retaliation Bill. Take the Bill itself. What is the ground of the Bill? The ground is that American fishermen are harassed and oppressed by Canadian authorities, and the ground upon which the President was authorised to close commercial intercourse between the United States and Canada was simply this fact, that American fishermen were harassed and oppressed by Canadian authorities. The language of the Bill makes this very clear. It states:

"That whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that American fishermen are visiting or being in the waters or at any ports or places of the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied or abridged in the enjoyment of any rights secured to them by treaty or law, or are or they lately have been unjustly vexed or harassed in the enjoyment of such rights, or subjected to unreasonable restrictions, regulations or requirements in respect to such rights; or otherwise unjustly vexed or harassed in said waters, ports or places, or whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that any such fishing vessels or fishermen having a permit under the laws of the United States to touch and trade at any port or ports, place or places, in the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied the privilege of entering such port or ports, place or places, in the same manner and under the same regulations as may exist therein applicable to trading vessels of the most favored nations, or shall be unjustly vexed or harassed in respect thereof, or otherwise be unjustly vexed or harassed therein, or shall be prevented from purchasing such supplies as may there be lawfully sold to trading vessels of the most favored nation; or whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that any other vessels of the United States, their masters or crews so arriving at or being in such British waters or ports or places in the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied any of the privileges therein accorded to the vessels, their masters or crews of the most favored nation or unjustly vexed or harassed in respect of the same, or unjustly vexed or harassed therein by the authorities thereof, then, and in either or all of such cases it shall be lawful and it shall be the duty of the President of the United States in his discretion."

This is the whole tenor of the Bill; there is no other ground for authorising the President to come to that unfortunate conclusion except this one fact, that American fishermen had been lately harassed by Canadian authorities. The retaliation Bill was passed, and then we had to face the most deplorable condition that perhaps at any moment the President would issue a proclamation which at once would close our ports to all trade between the two nations. The prospects were simply alarming when we consider the amount of trade done day after day between the two nations, a trade involving millions and millions of dollars for exports and imports, and we can well conceive that if that proclamation had been put in force by the President its effect would have reached every Canadian family and person in the country. The Government at last were alarmed, and as my hon. friend to my left (Sir Richard Cartwright) has said, upon this occasion the Government did what they ever do—they always refuse to listen to representations, arguments and remonstrances, but they always yield to threats of violence. In the case of Manitoba not more than a week or two ago they yielded to threats of violence; and we had a very celebrated case three years ago when the half-breeds, who for seven years petitioned for redress and for seven years never received an an answer. At last, when they not only threatened but resorted to violence, they obtained from the Government what the Government refused to grant them during seven long years. In this instance, I venture to say, that if the United States Congress had not adopted this retaliation Bill, we would not have to-day a treaty, but the question would have been in the same position it occupied in 1885-86; but when Congress adopted a retaliation Bill at once, the Government saw they had gone far enough and the time to yield had come. As the First Minister has said, they were glad to avail themselves of the services of the gentleman who has been attacked during the last six or eight months as a traitor to his native land. Mr. Wiman has received an ample answer to all the charges made against him by the Conservative press. During the whole summer he was assailed and now he has his answer, and that from the Finance Minister himself; and the Finance Minister has shown that Mr. Wiman has always remembered the interests of this his native country, and though he resides in a foreign country, his heart is always with Canada. After the mediation of Mr. Wiman, there was an interview between the Finance Minister and the Secretary of State of the United States. That interview was followed by correspondence, a correspondence of a most striking character. It was hoped that after the correspondence the question would be settled in a manner most honorable to this country and most satisfactory to the two nations, that is to say, by an extension of the trade relations between the two countries. The correspondence which has taken place between Sir Charles Tupper and Mr. Bayard has often been quoted, but it can bear to be quoted again in the present discussion, and the view that the Opposition have taken, and still intend to take, on this question. Mr. Bayard, writing to Sir Charles Tupper, said:

"The immediate difficulty to be settled is found in the Treaty of 1818 between the United States and Great Britain, which has been questio vexata ever since it was concluded, and to-day is suffered to interfere with and seriously embarrass the good understanding of both countries in the important commercial relations and interests which have come into being since its ratification, and for the adjustment of which it is wholly inadequate, as has been unhappily proved by the events of the past two years. I am confident we both seek to attain a just and permanent settlement—and there is but one way to procure it—and that is by a straightforward treatment on a liberal and statesmanlike plan of the entire commercial relations of the two countries."

Sir Charles Tupper replied in a similar strain, saying:

"I entirely concur in your statement that we both seek to attain a just and permanent settlement—and that there is but one way to procure it—and that is by a straightforward treatment on a liberal and statesmanlike plan of the entire commercial relations of the two countries."

The plenipotentiaries met, and no doubt the Canadian plenipotentiary had his correspondence in mind. He made a proposition upon this question, and the hon. gentleman has stated to the House that the offer he made to the American plenipotentiaries was an offer of unrestricted reciprocity. The language used by the hon. gentleman the other day was as follows:

"The hon. gentleman says the offer is unrestricted, and I intended it should be so. I intended to give the Government of the United States the fullest opportunity of stating just how far they were prepared to go in reciprocal trade to Canada."

I am sure every one was delighted to hear that the Finance Minister, when acting as a British plenipotentiary, had offered to settle this question in the direction of unrestricted reciprocity; that he wanted to enter into negotiations with the American plenipotentiaries to ascertain how far they would go in the direction of reciprocity. He had a right to expect, in view of the correspondence which had taken place with Mr. Bayard, an answer of the same nature. The American plenipotentiaries made an answer. We do not know what it was, and I will not discuss it; but we have it on the language of the Minister the other day that the American plenipotentiaries receded altogether from the position which had been assumed by Mr. Bayard in the correspondence. Mr. Bayard had expressed his willingness and his desire to settle this question upon a broad basis and discuss the whole commercial relations between the two nations. The hon. gentleman has said that the Americans receded altogether from the position then assumed by Mr. Bayard. They receded, however, only from the position and not from the principle. As I understood the Minister, he simply said that the American plenipotentiaries considered—and this is what we would infer from the protocol laid before the House—that the time was not opportune or the occasion fitting to discuss that question, that the fishery dispute had to be settled by itself and that the question of commercial relations had to be settled by itself, and that the present occasion was not fitting to discuss the latter, leaving it open, therefore for other negotiations to follow regarding the commercial relations of the two countries as a question by itself. Well, Mr. Speaker, this is the very proposal which my hon. friend the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has made, what he wishes the Canadian Government to do. The language of my hon. friend in substance is this: Since you have not been able to settle the question in regard to more extended commercial relations between the two countries in connection with the negotiation respecting the fishery dispute, I ask you to send a commissioner to Washington in order to open up these very negotiations. And this, Mr. Speaker, is the policy which we intend to pursue. We want to approve the treaty and we give it our support, not because we approve of the treaty and think it is a good one, but because it puts an end to a vexed question between the two countries and that it will pave the way for entering into further negotiations to obtain reciprocal trade relations as we all desire. Now we are in the face of it is true of a presidential elections, but we have the fact that the most influential statesman in the Democratic party; a man who no doubt speaks not only for himself but for the President and a large section of the party, is already committed to that proposition and in favor of it. Therefore, I think that the occasion is most fitting to do the very thing which was moved the other day by my hon. friend; that is to say, the Canadian Government should at an early day send a Commissioner to Washington to meet Mr. Bayard on the terms has laid down in his letters to Sir Charles Tupper and discuss the question of more extended trade relations between the two countries and ascertain how far they are disposed to go in that direction. The occasion is most fitting and I invite the serious attention of the Government to this. I know it will not carry. The hon. gentleman has said that my friend made his motion in view of the presidential election. It is true but my friend knew the Government would not agree to that motion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Or he would not have made it.

Mr. LAURIER. He would have made it, and he will make it next year and the year after. We are entering into that war now. The hon. gentleman did well know from his experience in the past that his motion would not carry the first time. Sir, it is not in the nature of things and according to our experience that his motion should carry a first time. The battle has to be waged more than once before the principles we contend for are carried. This time we made that motion knowing that defeat was staring us in the face, at least so far as this House was concerned, but we are determined to proceed, determined to proceed even if it were defeated next year, and even if it were defeated year after year until this motion is carried, as it is sure to be carried some day. To make a resumé of the policy of the Opposition it is this: We will adopt this treaty because it is the best thing which can be obtained under the circumstances, because it puts an end to the state of things which had been created by the policy of gentlemen on the other side, and because it paves the way to obtain those trade relations which the whole people of Canada desire, although the Canadian Parliament may have voted it down for the present time.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman denied the statements that the Americans had set up any claim to bait and he quoted me as having said that the President sent a message after the treaty was made. I did not say anything about the President. I said Mr. Bayard claimed it. If he refers to the papers he will see that Mr. Bayard claimed it in the strongest manner and so did Mr. Phelps in his representation to the Government in England.

M. JONCAS : M. l'Orateur, après les discours de maître qui ont été prononcés sur la question qui nous occupe actuellement ; après les plaidoyers éloquents que nous avons entendus d'un côté et de l'autre de la Chambre en faveur du traité que l'on nous demande maintenant de ratifier, ou contre ce traité, il est peut-être présomptueux de ma part de me lever dans cette Chambre et de prendre part au débat. Mais, M. l'Orateur, je représente, sinon le seul comté maritime de la province de Québec, au moins le comté maritime le plus intéressé à un règlement satisfaisant de cette question de pêcheries, et je croirais manquer à mon devoir si je ne faisais part à cette honorable Chambre de ma manière de voir sur ce sujet.

Je serai bref, car les arguments que l'on peut apporter en faveur du traité ont été complètement épuisés par ceux qui m'ont précédé.

Il est une chose qui m'a frappé dans le débat auquel j'ai assisté : c'est que les honorables députés de ce côté-ci de la Chambre qui ont pris part au débat se sont gardés pour ainsi dire d'aborder la question qui fait le sujet même de la discussion. Ils nous ont parlé de toutes espèces de sujets excepté du traité lui-même. Il nous ont parlé même du monopole du Manitoba. Mais la question sur laquelle l'on semble le plus tenir à revenir, c'est la question de réciprocité et de libre-échange. Ce n'est pas mon intention de répondre à ces arguments qui n'en sont pas, mais je traiterai cette question au point de vue pratique et au point de vue commercial, laissant à des voix plus autorisées que la mienne de la traiter au point de vue légal et international, ce qui d'ailleurs a déjà été fait avec beaucoup de succès.

Avant d'aller plus loin, je veux répondre à une question que vient de poser l'honorable député de Québec-Est (M. Laurier). Il nous a demandé quelle était la cause de la difficulté qui a existé entre les États-Unis et le Canada, et qui a nécessité la nomination de la commission de Washington d'où est sorti le traité que nous sommes appelés maintenant à ratifier. L'honorable député de Québec-Est a semblé dire que la faute de cette difficulté en était au gouvernement canadien. Je discute ce point, M. l'Orateur, et je crois que si l'honorable député se rappelle bien les faits, il admettra avec moi que la cause de cette difficulté est due aux Américains qui ont donné avis au gouvernement de leur non-intention de renouveler le traité de Washington. Et, M. l'Orateur, le gouvernement de ce pays a donné une grande preuve de sa bonne volonté et de son esprit de conciliation lorsqu'au 30 juin de l'année 1835, il a permis aux pêcheurs américains de continuer à faire la pêche dans les eaux canadiennes pendant six mois, afin de donner le temps aux deux nations, soit de nommer une commission, soit de prendre les moyens d'arriver à un règlement de cette question.

Mais on reproche au gouvernement du pays d'avoir été trop sévère dans l'application de la clause première du traité de 1818. Et pendant que quelques-uns des honorables députés de ce côté-ci de la Chambre s'élèvent contre la sévérité qu'a montrée le gouvernement canadien dans l'application de cette clause du traité, nous assistons en même temps au spectacle curieux d'autres députés de cette Chambre qui disent que le gouvernement n'a pas assez concédé et qu'il aurait dû concéder encore plus.

Je disais, il y a un instant, que je voulais traiter cette question au point de vue commercial et au point de vue pratique. Je prétends qu'au point de vue des intérêts canadiens, le traité que l'on nous demande de ratifier est un succès pour le Canada, le dénouement très heureux d'une question qui pouvait devenir la cause d'un conflit grave, et qui constituait un danger réel pour nos institutions nationales et l'avancement et le développement de notre commerce. Je dis que malgré toutes les considérations politiques que l'esprit de parti peut inspirer, il n'est pas un Canadien sincère, non préjugé et non disposé d'avance à condamner tout ce qu'a fait le gouvernement actuel, qui ne lui prêterait pas son concours pour en arriver à un arrangement final et satisfaisant de cette question.

Sur une question de cette importance, je tiens que les intérêts de parti doivent faire place à des vues plus larges, plus nationales et surtout plus patriotiques. Pour pouvoir avec connaissance de cause et sainement juger si le traité que l'on nous demande actuellement de ratifier est préjudiciable ou favorable aux intérêts canadiens, il nous faut remonter à la cause même de la difficulté qui a existé entre les États-Unis et le Canada et qui a nécessité le traité actuel. Cette cause reposait entièrement sur une interprétation différente que faisaient de l'article premier du traité de 1818, les gouvernements canadien et américain. Cet article que je ne lirai pas en entier, contenait ce qui suit :—

De permettre aux Américains d'entrer dans l'intérieur de nos baies et de nos havres pour y chercher un abri, pour réparer leurs avaries, pour acheter du bois et pour y prendre de l'eau, mais pour aucune autre fin quelconque.

Cependant, M. l'Orateur, les Américains prétendaient qu'en vertu de certains traités de commerce intervenus entre les États-Unis et l'Angleterre après 1818, ils avaient le droit d'entrer dans nos havres pour s'y ravitailler, y décharger leur cargaisons et même pour y acheter de la boîte ou de l'appât.

Si donc nous dégageons la question actuelle de tous les nuages techniques, politiques, légaux et internationaux qui l'entourent, nous arrivons au résumé suivant : les Américains prétendaient avoir droit, comme je viens de le dire, en vertu de certains traités de commerce intervenus après 1818, de se ravitailler dans nos ports et d'y acheter de l'appât. Nous, nous leur citions cet article premier du traité de 1818, et nous leur disions qu'ils devaient renoncer aux droits qu'ils réclamaient par ces traités.

Maintenant, on nous a répété à satiété que le Canada avait tout cédé et que nous n'avions rien obtenu des Américains. Eh bien ! nous n'avons qu'à lire la correspondance intervenue entre les autorités américaines et les autorités canadiennes pour bien se convaincre que le secrétaire Bayard a insisté sur ces faits—qui étaient pour les Américains la question la plus importante,—qu'ils avaient le droit de venir acheter de l'appât chez nous. Je ne dirai rien de la question des headlands ou pointes qui a été traitée mieux que je ne pourrais le faire par plusieurs députés de la droite, et surtout par mon honorable ami le député d'Albert (M. Weldon). Je veux seulement répondre à ceux qui ont prétendu que les commissaires canadiens à Washington nous avaient sacrifiés, qu'ils avaient abandonné tous nos droits. Comme je viens de le dire, il est facile de voir par la correspondance intervenue entre les autorités canadiennes et américaines que le secrétaire des États-Unis a toujours prétendu et toujours insisté sur le fait que les vaisseaux pêcheurs américains avaient les mêmes droits dans nos ports que les vaisseaux de commerce ; qu'ils avaient le droit surtout d'y acheter de l'appât.

Cette question de l'appât est une question vitale pour les Américains, parce que certaines pêches, et surtout la pêche à la morue qui se fait sur les grands bancs, ne peut être rémunérative si les pêcheurs qui la font ne peuvent se procurer de l'appât frais. Or, comment le traité actuel règle-t-il cette question ? L'article quinze du traité va nous le dire. Le voici :

Lorsque les Etats-Unis aboliront les droits imposés sur l'huile de poisson, l'huile de baleine, l'huile de phoque, et le poisson de toutes sortes (à l'exception du poisson conservé dans l'huile), provenant de la pêche faite par les pêcheurs du Canada et de Terre-Neuve, y compris le Labrador, ainsi que sur les futailles, barils, barillets et vaisseaux (cans) ordinaires et nécessaires, et autres colis ordinaires et nécessaires contenant les produits ci-dessus mentionnés, les mêmes produits, provenant de la pêche faite par les pêcheurs des Etats-Unis, ainsi que les colis ordinaires et nécessaires les contenant, tels que ci-dessus décrits, seront admis francs de droits au Canada et à Terre-Neuve.

Et lors de l'abolition de ces droits, et tant que les articles ci-dessus mentionnés pourront être apportés aux Etats-Unis par des sujets britanniques, sans qu'ils soient frappés de nouveaux droits, le privilège d'entrer dans les ports, baies et havres des côtes susdites du Canada et de Terre-Neuve sera accordé aux navires de pêche des Etats-Unis au moyen de permis annuels, délivrés gratuitement, pour les fins suivantes, savoir :

1. L'achat de provisions, d'appât, de glace, seines, lignes, et tous autres approvisionnements et équipements ;
2. Le transbordement du produit de la pêche, pour être expédié par tous moyens de transport ;
3. L'engagement d'équipages.

Les approvisionnements ne seront pas obtenus par voie de troc ou échange, mais l'appât pourra l'être.

Les mêmes privilèges seront continués ou donnés aux navires de pêche du Canada et de Terre-Neuve sur les côtes de l'Atlantique appartenant aux Etats-Unis.

Eh bien ! M. l'Orateur, nous disons aux Américains : vous insistez sur une question très importante pour vous ; une question vitale pour vos pêcheurs. Nous vous permettons d'acheter de l'appât dans nos havres lorsque vous permettrez l'entrée en franchise du poisson canadien sur les marchés américains. Et la clause 15^{ième} du traité que nous sommes appelés à notifier, ne me paraît, certes, pas une concession. L'honorable député d'Halifax (M. Jones), je crois, dans son brillant discours prononcé au cours de ce débat, a parlé de cette question d'appât. Voici ce qu'il disait :

The question with regard to bait is one of the greatest possible importance. It is one which lies at the root of the fishery question, and the Americans justly understood and appreciated its value when they secured the privilege of obtaining bait under this Treaty.

Eh bien ! l'honorable député fait ici une erreur. Les Américains ne se sont pas assurés, en vertu du traité, le droit d'acheter la boîte chez nous. Il est bien vrai qu'en vertu du modus vivendi, attaché au traité, les Américains auront ce droit pendant deux ans ; mais pour exercer ce privilège, ils seront obligés de payer $1.50 par tonneau de chacun de leurs bateaux pêcheurs. Je dis, de plus, que ce n'est pas un droit concédé aux pêcheurs américains, mais seulement un privilège qu'on leur permet d'exercer.

L'honorable député d'Halifax continue :

"The result of the operation of this will be that the bankers going to the Western Banks commonly use clam bait, but those going to the Grand Banks, where they get the fish which are suitable for the larger markets, cannot expect to catch those fish without the use of fresh bait. They are a long way away from their own home, and their fresh bait will only last a short time, and if they are compelled to return to their own ports to get fresh bait if they can, and the supply is doubtful, and they cannot always get it, they would, practically, be almost compelled to give up the business altogether."

Ceci veut dire, M. l'Orateur, que si les Américains ne peuvent venir dans nos ports acheter l'appât frais qui leur est nécessaire, ils ne pourront faire la pêche profitablement. Et je crois que l'honorable ministre des Finances (sir Charles Tupper), et les plénipotentiaires anglais à la Conférence de Washington, ont sagement agi en insistant sur le droit que nous avions d'empêcher les Américains de venir acheter de l'appât chez nous.

L'honorable député d'Halifax dit encore, que cette disposition sera de nature à nuire aux pêcheurs canadiens, parce qu'elle aura pour effet de mettre l'enclenchement sur l'appât, et forcera les pêcheurs canadiens à payer un prix plus élevé pour la boîte. Eh bien ! l'honorable député a oublié deux choses : d'abord, que le nombre de pêcheurs canadiens qui font la pêche sur les grands bancs, et qui conséquemment ont besoin de venir renouveler leur provision d'appât péridiquement, est bien moins grand qu'il ne pense,—ne comprenant pas plus d'un quart de toute la population de pêcheurs,—tandis que la plus grande partie, c'est-à-dire les trois quarts au moins, n'ont pas besoin d'acheter d'appât, mais peuvent aller en puiser à quelques pas de leurs demeures. Il a aussi oublié cette autre chose : c'est que les pêcheurs canadiens peuvent librement pêcher de l'appât dans les eaux canadiennes, en dedans de la limite de trois milles, où est généralement pris l'appât ; tandis que les pêcheurs américains n'ont que le privilège d'acheter cet appât.

J'ai insisté sur ce point parce que c'était réellement la question en dispute ; c'était la cause véritable de la difficulté qui était intervenue entre les deux pays.

Je pourrais bien facilement, pour rencontrer des arguments que quelques honorables députés de la gauche ont fait valoir contre la ratification de ce traité, citer l'opinion de la presse américaine afin de démontrer que le Canada n'a pas tout concédé, et que les Américains pensent, au contraire, qu'ils ont été sacrifiés. Mais je me bornerai à citer un article de la Tribune de New-York, en date du 22 février dernier, qui se lit comme suit :

Le triomphe diplomatique du département d'Etat est un faible et incohérent compromis. Le texte complet du traité des pêcheries nous permet de comprendre la manière que le secrétaire d'Etat considère le truc stupide par lequel il s'est préparé un triomphe décisif. Il n'a jamais rapproché ce sujet au point de vue des intérêts des Etats-Unis. Il a traité cette affaire comme une querelle internationale causée par une phraséologie ambiguë d'un ancien traité et par un conflit de droits de pêche. Il a considéré cette affaire comme une simple controverse qui peut être réglée par de nouvelles et meilleures définitions de ces droits et par une phraséologie plus claire des clauses controversées du traité de 1818. Il a négocié une convention sur cette base définissant la limite des trois milles, réglant la question des points de terre et désignant certains privilèges commerciaux en addition au droit conféré aux pêcheurs américains, il y a soixante-dix ans, pour obtenir "l'abri, les réparations, le combustible et l'eau dans les ports canadiens." A son propre point de vue, il a réussi assez bien à ajuster ces questions techniques ; mais même s'il a fait cela, il n'a pas réussi à venger l'honneur de la nation en défendant les droits des citoyens engagés dans une controverse légale.

Il a manqué en cela parce qu'il n'a jamais compris que l'honneur de la nation était compromis par les outrages sur les eaux canadiennes. Il n'y a rien dans ce traité pour prévenir le retour de ces insultes dans les eaux canadiennes. C'est une convention qui sera aussi impopulaire au Canada qu'en Angleterre. Elle n'offre point de base à un règlement de la question des pêcheries. Elle devrait être sommairement rejetée par un sénat qui se respecte et qui est assez patriotique pour proposer une méthode plus complète afin de protéger les droits des Etats-Unis.

Eh bien ! tandis qu'on crie ici que le Canada est sacrifié, de l'autre côté de la ligne 45^{ième} le même cri se fait aussi entendre.

Voyons encore ce que le correspondant américain du journal Le Mail, de Toronto, écrivait au sujet du traité :

Les privilèges commerciaux dans les ports canadiens accordés aux pêcheurs américains ne doivent pas être considérés comme une concession ; ce sont des droits qui appartiennent aux pêcheurs américains, et on ne devrait pas les acheter aux prix de concessions, importantes ou non. La ligne frontière définie dans le traité va certainement exclure les pêcheurs américains du droit de pêcher en dedans de trois milles sur la côte sud de Terre-Neuve, et indéfiniment, au nord, sur les côtes vers le Labrador. Les pêcheurs américains soutiennent qu'ils ont droit aux pêcheries intérieures dans ces régions, et que ce droit n'aurait pas dû être livré comme une chose de peu de valeur. Le refus aux Américains par la Grande-Bretagne du droit d'acheter de la boîte est un abandon du droit que les Etats-Unis ont toujours réclamé pour leurs citoyens, non-seulement conformément au traité mais aussi conformément aux principes reconnus du droit international et des gens. Le droit d'acheter de la boîte, après tout, était la principale réclamation des pêcheurs américains, après le droit d'entrer dans les ports pour acheter des approvisionnements et transférer leur poisson, et, sans le droit d'acheter de la boîte les pêcheurs américains ont gagné peu de chose. Aucune invention n'a encore été imaginée afin de permettre aux Américains d'emporter assez de boîte dans leurs réfrigérateurs pour toute une expédition de pêche, et le refus de permettre aux Canadiens de vendre de la boîte ne sera pas moins dommageable à ceux-ci que le refus du droit d'en acheter, aux Américains.

On a cité au cours de ce débat, le nom de M. Wiman, l'apôtre du libre échange et de la réciprocité. Eh bien ! veut-on savoir ce que pense ce monsieur du traité actuel ? Voici ce qu'il disait au mois de février dernier, en réponse à un télégramme du Mail, lui demandant son opinion sur le traité. Dans une dépêche adressée de Washington à ce journal, il dit ce qui suit :

Que le traité, en autant que ses clauses sont connues, est, dans son opinion, le meilleur règlement d'une vilaine querelle, qu'on pouvait faire, dans les circonstances. Quoiqu'à première vue on puisse prétendre que les intérêts du Canada ont été sacrifiés, on finira par reconnaître que la Puissance y gagne plus qu'elle n'y perd. Les provisions du nouveau traité, dit M. Wiman, vont tendre à développer les relations entre les deux pays, et vont faire disparaître un élément de conflit sérieux et dangereux qui les séparait gravement et menaçait leur paix.

Je termine ces remarques qui ont été un peu longues en disant avec M. Wiman que le traité actuel est le meilleur règlement possible et le dénouement heureux d'une vilaine question ; d'une question qui nous menaçait d'un conflit grave. Et l'honorable ministre des finances me permettra de le féliciter cordialement au nom des pêcheurs que je représente d'avoir pris leurs intérêts d'une main si ferme, d'avoir su les protéger contre les empiètements des Américains, et de nous avoir amené ce traité, qui, s'il ne met fin pour toujours au conflit nous mettra au moins sur la voie d'un règlement final.

Mr. ELLIS. I feel it my duty to speak on this subject and I would not have addressed the House at all were it not that probably I differ from gentlemen on that side of the House as well as my friends on this side on certain points. Several constructions have been put upon Mr. Bayard's letter, but the conclusion I come to with regard to that proposition to the Minister of Finance, was that this country should become an independent country :

"It is evident that the commercial intercourse between the inhabitants of Canada and those of the United States has grown into too vast proportions to be exposed much longer to this wordy triangular duel, and more direct and responsible methods should be resorted to. * * *

"On the other hand, I believe I am animated by an equal desire to serve my own country ; and trust to do it worthily. The immediate difficulty to be settled is found in the Treaty of 1818 between the United States and Great Britain, which has been questio vexata ever since it was concluded, and to-day is suffered to interfere with and seriously embarrass the good understanding of both countries in the important commercial relations and interests which have come into being since its ratification, and for the adjustment of which it is wholly inadequate, as has been unhappily proved by the events of the past two years."

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is possible that the idea of commercial intercourse and commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity was in that, but it does appear to me looking at events which are transpiring now and with regard to which the House has not been taken into the confidence of the government, that it is the policy that this country should be independent and that Newfoundland should unite in that independence, a process which is now going on at the present moment. He then said :

"Great Britain being the only treaty-making party to deal with the United States, the envoys of that Government alone are authorised to speak in her behalf and create her obligations. I presume you will be personally constituted a plenipotentiary of Great Britain to arrange here with whomsoever may be selected to represent the United States terms of agreement for a modus vivendi to meet present emergencies and also a permanent plan to avoid all future disputes. It appears to me that as matters now stand the colony of Newfoundland ought to be represented and included, for a single arrangement should suffice to regulate all the joint and several interests involved. I should, therefore, be informed speedily through the proper channel as to the authorisation and appointment by the Imperial Government of such representatives."

But, Sir, I listened with great attention the speech of the Minister of Finance and I have read it over very carefully since with regard to what Mr. Bayard meant by commercial union. Taking into account the statement made by the hon. the Minister of Finance that he himself was disappointed when he got there in regard to Mr. Bayard's views it is impossible to get from the reference he made to that question any clear idea of what Mr. Bayard meant. It is true, reference was made to the desire of Mr. Bayard that we should follow in some way the commercial arrangement of the United States, or that there should be some reciprocity. But it is impossible to get any idea of what the Minister meant by what he did say. He said :

Mr. JONCAS.

"I did not meet an American statesman who would not hold up both hands for commercial union with Canada. Why, Sir? Because he knows that I would give Canada to the United States ; he knows that you would occupy the degrading position of having a neighboring country make your tariff and impose the taxes upon you."

Mr. Bayard most distinctly declares that he has no desire to affect in any way the political independence of Canada. He says :

"I say commercial because I do not propose to include, however indirectly, or by any intendment, however partial or oblique, the political relations of Canada and the United States, not to effect the legislative independence of either country."

It is impossible that Mr. Bayard has made that statement in the letter, and that he should reconcile it with the statement which the hon. gentleman has made in regard to it. However that is a matter for Mr. Bayard and himself to settle. Mr. Bayard made a memorable statement in reference to the matter and I think I might quote his words :

"I feel we stand at 'the parting of the ways.' In one direction I can see a well assured, steady, healthful relationship, devoid of petty jealousies, and filled with the fruits of a prosperity arising out of a friendship cemented by mutual interests, and enduring because based upon justice ; on the other a career of embittered rivalry, staining our long frontier with the hues of hostility, in which victory means the destruction of an adjacent prosperity without gain to the prevalent party—a mutual, physical and moral deterioration which ought to be abhorrent to patriots on both sides, and which I am sure, no two men will exert themselves more to prevent than the parties to this unofficial correspondence."

But at the close of the negotiations, Mr. Bayard said :

"As he had expressed himself before, he felt that as a result of the controversies of the two preceding years, the two countries stood at the parting of the ways, and it became necessary to determine whether their future should be in the direction of friendship and mutual convenience, or of unfriendliness and alienation. He hoped the work that had been done by the Conference would decide that question, and that the bonds of amity between the two countries would be strengthened by the ties of friendly and mutually beneficial intercourse."

There is no doubt whatever that the troubles which arose were troubles almost entirely of our own creation. The hon. Minister himself could not get beyond the treaty. He says :

"We offered to remove all causes of difference in connection with the fisheries ; by an arrangement providing for greater freedom of commercial intercourse."

To this the American commissioners replied that they declined to take up that matter :

"Because the greater freedom of commercial intercourse so proposed would necessitate an adjustment of the present tariff of the United States by Congressional action, which adjustment the American plenipotentiaries consider to be manifestly impracticable of accomplishment through the medium of a treaty under the circumstances now existing."

These circumstances were unquestionably the hostility excited by our acts, which compelled them in their own self-interest to insist on an arrangement on the lines of the treaty alone. So they declared that the proposed trade arrangement could not be accepted as constituting a suitable basis of negotiation concerning the rights and privileges claimed for American fishing vessels. They therefore insisted that the adjustment of differences must be had by agreeing to an interpretation or modification of the Treaty of 1818. Now, Sir, at the very outset of the proceedings we were hindered and hampered by the difficulties which we ourselves had created, and which excited such a feeling in the American mind against us that Congress itself had declared in so many words that we were seeking, by the restrictions which we were putting on American fishermen, to drive them into freer trade relations with us, and they felt it their duty to declare distinctly and positively that we could not do that by the course we were taking. Take the hon. Minister's own statement :

"Yesterday we stood face to face with a non-intercourse Bill, sustained by the united action of the Senate and House of Representatives, sustained by almost the whole press, Republican and Democratic, of the United States, sustained with few exceptions by a prejudiced, irritated and exasperated people of 60,000,000 lying to the south of us."

And again :

"They (the American negotiators) said that such was the expression of public men in regard to Canada, and the treatment by Canada of their fishermen that if to-morrow any relaxation of the commerce of the United States was made by an Act of Congress, it would contain a clause excepting Canada from its operations so as to deny us its advantages."

And continues the hon. gentleman :

"We turned our attention to the only means by which we could avert what everybody would feel would be the greatest disaster that could befall this country."

Now, Sir, the position in which we were placed, according to the hon. gentleman's own statement, was, that among a people of sixty millions we scarcely had a friend. Now, there are something like a million Canadians in the United States, and yet the hon. gentleman tells us that our position was such that there was not one of those to raise a voice for us. In the House of Representatives of Washington there are men of Canadian birth or origin, men who had lived in this country for a time, and who must have turned occasionally with some feeling of respect and affection to the land in which they had lived; yet there was not one in the national legislature to raise his voice for us. The hon. gentleman referred to the fact that the press, Republican and Democratic, were united against us. On that press there are many of our young men, too many, south and west, who are filling responsible positions on the press, and there was not one of those to say a word with voice or pen in the interest of Canada. The situation is so humiliating that it must have caused the hon. Minister of Finance quite a pang to make the statement to the House. Now, Sir, with regard to the concessions we have made, it will be well to remember that in 1818, when the treaty was made, there were very few custom houses, and very few ports of entry, and the American fishermen no doubt acquired by time and long usage privileges which they came in time to regard as rights. The whole situation was full of difficulty but immediately after the expiration of the old treaty we commenced to enforce with greater strictness and vigor than ever before the regulations—so much so that the Americans spoke of our action as unfair, ungenerous, and inhospitable, and what some would call inconsistent; members of Congress spoke of our passion and spite, and a prominent member of Congress described our enforcement of the treaty as humorous. The treaty was one intended to give American fishermen shelter, and it was intended that when they came into our ports or along our coasts, and when seeking that shelter, they should be just as much in the exercise of their rights as our own people. But we made it so difficult that many of them preferred to seek the open sea to entering our ports at all. The hon. Minister of Marine the other night, in an endeavor to satisfy the House that his treatment of these fishermen had been very humane, made this statement to show how lenient he had been :—

"The schooner Hereward was detained for shipping a man, and was released immediately with a warning. The Boyton was allowed to land an injured man from her vessel for medical attention. The Fanny Starling was allowed to purchase provisions for her homeward voyage. The French was allowed to ship a crew to take the vessel home when he discharged her own crew, and was detained for repairs quite a long time. The French and Argonaut were seized within the three-mile limit and their crews allowed to be shipped home in United States fishing vessels. Technically we could have insisted that they should not have this privilege, but we gave the privilege and gave it heartily. The schooner Perkins had shipped a man illegally and was detained, but she was released after discharging the man. The schooner Gracey was allowed to ship men to take the vessel home. The schooner Perkins was extended the same courtesy. The schooner Pendragon, whose crew had sickness on board, was, under medical advice, allowed to purchase fresh provisions and meats of all kinds, just as long as the doctor gave a certificate that it was necessary for the health of the crew."

And so on through a long list. Well, I think it is discreditable to the country that the hon. Minister of Marine should take credit for such things as these. Why, they are the ordinary things a man would give to his enemy under these circumstances. Along our coasts, where their vessels are continually coming, as our vessels are continually going along their coasts, there is a constant interchange of courtesies and civilities. The customs and coast guards of the United States have frequently towed our vessels through ice and other dangers and difficulties, have taken them into port and out, making no difference between the vessels of the two countries; and yet the hon. gentleman claims credit for himself and his department that they did these things. Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman can have no soul—no official soul, at any rate. A case of a particular kind was mentioned last year by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Flynn), where a vessel came into port where he lived having lost a man overboard. The captain desired to land his effects and went ashore. During his absence, or, as was the common custom, the men went ashore, yet that man's vessel was seized and a fine of $200 imposed upon him. He was in a strange place, had no money and had to go around and raise it as best he could. When the matter was represented to Ottawa, the Minister of Customs undoubtedly remitted the fine and allowed the vessel to go free, but the very fact that this imposition was put on the captain, shows how easy it is, by means of such imposition, to create the feeling which the hon. Minister of Finance described as existing in the United States.

Mr. FOSTER. Will my hon. friend name the vessel?

Mr. ELLIS. I do not know the name.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentlemen vouch for the accuracy of the statement?

Mr. ELLIS. The hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Flynn) made the statement last year in his place in the House, and the hon. gentleman did not contradict it then.

Mr. EDGAR. The vessel was the Pearl Nelson and the fine was $200.

Mr. FOSTER. Will you vouch for that?

Mr. EDGAR. I have the blue-books which will prove it.

Mr. ELLIS. It is just possible that the Opposition itself in this House was rather too lenient with reference to the conduct and policy of the Government. I do not wish to refer strongly to the hon. the Minister of Finance because, in this matter, I am enjoying my little triumph over him, in a quiet way; but he went down to the constituency of St. John, in 1887, and made there an eloquent speech. One of his positions was that he had introduced in the House of Commons a Bill which made it forfeiture for a vessel to be found within the three-mile limit, except for the purposes of shelter and repair and obtaining wood and water. I do not know how to characterise such a boast in language fitted to characterise it, which would not meet, Sir, with your censure, but the boast is one that reflects no credit on the country, and which would naturally be taken hold of by the American people to show how ungenerous we were. It has been constantly announced by the Government up to the present year that there was to be no change in their policy. It was only last year that the Premier said:

"We stood simply on our rights, we stood simply on the Convention of 1818. We stated, and we hold to it, that the change of years and the commercial treaties that have been made between England and the United States did not and could not in any way, in the most remote degree, affect the terms of the Convention of 1818; that convention was made with due deliberations as a matter of mutual concession, and in which a good deal was given to the United States, as well as something given up by England. It was a bargain with consideration on both sides. We hold to that, and we hold further, that the contention that it has been in any way altered or given up, or that it could be altered, or could be in any way denounced, to use the diplomatic phrase, is out of the question. It could not be, and I have no doubt it will not be."

The treaty before the House which we are now discussing is pretty good evidence of the change that has come over the Ministry on that point. Take up the treaty itself, first eight articles relating to the headland question, and compare it with what the First Minister said last year on that point. He said:

"There are only two questions in which there can be any contention. The first is the headland question, which we are all acquainted with. We all know what that means. We adhere to the position taken by the British Government from the time of Lord Bathurst until now, that the three miles are to be taken from the headlands and not from the sinuosities of the bay."

With regard to the headlands question, I observe that the treaty itself follows the proposition of the Mr. Adams in 1866, as modified by Mr. Bayard. That interpretation has been accepted by the Government. I do not propose to find any particular fault with the arrangement made. Some compromise was absolutely necessary, and this is perhaps not worse than any other that might be made. Mr. Bayard in supplementing Mr. Adams' proposal, proposed that bays and harbors from which American vessels are in future to be excluded are:

"Agreed to the taken to be such bays and harbours as are ten or less than ten miles in width, and the distance of three marine miles from such bays and harbours shall be measured from a straight line drawn across the bay or harbor in the part nearest the entrance at the first point where the width does not exceed ten miles."

The Privy Council thus replied to that proposition. This provision would involve the surrender of fishing rights in territories which by the laws of nations:

"This provision would involve a surrender of fishing rights which have always been regarded as the exclusive property of Canada, and would make common fishing grounds of territorial waters which by the law of nations have been invariably regarded both in Great Britain and the United States as belonging to the adjacent country."

By the 10th and 11th articles we have receded very far from the ground originally taken by the public authorities and have undoubtedly placed the American fishermen in a better position to enjoy the rights and privileges they were to enjoy under the treaty of 1818. I have gone carefully over the treaty, and the contentions made by our own State Department, and I have made a summary, which I trust the House will permit me to read, of the concessions made:

"We have, by the very act of making this treaty, receded from the position maintained so long in practice, that Canada and Great Britain could impose their own interpretations upon the meaning of the Treaty of 1818, thus enlarging the instructions of that treaty. By doing this we have given the United States a precedent upon which to base new demands for the amelioration of the regulations applied to their fishing vessels should the need arise."

"We have almost wholly abandoned the contention that fishing vessels are a class by themselves and, therefore, not entitled to any commercial privileges."

"We entirely and forever abandon the three mile headland theory."

"We forever admit the right of United States fishermen to navigate the Straits of Canso."

"We no longer compel American fishing vessels to depart from our shores in twenty-four hours after arrival."

"We relieve them from the obnoxious operations of customs regulations enforced against them as fishing vessels, and which were specially severe, as the true intent of these laws was to regulate commercial trading only."

"We free them from harbor, pilotage and other dues which are sometimes inhospitably, and often capriciously imposed upon them, even in cases when they sought shelter, dealing with them in these matters as commercial vessels, though denying them the rights of commercial vessels."

"We have practically abandoned the course of ordering them to depart if supposed to be hovering within our waters; and also the plan of putting an officer on board of them as a matter of course."

"We permit them under certain circumstances to purchase bait, to replenish outfits, to ship men, and to transfer cargoes."

"We issue to them, free of charge, permits which enable them to purchase supplies in ports of entry, on all occasions, just as trading vessels, except that they may not do it for barter, and this applies both to the homeward voyage and outer voyages."

This section does not name bait, but there will be no difficulty whatever of purchasing bait under it.

"By 14th article we abandon our previous contention that preparing within Canadian waters to fish is evidence of intention to actually fish within Canadian waters, and we therefore recede from the position taken by the Act of 1886."

"We have limited, and defined, and reduced the severe penalties imposed by that Act for violation of our exclusive rights of fishing. Forfeiture of the vessel is no longer a penalty except for fishing within Canadian waters, or preparing within these waters to fish therein. In all other cases $3 a ton is the highest fine which can be imposed."

Mr. ELLIS.

"We have provided a summary process of law for dealing with arrested or captured vessels, instead of the old and slow process of the Admiralty Court."

"And, lest the punishment of an infraction of the new treaty, or that of 1818, should seem to be unjust, and to prevent the danger of giving offence to the United States, the Government of Canada can reverse the judgment of the court."

The United States negotiators, on the other side, recognise that we are not required by the Treaty of 1818 to sell their fishermen bait, ice or general outfits, to tranship cargoes, or to ship men, in ordinary cases, but by the protocol we give them the privilege of doing these things. Although the Minister of Justice said:

"If the Provinces are to be the judges it is most prejudicial to their interests that United States fishermen should be permitted to come into their harbors on any pretext, and it is fatal to their fishery interests that those fishermen, with whom they have to compete at such a disadvantage in the markets of the United States, should be allowed to enter for supplies and bait even for the pursuit of the deep sea fisheries."

Certainly the Minister has abandoned that position. And so going through the whole correspondence, through all the warnings, under all the rigorous custom house regulations, through the utterances of the press, through the declarations of the Ministers, and you will find a thorough and complete change of attitude on almost every point in this controversy. What we have lost by what we have surrendered I do not know. If we consider what we have lost by the efforts which have been made to prevent our coming to any arrangement, we must have lost a great deal. As to the jeopardy in which we are placed as it has been described by the Minister of Finance, I think we have made very good concessions indeed. I do not find any fault with anything which has been done in that particular. On the contrary, I rather approve of the treaty.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. ELLIS. Hon. gentlemen say "hear, hear," but I think they might review their own conduct and see where they stand to-day and see where they stood one or two years ago. No doubt we have learned a good lesson. We have learned that, in dealing with an international matter, we cannot afford to set up these small restrictions, and treat the Government of the United States as some in this House appear to be inclined to do. The Minister of Finance made a reference to the power which was behind us when we made a treaty. There may be a great power behind us, but it did not stand by us in regard to this treaty, and, when the Premier said that we would have the British forces behind us, it is well to ask where we would be in regard to the carrying out of the Treaty of 1818. The British Government have not backed up, but have left us behind in that matter, and the same inference may be drawn in reference to the new treaty should it become necessary to defend it. While on this point, I might make a remark in regard to what was said by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) on Friday last. The facts which the hon. gentleman stated may be correct, but I do not think we should find fault with England because she chooses to pursue her own way. I do not see that we should make complaint in regard to the mother country. I think that men of fair mind and large judgment must have been astonished at the position we took, I do not think that men with humane and generous minds could have defended the positions we took in regard to the vessels of a friendly power. If it is in the nature of things that we should pursue different ways, we should remember that England is and has been a model to the world, and should say nothing harsh about her. If this treaty stands in any jeopardy in the Senate of the United States, it is entirely due to ourselves. No doubt the Government is very anxious to carry the treaty. But you may understand the feeling in the United States as to the treaty or as to any treaty under the circumstances. I think the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries told us that since this treaty was abrogated, 2,200 American vessels had been boarded by our cruisers in our waters. If anything could be calculated to excite the antagonism of a people, it must be that sort of conduct. You may have a right to do it, but to exercise that right must necessarily excite the greatest hostility. You had all these complaints made. I think there were fifty vessels involved in one set of complaints, and seventy in another which were made to the Government of this country by the people of the United States as to the way in which we treated those vessels, and claims to the number of 150 or 200 were sent in. All this must have the effect of putting the people of the United States and the Senate of that country in a very unpleasant condition with regard to us. The Minister of Finance, in bringing down his statement, gave us no information as to the position of the claims for damages against us, but I understand, from a letter which has been published, that he is allowing them to stand over as against claims made for damages in the Behring Sea. With regard to the detention of vessels, I do not know how many there are, but I assume that these vessels are to be released. Now, Sir, if these vessels are to be released, it seems to me a very strong acknowledgment that, at any rate, our case is a doubtful one. With reference to the general question of the purchase of bait, referred to by the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Eisenhauer) the other night, with regard to the purchase of ice and supplies, and wood and coal, and the transhipment of cargoes and crews, I think it would be better for the Government to make an open arrangement with the United States with reference to all these things. It is an utter absurdity in these times to say that we cannot sell bait. There are two sides to the question. Men who are engaged in collecting bait along the coast, whose business it is to sell bait, want to sell it. An hon. member said the other night that the effect of allowing bait to be sold would be to make it dear. Well, people who have bait to sell would like to have it made dear. Then, with regard to ice. When the Treaty of 1818 was made no such thing as ice was used. Why should not men along the coast be allowed to sell ice to any fisherman that comes along? Why should they not be allowed to tranship their crews? The hon. gentleman told us, as if it was something wonderful, that we were not to allow transhipment of crews, as if it was some great gain. It is absurd to make men who live in the towns along the coast in Nova Scotia travel by railway to the United States ports for the purpose of entering on board a fishing vessel. So with regard to the transhipment of cargo. Why should not cargoes be transhipped when there are on our coast railways to do the business? Now, I noticed in a paper the other day that there are 8,000 men in the New England deep-sea fisheries, and 60 to 75 per cent. of them are natives of the Lower Provinces. Is it not an absurdity to compel these men to go by railway to New England ports to join a fishing vessel, and then not allow them to be discharged at the port where the voyage ends? What will be the effect of this? The United States, a year or two ago, passed a Bill called the Labor Contract Act. These men, instead of paying railway fares, now ship as passengers on board passenger vessels, and sail to the United States port at which they are about to engage on a fishing and where they are to stop on their voyage. The United States have stopped them, have arrested these men. The other day in Boston a large number of natives of Yarmouth and Shelburne were arrested for violation of the Labor Contract Act, and they are subject to fine and imprisonment, because they go into that country under a contract to go fishing. The policy therefore, in this respect, is one that bears harder upon ourselves than upon American shipping. The whole object of the Treaty of 1818, and all its restrictions, have passed away. There were two objects in that treaty, as there are two objects which underlie treaties of that description. One was the determination on the part of the British people of that day, backed by the leaders of the colonial people, to suppress democracy. It was supposed that we would be able to grow a power in the colonies which would check the power of the United States. Another idea was that the fisheries would become the nursery of seamen for the English navy with which to check the power of the United States and of France. Well, Sir, England herself has become more democratic than the colony, and as to her seamen, they never have shipped on board a British man-of-war. I do not know whether they have higher or lower aspirations, but at any rate the whole object of that treaty has failed. Therefore, it is better for the Government to take up this whole matter with a strong hand and open out the whole question. It is better not to make any restrictions at all, but to open them as a matter of trade, and say to the United States: We are willing to make the best trade we can with you, under the circumstances. We recognise fully that it is better to have freedom of trade, better to enter into a liberal arrangement with regard to the people of the United States as being beneficial to our own people and to ourselves. Now, Sir, with regard to the contention that the treaty gives us any thing, it is perfectly absurd. No one has shown where we get any advantage. The hon. member for Queen's the other night went over the ground thoroughly, and from his point of view he showed exactly what the position is. The hon. Minister of Justice tuned up his fiddle and played us a very pretty little jig, at which all of us could laugh, whether we were on the Government side or not; but he really did not meet the arguments of the hon. member for Queen's as to what the treaty takes away from us. The main ground upon which this treaty can be defended, the ground upon which I support it is that it is friendly to the United States. It is a treaty of peace. What we surrender may not be very great. It is absolutely necessary for us to live on the most friendly terms with the United States; it is a most desirable thing that all the arrangements between the two countries, and all the relations between them, shall be of the most harmonious character, so as to prevent trouble and discord among the two peoples. We are constantly, in winter and summer, the recipients of favors from the people along the coast. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I support this treaty because of its friendliness to the United States, because it sweeps away restrictions which are unnecessary, which are of no benefit to ourselves, and may be of great benefit to that people and to ourselves in the way of peace, both for this country and the Empire at large. Now, Sir, I must cordially congratulate the Minister of Finance upon his treaty. I do not want to express in as strong terms as I would like to, the appreciation I feel of the work he has done. Words of mine, would be only words of just praise for the work he has done, might seem to the House, perhaps, to this side at any rate, words of extravagant eulogy; therefore I will not use them. But I do say that he has done a great work for Canada, he has done a great work for England, and he has done considerable good work for the United States in this House, and I trust that in whatever way his reward may come, it will be satisfactory to him. But, Sir, it is well to note that in what has done, he has pulled forward the most important members of the Cabinet. He has swept away as with a sponge on a blackboard, the declarations of the Premier himself; he has wiped out the arbitrary regulations of the Minister of Customs, or at any rate, their application to the fishing vessels; he has swept away the pleadings of the Minister of Justice; and, Sir, with the breath of his nostrils he has extinguished the false lights put up along the shore by the Minister of Marine, which were luring the Ship of State to destruction. Therefore he is to be congratulated. I do not know whether he likes this kind of congratulations, but they are such as I give, and I give them most heartily. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that the treaty will be ratified here. I venture to hope that, as in this Parliament, so in the Senate of the United State, the able men composing that great deliberative body, will accept this treaty as an acknowledgment of our determination to do justice, too long delayed, as an olive branch of peace, as an evidence of our desire to continue, and to expand, and to make perpetual the friendly relations between England and her oldest child in America, and to cement more closely and more firmly the friendly relationship of England to the United States.

Mr. LANDRY. I have listened with a great deal of attention to the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. Upon his rising to address the House I made up my mind that coming from New Brunswick and knowing him to be possessed of the intelligence that he does possess, knowing that he is as well informed on public questions as he is, the arguments he would use to this House might possibly require some answer to constituencies of New Brunswick, if not to any other constituency, and I listened with the object of replying to the arguments he might offer. But, to my great astonishment, when he finished he himself had answered his own speech. During remarks occupying fifteen or twenty minutes he condemned the treaty in every possible way, and he pointed out to this House all the concessions made, he pointed out their nature, in what respects they had been made and I expected him to find fault with the surrender of all those rights and privileges which we enjoyed and which had by this treaty been surrendered to the United States; but upon concluding he congratulated the Minister of Finance upon having made such an excellent treaty, upon having rendered such great service to the country and the people of Canada, but he did not forget to say also that he had rendered equally great service to the people of the United States. I cannot say that the hon. gentleman spoke very differently from other hon. members who have spoken on the other side of the House. It is true they have made some semblance of finding fault with the treaty; but upon the whole not one hon. gentleman has said he would oppose it by his vote. They have found fault more particularly in regard to what brought about the treaty; and yet what would they have done? they admitted by their argument that the treaty was brought about because of the regulations enforced by the Government since the abrogation of the last treaty. They say, or in effect they say, that the reason this treaty was brought about was because of the position taken in regard to those regulations, and most of them admit that we had a right to put them in force, that they were strictly within our right to pass, although they think the Government did not act discretely in enforcing them. I would answer them in this way; had the Government acted as hon. gentlemen opposite desired them to have acted for the last two or three years, we would not have had to-day this treaty of which they speak so highly. If we had allowed the United States vessels to have free use of our fisheries, if we had never opened our mouths to find fault with those who came within our waters and poach on our fisheries for years, obliging the Government to protest against those acts, as they did, no treaty would have been negotiated, and we would not have had this great blessing regarding which gentlemen opposite have congratulated the Government so frankly and so honestly. I, therefore, believe if we have a treaty to-night it is simply because when the other treaty came to an end the Government, understanding the interests of the Canadian people, endeavored to put in force that which it is not disputed we had a right to put in force. The only question respecting which I can to some extent agree with hon. gentlemen opposite when they spoke of having made a surrender, and I cannot help giving expression to my opinion in this House, was that so far as I interpret what is given by us under this treaty, although the matters may not be very valuable in view of the interests of peace, good government and relationship which we hope will always exist between this country and the United States, and I say those matters were not a great deal to surrender to secure those objects—yet if there was anything surrendered I believe it was surrendered by us and not by the United States. It is true the United States have given up a great deal of their contention, that they contended for a great deal which they did not get; but according to my interpretation, they were imaginary rights whereas ours were real rights under the treaty, rights which under the interpretation of a proper tribunal would have been found to exist under the treaty. But not one of the hon. gentlemen opposite has pointed out what we have lost by the surrender made. The hon. gentleman who last spoke pointed out thirteen or fourteen different things we had surrendered, but he did not point out that this country had lost anything by it, he did not show that we had made a surrender that injured our interests and in proportion benefited the people of the United States. On the contrary, he told us that he was not prepared to say it would be any loss to us. The only ground upon which he calculates the treaty might be an injury, was simply in view of the contentions made by the United States previous to the negotiations; but if we take the hon. gentleman's own contentions made before he spoke to-night in this House, we will see that his contentions were somewhat hostile to the contentions made by the Government. What did he say in the paper over which he has control. He said:

"There is a doubt whether an American fishing vessel has the right under the Treaty of 1818 to enter our harbors and buy bait. But an arrangement made 70 years ago will not work now. The Government of Canada in reviving a treaty 70 years old have done a thing which they will not be able to stand by, and which will make this country ridiculous in the eyes of the world."

That was his opinion in 1886.

Mr. ELLIS. That is my opinion now.

Mr. LANDRY. Then what does the hon. gentleman find fault with? He was only grieved because it did not occur sooner. If it had occurred sooner, there would have been no occasion for the treaty. He told us that the circumstances that brought about the Treaty of 1818 disappeared, and therefore, it was necessary to have another treaty. There was an absolute necessity, according to the hon. gentleman, for having a new treaty, because the reasons that led to the Treaty of 1818 had disappeared. If there were such reasons, was the Government wrong in negotiating a treaty? Certainly not. The next question is whether the treaty is one that we can approve. Not one of the hon. gentlemen opposite has endeavored to point out that it is not one that we should approve. They all say we should approve it, and no vote will be taken respecting it. I admit that at the beginning of the debate if hon. gentlemen opposite had taken the stand that the Treaty should not be accepted as if was a base surrender of rights which it was our duty to guard and maintain and not surrender—and I take it that the Parliament of Canada still has it in its own hands, notwithstanding the negotiation that has taken place, the duty of determining whether the treaty shall be passed, and that we can still stay our hand and cry halt, and say we will wait for something better—if they had taken that ground I could have sympathised with them to some extent, because they would have believed we were surrendering valuable rights. They do not, however, take that position. On the contrary, they take this position: While they blame the Government and use very strong language, the late Finance Minister using very strong language indeed, stating that the Government had in a cowardly manner surrendered, that according to their own admission they would have surrendered long before they came face to face with the American Government; they would have surrendered when the American fishermen came to poach upon our fisheries, and they would have hauled down the flag at that time, to use the words of the hon. gentleman opposite. They found fault with that surrender, and at a time when it was, in my opinion, proper and right and fair to make surrenders, if the surrenders were called for, because when a treaty is being made surrenders have to be made on both sides. If surrenders have been made on both sides, it is in order to ensure the friendly relations which we say ought to exist between the two peoples. When the time comes for discussing those matters in a friendly manner face to face, it is the time to see what one can concede on one side, and what one can concede on the other, for the benefit of both countries. I would ask hon. gentlemen opposite in what are our rights surrendered, or on what false position are we placed by those negotiations? I cannot see it, and I have therefore much pleasure in joining with the hon. gentleman from the city of St. John (Mr. Ellis), and with the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House in giving my vote for the ratification of this treaty.

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, it was towards the close of last Session before the Government laid on the Table of the House the blue books which furnished the information upon which we have to judge very largely of this treaty. During the short time we had before the Session closed the correspondence was brought down but I did not do more than take a cursory glance at it and very little opportunity was afforded to discuss it before the House closed. I must admit that I did feel in reading it very much pained and surprised at parts of the correspondence which was laid before us. I however felt that as the matter was opened up for negotiation between Canada and the United States that even if the opportunity had presented itself it would not have been right for us to wash our dirty linen in public as it were and to take the ground which might be construed in favor of the American contention. I was not surprised however at the arguments of the Government. I dare say they were all correct and they were very able arguments indeed but what I was pained and grieved at as a Canadian was to see the hard and inhumane way and the most imprudent manner in which our Government had enforced the technical rights which they claimed under the old Treaty of 1818. The hon. the Minister of Finance has had to conduct his party a good deal recently and there was a remark which he made in his speech the other day which I think will apply admirably to the conduct of his colleagues in 1886 in reference to American fishing vessels. That is when he said:

"It is one thing to hold a technical construction and it is another thing to enforce it."

I do not find fault for the holding of a technical construction by the Government, but I do find fault with the manner in which they enforce it. I do not like to see this treaty carried by the House unless I for one protest against the many acts of the Government which have produced those causes of complaint and which I have no doubt the British commissioners in private during the course of the negotiations have had to admit and must have apologised for. I will give three or four instances which will illustrate the others. There was the case of the Shiloh in which the contention was made that Canadian fishermen who happened to be on this American fishing vessel in a port should not be allowed to step on shore to see their friends. They were prevented from doing so. Now I say if that can be justified according to the strict interpretation of the laws of the Medes and Persians it was the most unwise and improper and inhumane thing to enforce it against our Canadian fishermen. It has been alleged against us on this side that we take the contentions of the American law breakers. I shall go to the reports of the officers of our own Government and prove from their own officials the injustice in the case. Capt. Thos. Quigley of the Government cruiser Terror reports:

"In the case of the Shiloh she came into the harbor about six p.m., on the ninth of August, at Liverpool, and a signal was fired in her case the same as the others."

Just as if she was a pirate.

"When she anchored I boarded her, and the captain reported he was in for water. I told him it was then too late to report at the custom house till morning, and that he must not allow his crew on shore, also that I would leave two men on board to see that he did not otherwise break the law and that my instructions were carried out."

"In the morning I called for the captain when taking the Julia and Ellen captain ashore. From there I told him as I did the other that his men could go on taking water while he was reporting, so that he could sail when he returned and not be delayed. This they did not do."

"I have reason to know that it was not water this vessel came in for, as several of the crew lived there and it was for the purpose of letting his men ashore and not for taking water that he put in. He afterwards emptied six barrels of water, stating they were sour, and fooled all day filling them, delaying the time that he might get his crew on shore. I refused to allow his crew on shore for any other purpose than to take water, after completing which, the weather being fine I ordered him to sea in the evening."

"In all cases, except when in for repairs, I place men on board to see that the law is not violated, as many of these vessels put in for the harbor and make taking water and seeking shelter an excuse either to get men or land them, or to allow them a chance to see their friends."

What a crime it was for several of the crew of the American vessels who lived in the port of Shelburne to desire to get on shore to see their friends. The officer complains that he came for the purpose of putting his men ashore and not to take in water. Here is the valiant commander of a Government cruiser who prevents his Canadian fellow citizens from coming on shore to see their friends on the ground of some technical regulations of the Government. I come to the case of the Pearl Nelson which I told the Minister of Marine just now when he interrupted the hon. member from St. John (Mr. Ellis) as to an enquiry regarding that vessel's name; I told him I would be able to show that the Pearl Nelson was fined $200 by the custom house officer and that the captain of that vessel was refused to land the clothes of two Canadians at the port of Arichat until $200 was paid.

Mr. FOSTER. We will hear how you will prove it now.

Mr. EDGAR. It will prove it just as I said I would prove it. I take in the first place the allegation of the American captain who says:

"I had lost a man on the Grand Banks named James Sampson, who belonged to Arichat, and I wanted to land his effects if the customs officers would allow me to. Some of my crew belonged in that neighborhood. William Batineau, my cook, and nine others of my crew took boats off the deck and went ashore without asking my permission. I saw them, but had never known that was any objection. I had been in this and other British and American ports frequently, and witnessed the landing from my own and other vessels' crews, but never before heard such landing was illegal or improper. These men took nothing with them from the vessel, nor carried away anything but the clothes they wore."

"From the time I left Provincetown I had been into no port anywhere. Next morning after my arrival in Arichat, at 8.30 o'clock, I went ashore to enter at the custom house and found it closed. I called at nine o'clock and it was not opened. I went again at ten o'clock and found the collector opening the office door. I made the regular inward report to him, and requested permission to land the clothes of James Sampson, who had been lost from my vessel on the Grand Banks."

"He told me he had sent a man for me. After I got there this man came into the office and was holding my papers, and told the man to go back and take charge of the vessel."

"I asked him why he held my papers. He replied he seized her because I had allowed my men to go ashore before reporting at the custom house; that all he could tell me was, he said he would telegraph to Ottawa and find out what to do with me, and he did telegraph immediately. About 5 o'clock p.m. the collector received an answer, and told me to deposit $200, and the vessel would be released. The collector would not allow me to land this dead man's clothes until after I had paid the $200 fine."

That is his allegation.

Mr. FOSTER. What day was that?

Mr. EDGAR. I suppose the 18th of September. Now, what does the report of the hon. Minister of Marine say:

"The Minister also submits that it is clear from Capt. Kemp's affidavit that he was guilty of an infraction of the customs regulations in allowing men to land from his vessel before she had been reported, and the Minister of Customs having favorably considered Capt. Kemp's representations as to his ignorance of the customs regulation, requiring that vessels should be reported before landing either men or cargo therefrom, has remitted the fine of $200 which had been imposed, in the case of the American schooner Pearl Nelson."

The enclosed shows that the report of Mr. Johnston, when the remission was made, was dated 22nd October, more than a month after the fine had been imposed. There is no contradiction to the allegation that this man was not allowed to land that dead man's clothes until he paid the $200. He was fined for sending some men on shore with the dead man's clothes, I suppose.

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Mr. EDGAR. Well, they had them. I do not care how it was, he was not allowed to send that dead man's clothes on shore until he paid the fine. Let us take a case of another class—a case in which a vessel was refused permissions to buy a few trifling supplies. The captain says:

"On Tuesday, 5th October, we made Shelburne, N.S., and arrived in that harbor about 8 o'clock, p.m., on that day, short of provisions, water and oil to burn. On Wednesday, I sailed for the inner harbor of Shelburne, arriving at the town about 4 p.m. On going ashore I found the custom house closed, and hunted up the collector and entered my vessel, and asked permission from him to buy 7 lbs. sugar, 3 lbs. coffee, 1 to 1 bushel potatoes, and 2 lbs. butter or lard or pork, and oil enough to last us home, and I was refused. I stated to him my situation, short of provisions and a voyage of 250 miles before, and pleaded with him for this slight privilege, but it was of no avail. I then visited the American consul and asked his assistance, and found him powerless to aid me in this matter. The collector of customs held my papers until the next morning, although I asked for him as soon as I found I could not buy any provisions, say about one and a half hours after I entered, but he refused to give them to me until the next morning. Immediately on receiving my papers on Thursday morning, I started for home, arriving on Sunday. I think the treatment I received harsh and cruel, driving myself and crew to sea with a scanty supply of provisions, we having but little flour and water, and liable to be buffeted for days before reaching home."

The answer of the collector of customs to that is that he had gone to an agricultural exhibition, and he went on:

"I had been on the grounds about 15 minutes when Captain Rose put in an appearance, and I at once came to the office, and he reported his vessel, stated that he was from the Bank bound home, and came in to fill water and wanted provisions as follows, viz., 7 lbs. sugar, 3 lbs. coffee, 1 bushel potatoes and 2 lbs. butter. This was all. I took a memo. and attached it to his inward report, and oil is not mentioned. Stated that he had plenty of flour, fish and other provisions sufficient for voyage home. I gave him permission to fill water at once, but as the treaty made no provision for purchase of supplies I would telegraph to the Department at Ottawa, and no doubt it would be allowed."

Mr. BOWELL. Quite right.

Mr. EDGAR—

"Captain Rose expressed his willingness to remain until a reply was received. He called at the office next morning (Thursday) at 6.30 a.m. and not finding I had received a reply, said as the wind was fair and a good breeze, he would not wait longer, and would take a clearance, which I gave him."

The hon. Minister of Customs says the collector was quite right to telegraph to the grand panjandrum at Ottawa. I will quote to the hon. Minister of Customs the words of the hon. Finance Minister again:—

"It is one thing to hold a technical construction, and it is another thing to enforce it."

Perhaps the hon. Minister of Customs will tell us that the collector enforced these stringent regulations because the Americans did. I think I have heard that contention before, but I think the hon. Minister of Finance meets that very question in his speech, because he has surrendered rights of that kind; and as an excuse for doing that which I do not think required any excuse at all in this Parliament—he should have excused to previous acts of his administration—with reference to the concessions made in article 10, he said:—

"A great deal was made of the apparent injustice of subjecting vessels obliged to put in for humane purposes, such as vessels in distress and vessels under stress of weather to come under the clause of the treaty that allowed vessels to come in for those four purposes. A great deal was made of the difficulties that were thrown in their way, and the obstructions that were placed apparently by Canada, in the way of their exercising and enjoying those privileges that the treaty of 1818 clearly and distinctly provided they should enjoy. I think, Sir, that this House and the people of this country will agree with me that it was not undesirable in the interests of good neighborhood, in the interests of the good reputation of Canada for humane and friendly consideration to vessels in distress, obliged to put into our ports for shelter, and especially where they had under the treaty right a right to come in under such circumstances, that we should remove any obstructions or hindrances that lay in their way."

Then the hon. the Minister of Finance goes on to say:

"It was urged, on the other hand, that in the United States our fishing vessels were not treated with the same stringency that those vessels were which under treaty right are permitted to come into our waters for those four purposes, and evidence was placed before the commission to show that in the port of Portland the course pursued was a more liberal course than the stringent regulations which had been used in Canada. The collector of that port who had been collector for 10 years was examined and gave his testimony as to the treatment of the Dominion vessels in the United States waters. He was asked:

"During the time you have been deputy collector, whether or not, there have been numerous cases of Dominion vessels, including vessels engaged in fishing in that port, and if they failed to report, though lying more than twenty-four hours, have penalties been imposed for such failure during the term of your service?"

"His answer was, as I remember:

"If there were any instances of Dominion vessels failing to report when lying more than twenty-four hours, their presence has been overlooked by the port officers. I do not recall from memory a single instance when or where a penalty was imposed, and I find no record of any such payments in the accounts of this office."

So that our Customs Department had not even the miserable excuse that the others were doing it to, and if they had that excuse two wrongs would not make one right. What was the opinion about this harsh construction of the treaties of Mr. Chamberlain himself. In speaking at Mr. Wiman's banquet, he is reported in the London Times to have said:

"This interference, whether justified by law or not, inevitably provoked great irritation and ill-feeling in this country, and it is not too much to say that for some time peaceful relations between the two greatest free nations in the world—or, if not peaceful relations, at any rate, friendly intercourse between them was at the mercy of officials acting at a great distance from the central authority, who might be hot headed or indiscreet or unreasonable in the exercise of extremely delicate functions." * * *

"Nations are often more apt to resent petty affronts and injuries than they are to resent serious invasions of natural rights."

Now I should think Mr. Chamberlain was right on that point at any rate. Let us see whether the Americans resented this or not. Let us see whether they quietly submitted to this interference. I will not say whether the Americans did not greatly resent this; I will not say whether they were not too touchy on the subject. But I want to show that our Government should have understood the people they had to deal with, and should have known how sensitive the Americans are with regard to any interference of that kind with their commerce; they should have understood what would have been the results of that interference. What were the results? From the beginning to the end of all the correspondence in this book, we see that there was the strongest feeling created; we see that Mr. Bayard, who is not usually supposed to be an ill-tempered or unreasonable man, used language with reference to vessels, all through the unfortunate summer of 1886, of this kind. Speaking of the case of the Novelly, he said:

"Against this treatment I make instant and formal protest as an unwarranted interpretation and application of the treaty by the officers of the Dominion of Canada and of the Province of Nova Scotia, as an infraction of the laws of commercial and maritime intercourse existing between the two countries, and as a violation of hospitality, and for any loss or injury resulting therefrom, the Government of Her Britannic Majesty will be held liable."

With reference to the prohibition of purchasing from Canadian weirs for canning, Mr. Bayard writes:

"Such inhibition of usual and legitimate commercial contracts and intercourse is assuredly without warrant of law, and I draw your attention to it in order that the commercial rights of the citizens of the United States may not be thus invaded and subjected thus to unfriendly discrimination."

The Secretary of the Treasury was asked to report upon these subjects, and he speaks of "the unworthy and petty spite" of the Canadians in dealing with the Americans. He said:

"The Dominion of Canada brutally excludes American fishermen from Canadian ports. * * * I believe there never has been in the past and I hope there never will be in the future such passionate spite displayed by the officers of the Government, as has during the last summer been exhibited in the Dominion of Canada towards well meaning American fishermen."

That was from the Secretary of the Treasury. Then the Committee of Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives made a report, and they reported in much the same line. They also suggest the motives of the Canadians to use these means in enforcing what they considered their rights:

"The motives and purpose of such denial have been openly proclaimed by Canada, and plainly avowed by Canada to be, first, the punishment of such vessels because the United States levies a duty on Canadian fish not fresh for immediate consumption, such as the Government levies on all such fish not the product of American fisheries and imported from any foreign place whatever, and secondly, to coerce the United States to exempt such Canadian fish from all customs duties, and to enter into other new reciprocal relations with the Canadian Dominion and Newfoundland. It is a policy of threat and coercion, which, in the opinion of your commission, should be instantly and summarily dealt with."

It was instantly and summarily dealt with and they showed in that report what it was they dealt with. It was this conduct of the Custom Department, which the hon. gentleman has said to-night was right, that they dealt with. Then came the retaliation Act. What language is used about that Act in the official correspondence brought down by the Government?

"The Senate rose to a high level of patriotism in defence of national honor. The series of unneighborly, brutal, and illegal outrages upon American commerce in Dominion waters has been resented with becoming vigor and dignity. The Senate, with only one dissenting vote—and that vote cast under a fantastic interpretation of the measure has armed the President with full, adequate and just powers of retaliation."

So I have traced, I think, that Retaliation Bill and all the possible and fearful consequences which it might have involved, directly and clearly to this indiscreet, ill-advised and unstatesmanlike action of our Government in 1886. Well, even after that our Government were not dismayed. No, Sir, like ancient Pistol they had brave words at any rate, and it was after that, it was on the 1st February, 1887, that we had the famous report of the Privy Council, which was sent over to England, and which purports to be the report of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I do not know whether I have any right to pry into the authorship or not of that document; but I should judge from the terms of it, and from the turns of sentiment in that document that the Minister of Justice had more to do with it than the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. The hands are the hands of Esau, but the voice is the voice of Jacob. In that grave State paper, they justify everything they have done, and they say:

"It is not to be expected that, after having earnestly insisted upon the necessity of a strict maintenance of these treaty rights, and upon the respect due by foreign vessels while in Canadian waters, to the municipal legislation by which all vessels resorting to those waters are governed, in the absence moreover of any decision of a legal tribunal, to show that there has been any straining of the law in those cases in which it has been put in operation, the Canadian Government will suddenly and without the justification supplied by any new facts or arguments withdraw from a position taken up deliberately, and by doing so in effect, plead guilty to the whole of the charges of oppression, inhumanity, and bad faith, which, in language wholly unwarranted by the circumstances of the case, have been made against it by the public men of the United States."

Here is the heroical sentence which comes in now.

"Such a surrender on the part of Canada would involve the abandonment of a valuable portion of the national inheritance of the Canadian people, who would certainly visit with just reprobation those who were guilty of so serious a neglect of the trust committed to their charge."

These were brave words indeed, but they were sent home by His Excellency on the 1st February, in a despatch to the Home Office, and as soon as the Home Government had time to consider the situation, they promptly sat upon Her Majesty's Government here, and in a despatch sent by cable from the Colonial Secretary to the Governor General, they say:

"Her Majesty's Government, while endeavoring to procure this ad interim arrangement, feel it right to intimate to you that they are disposed to think, after much consideration of the entire subject, that the best and simplest settlement of the present difficulties might be arrived at if both parties would agree so as to permit the discussion of the more extended commercial arrangements—to provide for a term at least, if not permanently, the condition or things which existed under the Treaty of Washington, fish and fish productions being again reciprocally duty free, and the fishery being once more reciprocally thrown open. They are, however, of opinion that it would be the clear interest of the Dominion that no suggestion of a pecuniary indemnification should be made in proffering this arrangement."

And that was within two days accepted by the Governor General in a cable to England, so that the high words, and the still more high-handed proceedings of the hon. gentleman could not be tolerated in England, but, fortunately for Canada in that instance, were interfered with. I am not so much surprised that England could not, after that, trust Canada to negotiate a treaty. These gentlemen nearly got Canada, nearly got England, and nearly got the Empire into a war with the United States. It was, therefore, not surprising that England could not trust the Canadian Government to negotiate the treaty. But, though that is the case, I would not like to be in the House when any Canadian commercial treaty is adopted which has been made for us by representatives of Downing Street, without entering a protest against that, because I think British diplomacy in colonial matters has always been a failure. We had hoped that we had outlived that stage of Canadian existence ever since, in 1874, Mr. George Brown went to Washington as a delegate, not from Downing Street, but from Ottawa, to negotiate a treaty. Of course he was authorised in Her Majesty's name, as he had to be. Afterwards, we settled in Halifax the amount of the claims against the United States, and we did it most successfully, without any Downing Street agent to manage it for us, and I had hoped that the ground which was taken, in 1882, by Mr. Blake in regard to that matter, and which, I think, you, Mr. Speaker, will recollect, would have been followed for the future. I think it is unnecessary, in order that Canada may have a fair play with the United States, to invoke the warlike powers of Great Britain. That is all a piece of clap-trap. We know that the English Government will not send its ironclads and open fire upon the cities of the United States in our behalf. England might do that in Alexandria or in Burmah, but she will not do it in regard to the United States. That is the last thing she will think of in this world. But we have claims of our own, and we should go to the United States and say to them: it is worth your while to make a treaty with us at any time, because it will be immensely to your advantage to make that treaty, and not only to make it but to keep it. It is not the ironclads or the armies of Europe that keep treaties in the present age but it is the mutual benefits derived from them by the parties. If that were not the case, how could Switzerland, that little State in the midst of States in arms, successfully make treaties? But we know that she does, and that Portugal does, and that those treaties with larger powers are entered upon and honestly carried out. We do not need the assistance of England to make our treaties or to have them kept after they are made. I will just trouble you with a statement of the enormous value of Canadian trade to the United States as compared with other countries in the world. There are only three countries in the world that have a larger trade with the United States than Canada, and those are England, Germany and France. We have a more valuable trade with the United States than that great Empire of Brazil or that fertile island of Cuba, both of which are her neighbors. We have double the trade of Italy, Belgium or the Netherlands; we have more than treble the trade of China, Mexico or Japan; we have more than four times the trade they have with Spain, more than five times their trade with Russia, more than six times their trade with the five Republics of Central America in the aggregate, and ten times the trade with Chili and Portugal. And to say in that condition of affairs that we should look for an agent to come from Downing Street to make a fair treaty for us is not reasonable. A few years ago, the present First Minister was in power, in 1868, and two of his colleagues were in London, looking after, among other things, the San Juan difficulty. They were Sir George Cartier and Mr. William Macdougall, who were at that time representing the Government very ably, and, in a letter to Lord Granville, dated the 29th December, 1868, they gave expression to these sentiments:

"Our experience of past diplomacy in the settlement of boundaries in North America, in which the disposition on one side to concede, and on the other to encroach was always present and always resulted disastrously to Canada, admonishes us that a similar disposition, and similar results, may be feared in the future."

That was the statement of the hon. gentleman's colleagues nearly 20 years ago; and surely, Mr. Speaker, if they were right in their historical account of what had happened in the past diplomacy, they were right in what they were afraid would happen in the near future; for we know that San Juan Island was given away, we know since then the Fenian claims, in the Treaty of 1871, were abandoned, and I am not at all satisfied that if Canada had the negotiation of her own arrangements, about the fisheries with the United States, and was not interfered with one way or another, we might have done better than we have. Now, Sir, as to this treaty itself, the concessions do seem to be all on one side. There is very little in the treaty at all. It is spread over a good deal of ground, it is like very thin butter spread over a large slice of bread. It looks very much as if the plenipotentiaries, after spending nearly three months, came to the conclusion that for the credit of themselves, every one of them, they must do something; that it would never do for them to go home without coming to some settlement, and so they patched up a little arrangement about the headlines; they made concessions to the Americans about entries in the customs ports, and they gave nothing on earth to Canada except a provision, in the 12th clause, that Canada is to have the same rights for her fishing vessels in American fishing grounds, as were conceded to the United States. But even that, the Minister of Finance in his speech, had to admit did not amount to anything at all; he was almost ashamed for it, and he apologised for it. So, while not desiring to oppose the treaty as it stands now, I think it is comparatively harmless, but I think it contains, a great many provisions which should have been conceded without negotiations by the delegates at Washington. I am sorry to say that it does not contain free fish for our people down east, and that is one great desideratum that they all seem clamoring for. But apart from that, Mr. Speaker, having made a protest against the action of the Government in 1886, and against the negotiation of Canadian treaties by Downing Street diplomatists, I will vote for the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. McDUGALL. At this very late hour of the night, or rather early hour of the morning, I do not intend to detain the House very long. I would not trouble the House at this moment were it not for the importance of the treaty for the people whom I have the honor to represent. Ever since the negotiations between the United States and Canada the people of my county have been looking anxiously forward to this settlement, and so far as I have been able to learn the settlement which has been arrived at gives general satisfaction. A great deal has been said with regard to the treatment which the Americans have received at the hands of Canadian officials. Now, on this point I desire to read the testimony of a captain belonging to the United States who was engaged in the fisheries. In a letter to the Boston Herald, dated 9th November, 1886, he says:

"So much has been written and printed about the experiences of American fishermen in Canadian waters, and the indignities put on them, I wish you would open your columns and give your readers an insight into the other side of the story. I sailed from Boston for North Bay on 16th June, not knowing just what the cutters would do or how the law would be interpreted. I neared the coast with fear and anxiety. The first land sighted was Whitehead, and immediately cries came from aloft: 'Cutter in sight ahead!' I rushed to the deck, found the vessel which proved to be the Houlett, commanded by Capt. Lorway, nearing us rapidly. At time of sighting the cutter we were standing alone inshore. She hoisted her flags to let us know what she was, and we immediately 'about ship' and put to sea to get out of her way, for fear we might be put on the prize list of the captures. We finally headed up for Port Mulgrave in Canso, expecting to receive rough usage from the authorities, but to our surprise, found Collector Murray a perfect gentleman, willing to assist me as far as he could without encroaching on the Canadian laws. From there we put in at Port Hawkesbury and boarded the cutter Conrad, and asked the captain for instructions in regard to the three-mile limit, and what privileges, if any, we had. I was answered, in a courteous and hearty way, that he did not have them aboard, but would go ashore in a few moments and get me a printed copy of the regulations, which he did, and assured us that if we followed them we would be unmolested; that he was there to see that the law was not violated, but not to cause unnecessary annoyance. After receiving instructions from the captain, thanks to him, I went to the custom house and entered my vessel, paying twenty-five cents. I found a very pleasant gentleman in the collector, who did all in his power to relieve my mind and make us comfortable.

"Souris was our next port of landing, where we also reported, and were well treated. From there we went to Malpeque, where we found another gentleman in the collector. We met the cutter Houlett at Casumpec, and had several interviews with her commander, Captain Lorway, whom I found a quiet, just and gentlemanly officer. My vessel was one of the fleet ordered out of harbor by him. At that time it was as good a fish day as one could ask for, and the instructions were plain that at such times we had no right to remain in harbor. At no time is there much water to spare on the bar, and it is a common occurrence for vessels to ground in going in or out, and that some did touch was due to ignorance of the channel or carelessness on the part of captains. At the time the order was issued the weather was fair, but before all the fleet could work out through the channel, one of the sudden changes in weather, so much to be dreaded on such a coast, came, and the cutter rescinded the order and the fleet returned. It has been printed in a Boston paper that, owing to being forced to sea by the cutter's orders in bad weather, my schooner, the Andrew Burnham, fouled two Englishmen and narrowly escaped serious damage. If true it would look like a hardship. It was simply this: In getting under way, in a small and crowded space, finding I would not not have room, I dropped our starboard anchor. That not holding, we let go the other, and it brought us up all right; not much in this to point to as an outrage or danger from stress of weather. I believe Captain Lorway to be a man who would carry out all the requirements of the Canadian laws, but I saw nothing in my experience in those waters that could be considered as being arbitrary, or taking a mean advantage of his official authority to annoy anyone. Captain Lorway has been a master of vessels for twenty-five years, is a man of high reputation as a seaman, and as good a judge of whether the weather is favorable for a vessel to go to sea as any man who walks a deck, and when he ordered the fleet to sea he went himself, and I know he would not order a vessel to leave harbor if there was any danger of loss of life or property. We reported at Casumpec, and were treated the same as at all other ports we touched at. If our vessels would attend to reporting at the custom house, the same as they do in our ports, no trouble would be met with.

"If we had 'free fish' it would give the Canadians some recompense for what our fishermen want, viz., the right to go anywhere and everywhere, use their harbors, ship men, get provisions, land and mend our nets, buy salt and barrels, and ship our catch home by rail or steamer without expense or annoyance, the same as we have heretofore.

"If we had had this privilege last year, myself and vessel would have been $5,000 better off this season, and all the fishermen in the bay would have been in the same boat with me. I do not say that I am too honest not to fish within the three-mile limit, nor do I believe there is a vessel in the fleet who would not, if the cutter was out of sight. I made two trips to the bay, both of which were very successful, and I lived up to the requirements of the law as well as I knew how, and did not find them obnoxious, or to interfere with my success, and everywhere I went I was courteously treated by the officials—especially so by both the cutters. Should it be a bay year next season, I hope to meet them again. Those who openly preached that they would go where they pleased, do what they wanted to in spite of law or cutters, shipped men, smuggled or openly fished inside of the limit, and indulged in the satisfaction of damning the cutter, the captain, the Government and everything else when they knew they could do it with impunity, and that the men they were talking to could not resent it by word or blow, were looked after sharp and were not extended the courtesy that was shown so many of us.

"In the interest of fair play I could not help writing you and asking you to give this to your readers, if not taking up too much of your valuable space.

"Very respectfully,

"CAPT. NATHAN F. BLAKE."

This is what Captain Blake says as to his experience in dealing with our custom officers and captains of cutters, and it is far from being in accordance with the utterances of hon. gentlemen opposite. I think, however, that authority should be satisfactory to those gentlemen; first, because the authority comes from the United States, and, second, because the authority is named Blake. Here is an extract from the paper in which that letter was published:

"The letter of Captain Nathan F. Blake, of the fishing schooner Andrew Burnham of this city, which we published on Wednesday, would apparently indicate that the Canadian officials have not been disposed to push the requirements of their law quite as rigorously as some of our fishermen have maintained. Captain Blake says that he has experienced not the least trouble in his intercourse with the Canadian officials, but that, as he has treated them courteously, they on their side have reciprocated in like terms. There is, undoubtedly, a great deal of bitterness felt on both sides, and probably this bitterness has led both parties to be ungracious in their own conduct, and to exaggerate the wrongs they have endured, hardships frequently due to an unwillingness to observe the requirements of the law as these are now laid down. If all American fishing captains exhibited the same courtesy and moderation that Captain Blake has shown, we imagine that there would be very little trouble in arriving at an equitable and pleasing understanding with Canada."

I wish now to call the attention of the House to the condition of our fisheries, for they have been presented before this House as in an unsatisfactory state and particularly the fisheries from the part of the Dominion from which I come. In 1873 the value of Nova Scotia fisheries was $6,500,000, in 1878 $6,131,000. It will be remembered that in course of the discussion in this House a few days ago more than one hon. member contended that during the period from 1873 to 1871 the fishing interests in Nova Scotia made progress but since that date had declined. I find by referring to the fisheries from that time to the present that, although the value in 1878 was $6,131,000 it had increased in 1882 to $7,131,000, and in 1886 to $8,415,000, or an increase of 15 per cent. The same may be said in regard to the Island of Cape Breton, although an hon. member, I think the hon. member for Queen's, Prince Edward Island, stated the other day that there had been a great exodus and that the fishermen are in an unsatisfactory condition. I propose to give a statement showing not only that the fishing industry is in a state of prosperity, but that it is in a state of great prosperity. In 1882 the value of the fisheries of Cape Breton was $1,080,000; in 1886, $1,561,000, being an increase of 50 per cent. We also find the number of men employed larger than it was when hon. gentlemen opposite occupied the Treasury benches. In 1877-78 we had employed in the fisheries 6,680 hands; in 1886, 77,591, or an increase of 11 per cent. I desire now to quote from the Halifax Morning Chronicle an article on the subject of the fisheries and the operation of the Government laws against the American fishing vessels. It states:

"THE MACKEREL CATCH."

"The last number of Bradstreet's contains a number of elaborate tables, in connection with the trade of the United States, showing the production of wheat, cotton, fish, and a variety of other articles, during the year 1886, as compared with previous years. The table relating to the fish trade will afford the people of the United States the most convincing proof of the absurdity of the claim that our fisheries are of no value to them. If such figures were sent out from a Canadian source their accuracy might be challenged, and it would no doubt be pretended that they were cooked in the interests of our fishermen, for the purpose of securing the removal of the duty. The facts and figures given by Bradstreet's are open to no such doubt, and there can be no question that their wide circulation will have a strong effect in causing the Americans to see the folly of the course they have been led to adopt, in rejecting the opportunities which have been offered them of settling the fishery question on a fair and reasonable basis.

"The mere statement of the fact that during 1886 the primary industry of the New England fishermen, the catching of fish, has been unremunerative, fails to give anything like a definite idea of the result of their exclusion from our waters upon their business, but the figures in Bradstreet's are intelligible enough to be understood by any one, and show conclusively that the use of our waters is a vital necessity to the fishermen of the Eastern States, and is of immense importance to the trade and to the people."

"It appears that the mackerel fleet in 1886 only secured 80,000 barrels, as against 330,000 barrels in 1885, and as against a much larger quantity than last year's catch in every year since 1859. The effect of this short catch has been to raise the price and to check the consumption. The increase from these Provinces, notwithstanding the duty, has been larger than in 1885. It is further stated that the effect of the duty has been to change the course of the export trade, most of the fish now sent by Boston merchants to Hayti and San Domingo being packed in the Provinces instead of in the States. In respect to cod there is a reduction in the catch of upwards of 79,000 quintals, a falling off which may be attributed to the difficulty of procuring bait, or may be explained by natural causes, similar variations having occurred in previous years, but figures in relation to the mackerel catch are too remarkable and too uniform in previous years to be explained away. The number of barrels caught each year since 1881 is as follows:

|-----------|---------|
| 1881..... | 391,657 |
| 1882..... | 378,863 |
| 1883..... | 226,685 |
| 1884..... | 478,076 |
| 1885..... | 329,943 |
| 1886..... | 81,953 |

"If the cruisers sent out by the Dominion Government had performed their duty effectively there can be no doubt that the disparity would have been greater."

Our friends on the other side of the House say the cruisers have performed their duty too effectively and carried out the laws too rigorously against American fishermen, while we have the statement of the Halifax Chronicle to the contrary. This shows the effect that the fishery protection service had upon the catch of mackerel by United States fishermen and it proves conclusively that the fish usually caught by the people of the United States had been caught by the people of Canada and that the benefit accruing from the catching of this fish accrues to the people of Canada. I shall not take up any longer the time of this House except to say that I have much pleasure in supporting this treaty, and I am satisfied in doing so that it will be a matter of satisfaction to the people whom I represent, a people who are largely engaged in the fishing industry and a people who do not regard this matter in the same way as some hon. gentlemen have pictured to the House and to the country since the beginning of this discussion.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved the second reading of the Bill.

THE BUDGET.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I want to enquire if the Minister of Finance intends to bring down the Supplementary Estimates before he proceeds with the Budget statement?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The ordinary business on the Order Paper.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do you intend to go into Committee of Supply?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 17th April, 1888.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

RETURN OF A MEMBER.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House that the Clerk of the House had received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery a certificate of the return of Joseph Gauthier, Esq., to represent the Electoral District of the County of L'Assomption.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 90) to incorporate the Belleville and Lake Nipissing Railway Company (from the Senate)—(Mr. Masson.)

JUDGES' SALARIES.

Mr. THOMPSON moved that to-morrow the House do resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole to consider the resolutions on the Order paper with respect to increases in the salaries of judges.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. JAMIESON. Before the Orders of the Day are called I wish to mention by way of privilege a matter which arose yesterday in connection with the debate upon prohibition. It will be recollected that the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) charged that last year when I had charge of the Bill to amend the Canada Temperance Act that I refused to press the measure. In reply to that I stated that any action I had taken had been in accordance with the advice of the friends of the measure selected from both sides of the House at a meeting which had been convened for the purpose. The hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher) when referred to by me stated that he had no recollection of such meeting. Of course in order to put myself right—

Mr. SPEAKER. I would request the hon. gentleman to state at once what is the question of privilege. He is now referring to a debate which took place yesterday and I do not see there is any question of privilege in that.

Mr. JAMIESON. I have simply to say that the meeting I referred to there are three members in the House now who attended it and which the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher) had forgotten. I wish simply to put myself right on this question as it might be considered a question of veracity between myself and the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher). I am satisfied that the hon. gentleman had no intention of misrepresenting the matter, but—

Mr. SPEAKER. I hardly think this is a question of privilege.

Mr. JAMIESON. My statement is this—

Mr. SPEAKER. Will the hon. member abandon the question of privilege?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman has stated what I did not say yesterday and I wish to repeat what my statement was. My statement was this: That I had proposed—

Mr. SPEAKER. I have stopped the hon. member for North Lanark (Mr. Jamieson). The hon. member when the question comes up again might have an opportunity to explain, but just now it will interfere with the business of the House.

EVIDENCE BEFORE THE RAILWAY COMMISSION.

Mr. HOLTON. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to repeat the question which I asked the Government last Friday, that is, whether it is intended to lay before the House and distribute to the members the evidence taken before the Royal Commission on Railways. As I said then I repeat now, it seems to me that we cannot intelligently discuss this Bill without this evidence in our hands.

Mr. BOWELL. Immediately upon the question being brought before the House by the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) the other day I saw the Clerk of the Printing Committee and asked him if they had not those reports printed. He said that they had but in very limited numbers. I then gave him instructions to have them printed immediately and distributed among the members and he promised to do so. Since then I have not thought of it.

Mr. HOLTON. I am asking Parliament with regard to the evidence. I know that when the Minister of Railways laid the report of the Commission on the Table on the 29th February last I think there were certain documents accompanying it, but not the evidence, and it is the evidence for which I am particularly asking now.

Mr. CASEY. I have no doubt that the Minister of Customs—

Mr. SPEAKER. Surely the hon. gentlemen do not mean to have a debate on this. The question has been put and an answer has been given, therefore a debate is not in accordance with the rules of the House.

Mr. CASEY. Is it not allowable to point out the importance of having those papers on the Table? It has been allowed before, I think.

Mr. SPEAKER. It has been allowed by controverting the rules.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 65) respecting a certain Treaty between Her Britannic Majesty and the President of the United States.—(Sir Charles Tupper.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 5,

Mr. MITCHELL. Before that clause is adopted, I wish to read a statement attributed to the American consul at Halifax, a gentleman who has taken a great interest in this question, as there seems to be some difference of opinion about this provision:

"United States Consul General Phelan, of Halifax, N.S., was in Washington the other day, on his way to his home in St. Louis. In speaking of the recently concluded Fisheries Treaty, he said:

"The advantages accruing to the United States under the provisions of the new treaty have been greatly under-estimated. New fishing grounds have been opened up to our fishermen and all doubts removed as to our right to avail ourselves of them. We are no longer fishing on sufferance. Under the existing treaty we can only enter Canadian ports for wood, water, shelter and repairs. Even then we are subjected to a disagreeable espionage. Under the new contract we are liable for no pilotage dues, and at the same time enjoy the benefits of light-houses and other safeguards of navigation. Our vessels can no longer be seized upon the trumped-up charges of 'hovering.' We can now enter Canadian ports for fresh supplies, provisions, &c., saving the necessity for returning home in the midst of the fishing season. Our vessels can sell or tranship cargoes, and can always enter the nearest port for anything they may lack.

"To my mind the Canadians have gained nothing. It may be said that the treaty might go further than it does, but it is certainly a vast improvement upon the existing agreement. While our fishermen may not be entirely satisfied, it would be a serious matter, as they would quickly realise, should the Senate reject the new convention. A convincing argument is the very general dissatisfaction expressed by Canadians with the provisions of this treaty. Without regard to party they are opposed to it. It is likely, however, to be ratified by those who are in duty bound to support the Government. The Canadian fishermen, however, will never be satisfied with it, while the practical operation of its provisions will make it decidedly popular on this side of the line."

I am not going to make any observations, but simply give this as the opinion of a gentleman intimately acquainted with the whole question from the beginning.

On section 6,

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This clause, I have no doubt is a necessary provision, the necessity of which is shown by the correspondence which has taken place between the American Government and the Governments of the United Kingdom and Canada. It is a pity, however, that the Government did not recognise this principle and act upon it without being forced to do so by treaty, but exercised a meddlesome oversight by means of vexatious reports and impudent regulations made by the Customs Department that well nigh drove the two countries into war.

Mr. BOWELL. One would suppose, to hear the hon. gentleman repeat that story from time to time, that new regulations were adopted and enforced by the Customs authorities and the Government. For the information of the House, I can inform the hon. gentleman that no new regulations were enacted and no change was made in the law. The only thing done was to carry out the law in regard to fishing vessels, which were placed in the same position as vessels engaged in ordinary commercial transactions. We applied to them the same rules and regulations that were applied to all commercial vessels or all vessels trading in our ports. There were no new regulations, but the law as it existed, and has existed for years, was rigidly enforced in those as in other cases.

Mr. SPEAKER.

Mr. MITCHELL. Does my hon. friend forget that only two years ago the Government brought in a Bill in order to perfect a defect that existed in those laws, so as to enable the Government to make those seizures?

Mr. THOMPSON. That was not a customs regulation at all. There was no amendment of the customs laws, nor did any case whatever occur under that Act.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not enter into the question whether any case occurred, but I say that the statement of the hon. Minister of Customs that there was no new law with reference to the entrance of these vessels into our ports, was incorrect.

Mr. BOWELL. What I said I repeat, that no new law was passed and no new regulations adopted by the Customs Department. The Minister of Justice very clearly stated what the object of that law was.

Mr. MITCHELL. This House passed a law affecting the powers of the Minister of Customs, or the Government, to seize and delay vessels for certain violations that were not provided for before.

Mr. EDGAR. Whether new laws or regulations were passed or not, the hon. the Minister of Customs developed extreme activity in annoying and worrying the Americans, and in devising unwise means of putting those regulations into force against our neighbors of the United States during the summer of the year 1886. That is what they complained of; and, as I pointed out before—and I cannot point it out too often, until the hon. gentlemen and the country also understand the position,—he had not even the poor excuse that the American Government were enforcing their customs regulations against our fishermen in the same way. They were not doing so. As the hon. the Minister of Finance said a few days ago, the American Government expressly avoided doing so during the very time that the hon. the Minister of Customs was enforcing those regulations. The hon. the Minister of Finance said:

"It was urged, on the other hand, that in the United States our fishing vessels were not treated with the same stringency that those vessels were which under treaty right are permitted to come into our waters for those four purposes, and evidence was placed before the commission to show that in the port of Portland the course pursued was a more liberal course than the stringent regulations which had been used in Canada. The collector of that port, who had been collector for 10 years, was examined and gave his testimony as to the treatment of the Dominion vessels in the United States waters. He was asked:

"During the time you have been deputy collector, whether or not, there have been numerous cases of Dominion vessels, including vessels engaged in fishing in that port, and if they failed to report, though lying more than twenty-four hours, have penalties been imposed for such failure during the term of your service?" His answer was, as I remember:

"If there were any instances of Dominion vessels failing to report when lying more than twenty-four hours, their presence has been overlooked by the port officers. I do not recall from memory a single instance when or where a penalty was imposed, and I find no record of any such payments in the accounts of this office."

Now, when that is a specimen given by the hon. the Minister of Finance, our plenipotentiary at Washington, of the evidence before the commission showing how the Americans treated our fishermen, I think the hon. gentleman would be far more justified in the eyes of the public if he would stand up and acknowledge frankly that during the year 1886 he led this country to the brink of war with the United States. He would stand better with the country if he would frankly acknowledge he was wrong, and there would then be some reason for excusing his action. But when we know that he enforced those regulations so as to prevent, under severe penalty, Canadian citizens who happened to be fishermen on American vessels landing at their own homes, when their vessels were in Canadian ports, to see their families, under severe penalty, and when he even prevented the clothes of dead Canadian fishermen being landed until a fine of $200 was paid, I think that the less the hon. gentleman attempts to justify his conduct the better for him.

Mr. FOSTER. While that assertion is still warm before the House, I wish to give it an emphatic denial. The hon. the member for Ontario (Mr. Edgar) has said again to-day that the captain of an American fishing vessel had his vessel seized and a fine of $200 imposed, and had to pay that fine, and that the reason for the seizure of the vessel and the imposition of the fine was that he came in to land the clothes of some dead seaman. The hon. gentleman cannot prove that assertion from the blue-books he cited. The captain has stated in his own affirmation that he landed under stress of weather, that ten of his men landed in boats, without having previously entered at the customs, and that the vessel was seized for that offence and that alone. The $200 fine was deposited for that offence and that alone. It was the day after the offence had been committed and after the vessel had been seized and the fine imposed, that the captain himself came on shore and brought with him the clothes of the men, and he gave these clothes to somebody who delivered them to their friends. To say, therefore, that the seizure was made and the fine imposed for bringing these clothes ashore is to make a statement which is not true. Another statement was made by my hon. friend in the course of the debate last night, relating to Captain Medeo Rose. A charge was also made by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Ellis). When I asked him to name the vessel he could not do so, but the hon. the member for Ontario (Mr. Edgar) said it was the Pearl Nelson. So much for that charge. With reference to the Laura Sayward, the hon. gentleman read correspondence in which it appeared that the captain was badly treated. The hon. gentleman did not make himself sufficiently acquainted with the blue-books that were before him, for if he had, he would have found in the later correspondence that this same Captain Medeo Rose made an affidavit contradicting entirely the alleged statements which were read by my hon. friend. I will read his statement to the House, made on the 20th April, 1887:

"I called at the custom house early the next morning before seven o'clock; stated that, as the wind was fair and blowing a strong breeze, I would not wait for a reply to telegram, but take a clearance, which the collector gave me. I was treated kindly, allowed to enter my vessel after customs hours, and a clearance granted me next morning before the office was supposed to be opened. I was at the port again in November, on my way to the Banks, and the collector allowed me to report my vessel inwards and outwards and gave me a clearance at eight in the evening.

"The statements purporting to have been made by me to the effect that the collector refused to give me my paper when I asked for it, also that his treatment towards me was harsh and cruel, driving myself and crew to sea, having but little flour, water, &c., are all untrue.

"And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true."

The hon. gentleman's information in this respect was, therefore, not correct, and his statement based on it consequently not founded.

Mr. EDGAR. I do not take back a single word of what I said last night, and my hon. friend is trying to get out of the whole thing upon a quibble. As to the case of the Pearl Nelson, I state again to-day that these dead men's clothes could not be landed until the fine of $200 had been paid. The hon. gentleman is quite right in saying that the fine was imposed upon this captain for having landed some Canadians on shore to see their friends, but until the captain had paid that fine of $200, which was remitted more than a month after, he was not allowed to land the clothes of the dead fishermen, and that is not denied by any of the Canadian officers, from the beginning of the correspondence to the end. There are two things in that transaction which I complained of: One was the imposition of the fine of $200 and the seizure of the vessel for allowing two Canadians to go on shore; and the other was that before that fine was paid, the captain would not be allowed to land the clothes. As to the Laura Sayward there is nothing in the statement I make in which I am mistaken. The hon. gentleman will recollect that in that case I complained, not that the captain did not get out his papers when he landed, because this was not material to the question, but that he was not allowed to buy for the American fishermen seven pounds of sugar, three pounds of rice, and a little oil and something of that kind. That was refused.

Mr. FOSTER. They were never denied any right.

Mr. EDGAR. This paper shows that the officer of the Minister reported that he did deny them the right, and that he telegraphed to the Minister of Customs twice in one day to know whether those people could buy a pound of sugar and two pounds of potatoes.

Mr. BOWELL. He did quite right.

Mr. EDGAR. The Minister says that was quite right, but the Minister of Marine says he did not do that at all. He tries to make out that there was no refusal.

Mr. FOSTER. I did not say so. I say that the officer acted under his instructions. He had no instructions to allow commercial privileges to a fishing vessel, and, when he was asked for those privileges, he first did as an officer should do; he said, I will telegraph to Ottawa and see if I can get instructions to do that. That is what he did, and he did not make an explicit denial of the request made to him, but said, it is not in the line of my duty and I will telegraph to Ottawa. There was no lack of provisions for the preservation of life, and that is shown by the second affidavit.

Mr. EDGAR. I will leave it to the Minister of Customs, who has stated that the officer did quite right in refusing to give this relief.

Mr. BOWELL. I said that, if he did refuse, he did what was right.

Mr. CASEY. The Minister did not say that he did so. Mr. BOWELL. I did.

Mr. CASEY. The Minister said that the officer did right. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries says that he did not do it at all, and the Minister of Customs says he did it, and it was right for him to do it. The Minister of Marine says that, if he did it, it was wrong, and the other Minister says that, if he did it, it was right.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am surprised that those two hon. gentlemen should remain in the same Cabinet with the Minister of Finance, after the views which he has put forward. Certainly, the inhuman acts which they have endeavored to justify have been denounced by the Minister of Finance, and that ought to lead those hon. gentlemen to retire from the Cabinet of which the Minister of Finance is a member. Why should they remain in the Cabinet with the Minister of Finance, who is marking out a different policy altogether from that which they are attempting to pursue? I would like the Minister of Finance to give us some explanation in regard to this clause. The Minister of Justice, in an elaborately prepared memorandum, informed the council that it was utterly impossible to maintain an efficient protection over our fisheries if such a rule as this, which was the principle contended for by Mr. Phelps, was recognised. I have no doubt that the Minister of Finance has fully considered that question, and will be able to give us a full and satisfactory answer to the declaration of the Minister of Justice in that regard. I am sure that the Minister of Finance has no intention of throwing open our inshore fisheries to be poached upon, or to leave this Government utterly helpless to exercise police protection over them; and, as I have full confidence in the judgment of the Minister of Finance in this matter, I have no doubt that he will be able to satisfy the House that he is able to give that protection which the Minister of Justice said it was possible to afford.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). On a previous occasion, I called the attention of the Finance Minister to what appeared to me to be a clause providing for reciprocal advantages, but which, while giving the American fishermen the advantages claimed in our own ports, with regard to pilotage dues, harbor dues, light dues, and so on, did not give the same advantages to our fishermen in American ports. The hon. gentleman then pointed to clause 12, which says that—

"Fishing vessels of Canada and Newfoundland shall have on the Atlantic coasts of the United States all the privileges reserved and secured by this Treaty to United States fishing vessels in the aforesaid waters of Canada and Newfoundland."

As I claimed then, I claim now that this is not sufficient to give the reciprocal privileges which we should have. There are no exceptions in this, and I would suggest that after clauses 4, 5, and 6, the hon. gentleman should insert a clause to the effect that these privileges shall be given, provided similar advantages are given to the fishing vessels of Canada in the ports of the United States. That would set the matter at rest, I think, because, at present, I think it would be open to some doubt.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman will see that it is not my business to alter the treaty. The treaty speaks for itself, and we are simply providing the legislation which is necessary to carry the treaty out, so far as Canada is concerned, and it will be quite time enough to call upon the Government of the United States or the Congress of the United States to take action when any case arises in which some privileges are not conceded which the treaty pledges them to concede.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I can hardly agree with the hon. gentleman in this matter. If we get into a misunderstanding at the outset, it will be very difficult to have it set right. I suppose the other party to this treaty, that is the United States, cannot take any objection to having this made clear. If it was the intention, as the hon. gentleman says it was the intention, to have it made clear at the outset, it would not change the meaning of the treaty if a clause were put in there securing the same privileges to the fishing vessels of Canada in the ports of the United States as the fishing vessels of the United States are entitled to in our ports. I mean in regard to the exemptions from pilotage dues, light dues, and the other dues which are mentioned. Is the hon. gentleman prepared to say that, in his judgment, this article XII of the treaty places Canadian vessels in precisely the same position in American ports as the American fishing vessels will be placed in in our ports under the operations of this treaty as to exemption from these dues?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). You are quite clear on that?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am quite clear on that point. That was the object of placing that clause there. It was placed there for that purpose.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I think the other way would have made it much more distinct.

Mr. MITCHELL. I had not my reference when the Minister of Marine spoke a while ago in relation to the Sayward, but, having sent to the Hansard office for the book, I find the affidavit of Medeo Rose, the master of the Laura Sayward, and I find it is to this effect:

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell.)

"Being then on Western Bank on a fishing trip, and being short of provisions, we hove our anchor and started for home. The wind was blowing almost a gale from the north-west and being almost dead ahead, we made slow progress on our voyage home. On Tuesday, the 5th October, we made Shelburne, N.S., and arrived in that harbor about 8 p.m., on that day, short of provisions, water, and oil to burn. On Wednesday I sailed for the inner harbor of Shelburne, arriving at the town about 4 p.m. On going ashore I found the customs house closed, and hunted up the collector and entered my vessel, and asked permission from him to buy 7 lbs. sugar, 3 lbs. coffee, and $\frac{1}{2}$ to 1 bushel of potatoes, 2 lbs. butter or lard or pork, and oil enough to last us home, and was refused."

I understood my hon. friend the Minister to contradict a statement made by the hon. member from West Ontario, and to say that no such thing occurred. The affidavit goes on:

"I stated to him my situation, short of provisions, and a voyage of 250 miles before me, and pleaded with him for this slight privilege, but it was of no avail. I then visited the American consul, and asked his assistance, and found him powerless to aid me in this matter. The collector of customs held my papers until the next morning although I asked for them as soon as I found I could not buy any provisions, say about $1\frac{1}{2}$ hours after I entered, but he refused to give them to me until the next morning. Immediately on receiving my papers of Thursday morning, I started for home, arriving on Sunday. I think the treatment I received harsh and cruel, driving myself and crew to sea with a scant supply of provisions, we having but little flour and water, and liable to be buffeted about for days before we came home.

"Mass., Essex, s. s., 13th Oct., 1886.

"Personally appeared Medeo Rose and made oath to the truth of the above statement.

"Before me,

"AARON PARSONS,

"Notary Public."

I merely read that in defence of the attitude assumed by the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), to show that the statement he made in relation to the refusal to grant these trifling things to the vessel, was true. Now, while it is true, as the Minister of Customs said, that he was not acting contrary to his instructions, did any Government in the world ever refuse in such a case as that to supply to a vessel in distress a few necessities, and send her to sea without almost the necessities of life? Why, Sir, the thing is ridiculous. It is instances like these that have brought about that ill-feeling which the hon. Minister of Finance so vividly described in the able speech he delivered a few days ago when introducing this subject.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to call my hon. friend's attention to a subsequent affidavit made by Medeo Rose made 20th April, 1887, in which he states that a former statement was untrue.

Mr. MITCHELL. On what page of the book?

Mr. FOSTER. On page 110 of the United States Senate documents, No. 113.

Mr. MITCHELL. We have not those papers.

Mr. FOSTER. I have them.

Mr. MITCHELL. But you should furnish the House with them.

Mr. FOSTER. They were laid on the Table eight or ten days ago.

Mr. MITCHELL. Were they distributed?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know.

Mr. MITCHELL. I speak from the evidence you have laid upon the Table of the House.

Mr. FOSTER.—

"It is stated to the collector that I was from Western Banks, bound home, and required provisions as follows, viz: 7 lbs.

sugar, 3 lbs. coffee, 1 bushel of potatoes, 2 lbs. butter, and to fill water. This was all. The collector told me to fill the water, but as there was no provision made in the treaty for the purchase of supplies of stores, he would telegraph the Department at Ottawa at once; that no doubt they would be allowed; and I consented to wait until the next morning for a reply."

Then he goes on with the extract which I read before, stating that he called at the Custom house the next morning, that no word had yet been received from Ottawa, and that he concluded, as the breeze was fair, not to wait. He then concluded:

"That is the second affidavit made by Medeo Rose."

Mr. MITCHELL. Does that statement contradict his statements? No, it does not. His affidavit is specific. He does not bring any complaint against the collector; he does not say that he was received harshly by the collector; he simply says that inasmuch as the collector refused to allow him the privilege of purchasing these things, the treatment of the Government was harsh. That was the meaning of his affidavit, not that the collector behaved ungentlemanly to him, but that the policy of the Government was harsh. That was Medeo Rose's statement of 13th October, 1886. Any later affidavit I have not been able to find in this book, and I have looked it over carefully. It may be here, but I can find no affidavit containing the statement the hon. gentleman has read. If the hon. gentleman has any additional papers connected with the fishery question, he should have laid them before the House in order that the House might be charged with the whole case as it appears to the country and as it appears to the American Government, and to our own Government at this moment. Medeo Rose's statement is quite clear:

"I stated to him my situation, short of provisions, and a voyage of 250 miles before me, and pleaded with him for this slight privilege, but it was of no avail. I then visited the American consul and asked his assistance and found him powerless to aid me in the matter. The collector of customs held my papers until the next morning, although I asked for them as soon as I found I could not buy any provisions, say 1½ hours after I entered, but he refused to give them to me until the next morning. * * * I think the treatment I received harsh and cruel, driving myself and crew to sea with a scant supply of provisions, we having but a little flour and water and liable to be buffeted for days before we came home."

That is sworn to in 1886.

Mr. EDGAR. I am perfectly willing to accept the statement which the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has read, though I have never seen it, as the subsequent affidavit on this point by Capt. Rose; because the statement, as he has read it, corresponds with the statement of the collector of customs which I read last night, and on which I founded this charge, and not on the original statement of Capt. Rose, which, however, was substantially correct. I made the charge, not of having been refused his papers, but of having been refused by the collector at the port, the right to buy seven pounds of sugar, three pounds of coffee, and so on, and that until they could hear from the headquarters at Ottawa by telegram, this man could not purchase even those little supplies; and I contend that was a harsh and unfriendly treatment of this captain. The collector's own statement, published in defence of himself, was as follows:—

"I gave him permission to fill water at once; but as the treaty made no provisions for the purchase of supplies, I would telegraph the department at Ottawa and no doubt it would be allowed. Captain Rose expressed his willingness to remain until reply was received. He called at the office next morning (Thursday) at 6:30, and finding I had not received a reply, said, as the wind was fair and a good breeze, he would not wait longer."

That is what I stated last night. I did not charge that the parties acted contrary to the treaty, but I charge that the interpretation of the treaty was harsh and unfair. As the Minister of Finance stated:

"It is one thing to hold a technical construction, and it is another to undertake to enforce it."

I say that they did hold an extremely technical construction of the treaty, and they undertook not only to enforce it, but they did enforce it.

Mr. LAURIER. We have had so far two affidavits from Medeo Rose, but there is a third one which the Minister has not alluded to. The hon. gentleman will find it on page 111 of the book from which he quoted:

"I, Medeo Rose, of Gloucester, being under oath, do depose and say, that I was master of the schooner Laura Sayward during the year 1886, and that I am now master of the schooner Gleaner, of Gloucester.

"On April 18, 1887, I went into the lower harbor of Shelburne, Nova Scotia, in said schooner Gleaner, for shelter and water.

"On the morning of April 19, Mr. Atwood, the collector of customs, with two men wearing badges, which I supposed were Government badges, came on board. Their appearance filled me with fear, for I felt some trouble must be in store for me when Collector Atwood would leave his office and come so far (about 4 miles) to board my vessel. I invited him into the cabin, where he showed me a copy of my statement of October 13, 1886, in regard to the treatment I received from him when in schooner Laura Sayward (October 5, 1886), and asked me if I made that statement. I told him I did. Well, said he, everything in that statement is false. I told him my statement was true. He then produced a prepared written statement, which he read to me, which stated that my statement of October 13 was untrue, and told me that I must go on shore and sign it. Being nervous and frightened, and fearing trouble if I refused, I went on shore with him, to the store of Mr. Purney, and before Mr. Purney signed and swore to the statement.

"On the afternoon of the same day, realizing the wrong I had done, I hired a team, and with one of my crew (Augustus Rogers), went to the custom house and asked Collector Atwood to read to me the statement I had signed. He did so, and I again told him it was wrong and that my first statement was true.

"He said I did not ask for all the articles mentioned in my first statement; that he did not refuse me my paper, and also that that statement might be the cause of his removal from his office. I told him I did not want to injure him, and I did not want to make myself out a liar at Washington.

"About the 3rd day of June last I went into Shelburne again solely to get a copy of the last statement. I went to the custom-house, taking the same man (Augustus Rogers) with me, and asked Collector Atwood for a copy of the statement.

"He refused to give it to me, and said my lawyers had been advising me what to do and that I need never expect a favor from him.

"The above is a true statement of the case. The statement obtained from me by Collector Atwood was obtained through my fear of seizure if I refused."

"MEDEO ROSE."

I find this affidavit is accompanied by another from Augustus Rogers:

"I, Augustus Rogers, one of the crew of schooner Gleaner, being duly sworn, do depose and say, that I went with Capt. Medeo Rose to the custom-house at Shelburne, Nova Scotia, on the 19th day of April last, and also on the 3rd day of June. I heard his conversation with Collector Atwood on both occasions, and hereby certify that the statements of those interviews, as made above, are correct and true.

"AUGUSTUS ROGERS."

"MASS., ESSEX, ss:

"Personally appeared Medeo Rose and Augustus Rogers, and made oath to the truth of the above statements before me.

[Seal.]

"AARON PARSONS,

"Notary Public.

August 3, 1887.

So the case is far worse than was stated by the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Elgar).

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries if, when he read the statement of Medeo Rose, he was aware of the second communication being in the book. If he was aware of it, and read the other statement alone, without communicating the whole matter, he was concealing from this House an important fact and was misleading the House. I am not saying he was doing that; but I ask him, was he aware when he read the statement a few minutes ago, of the subsequent affidavit of Medeo Rose?

Mr. EDGAR. In the same book, on the opposite page.

Mr. FOSTER. The only book was this, Senate documents, No. 113; and I read Medeo Rose's affidavit as given in that book, which flatly contradicted his first affidavit. I did not know what was in the book. I do not know the book yet.

Mr. EDGAR. It is on page 111 from which the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) read; only the affidavit the hon. gentleman read was dated 20th April and the other was dated 3rd August.

Mr. FOSTER. I see it exactly. I did not know it was in the book.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh!

Mr. FOSTER. I knew there were other statements in regard to Medeo Rose. I have sent to the department for them, and I will have them all here in a few minutes.

Some hon. MEMBERS. We have them.

Mr. LAURIER. Are there others?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, there is still a sequel.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Then you knew it.

Mr. FOSTER. With the permission of the House I will read the sequel when I receive it.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries is in the tightest place he ever found himself in his life.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. CASEY. I take that back. I have no doubt, from our experience of the hon. gentleman in this House, that he has been in a great many tight places in his life, and he may have been in a tighter place than this. One thing, however, is certain: that he concealed facts which he knew, and that he was aware of an affidavit made by this Captain Rose subsequently, the one he read to the House. To-day he brought this affidavit forward as a surprise, as he thought we had not the documents from which he was quoting, and which he took care that we did not possess, and which contained the subsequent affidavit to the one he quoted, stating that the former affidavit, the affidavit which the Minister read, had been extracted from him, Captain Rose, by pressure exercised upon him by the officers of the customs of Canada, that he had been terrorised into giving that former affidavit to clear the Dominion Government and to clear the hon. Minister from accusations that might be brought against him. Then the Minister tells us that although this affidavit was on the opposite page to the affidavit he read, he did not know anything about it. One of two things is true: either he misled the House as to his knowledge of the subsequent affidavit, or he had not the common gumption or sense to look upon the opposite page to see whether there was something bearing on the case. He must confess to either ignorance or to misleading the House, and I do not know which is most damaging to an hon. gentleman occupying his position, and I think a confession of ignorance is about as damaging as anything. I do not accuse him of these charges. I only accuse him with that with which he must accuse himself, if he is to escape the accusation of telling the House an untruth—he must accuse himself of not wishing to confess to gross ignorance in matters connected with his own department. Now he tells us there is something else. When he sat down he hinted in a mysterious manner that there was something else to be produced, some sequel. What is the card he has got under the table—has he got anything up his sleeve? He has said that there is something else; and if there is something else, now is the time to tell it to the House. But apart from the utter humiliation of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, which has resulted from this short debate, and I cannot call it by any other name than a confession of ignorance or falsehood on the part of an hon. gentleman in the position of the Minister, there is something else that requires to be noticed. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has pointed out the inconsistency between the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Fisheries. The Minister of Justice said some time ago, before the negotiations, that the privileges granted under this clause we are discussing, would utterly destroy our control of the inshore fisheries, and if they were granted we would not be able to prevent the United States fishermen from using them as they pleased. I believe the Minister of Justice is right, and I must confess he very generally is in a technical matter. But the Minister of Finance has taken the other line. He agreed to the clause as it now stands. And the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) asked for an explanation of the different views held by the hon. gentleman, and the Minister of Finance gave him an answer. And what was the answer? He said "carried." We all know the Minister of Finance is the controlling power in the Cabinet, that he has been working for and has attained to that position, but still under the circumstances we think the Minister of Justice ought to have received more consideration from his superior, from the virtual leader of the Cabinet, than was given to him and the rest of the Cabinet by simply uttering that word "carried." It was as much as to say: I have been to Washington and have agreed to this provision; it is none of your business whether it surrenders the inshore fisheries or not—I say "carried." This is the only argument the hon. gentleman advanced in regard to the question. It is cavalier treatment of the Minister of Justice and the rest of the Cabinet and of his venerable chief, to put the matter in that shape. It is due to the House and to the chief and the junior members of the Cabinet, that he should give some explanation as to how he reconciled the memoranda of the Minister of Justice with this clause of the treaty to which he has agreed. He must take one of two positions: either the Minister of Justice was wrong in his statement that the granting of those privileges to American craft would destroy our control of the inshore fisheries, or, if they would be destroyed, the hon. gentleman should state the reasons why it was necessary that we should grant those privileges. It is for him to speak now. "Carried" is not a sufficient argument in a matter of this national importance. It is for him to speak and explain why he said "carried," and why he sits on the Minister of Justice in the way he has done.

Mr. THOMPSON. I wish to say a few words, not at all in the way of removing the imputation which the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Casey) has made. I do not feel in the least sat upon. I do not admit for a single moment that the privileges I objected to as being likely to be injurious to our fishing interests, are conceded by this treaty or by Bill now before the House without qualifications and without safeguards which will remove the objections I foresaw. I do not see how hon. gentlemen have made so much out of those affidavits of Medeo Rose. Let me call attention to what those affidavits are. I am sure that if they read them again they will hardly find a case on which to make an attack on the Government or the party for maladministration, or too severe administration of the custom or fishery laws. In the first place the gentlemen opposite who are opposing this treaty with great vigor this afternoon rely on the ex parte statement of a man who has made at least three conflicting affidavits which have been already before the House, and who has also made a fourth affidavit, which, we understand, is contradictory to the other three. So that hon. gentlemen will see that in pressing this charge as they have, they are at least pressing it on the testimony of a witness which they would not ask even one of the humblest judges in the country to give judgment upon. The hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Laurier) read the third affidavit, and I would specially ask him to read that again. He will find that it is most craftily drawn and that the position of Medeo Rose in this matter is this: First he made an affidavit referring to ill-treatment on the part of the Government, or customs officials; next he made an affidavit stating that he had been well treated, that the officer had referred to Ottawa for instructions, but that he found it convenient to depart without waiting for a reply, and had no complaint to make. The third affidavit which he made in view of the other two and for the purpose of removing the second, strange to say, from beginning to end, although made with that view, does not state the second affidavit is untrue.

Mr. CASEY. Yes, it does.

Mr. THOMPSON. Let me remind the hon. gentleman what it does say and he will find that I am stating a fact. Medeo Rose says he went to tell the custom officer that it was untrue and that it was extorted from him by fears, but when he came to give his affidavit as to why it was untrue or false he does not dare to swear it was untrue. We have his assertion that the second affidavit was untrue, and we have that assertion corroborated by the custom house officer, but Medeo Rose does not dare to swear it was untrue from beginning to end of this affidavit. He says he made it from fear, without one word being alleged to show that there was a threat of seizure or the slightest apprehension on his mind that there would be any seizure or that he had been treated unfairly in any way whatever. Let me call the attention of the hon. gentleman to what the law was that the custom house officer was administering. It was the fishery law of Canada, enforcing the Treaty of 1818. It was no new law, no customs regulation, but that which had been the law of the Province of Nova Scotia in which this transaction occurred thirty years ago, and no custom house officer or no other officer of the Government could possibly dispense with the requirements of that law. It is not a question of whether Medeo Rose wanted or not the mere permission to buy a few pounds of tea or coffee, but having gone there and having remained there for purposes which were not warranted by the treaty, his vessel was liable to seizure and he was liable to a heavy penalty under an Imperial statute and a statute of the old Province of Nova Scotia passed thirty years ago. What he wanted the custom house officer to do what substantially to give him permission to say that the seizure should not be made and that the penalty should not be enforced. Would the hon. gentlemen entrust custom house officers, scattered as they are all over the country, to have dispensing power in penalties like that? All the officer could do in such a case was to refer it to the department, and when he did refer it to the department, Medeo Rose, according to his own statement, considering his position under the circumstances, took advantage of a favorable breeze and went to sea.

Mr. LAURIER. Just let me refer the hon. gentleman to this third affidavit. The hon. gentleman says that Medeo Rose did not say the second affidavit was false and the first true. This is what Rose says in his affidavit:

"On the afternoon of the same day, realising the wrong I had done, I hired a team and with one of my crew (Augustus Rogers) went to the custom house and asked Collector Atwood to read to me the statement I had signed. He did so, and I again told him it was wrong, and that my first statement was true."

It will be observed if the first statement is true the second was not. He does swear he says he told Collector Atwood, and if what he swears he told the collector was true, I would take it, when he repeats the same thing under oath, he intended it to be true. After all it matters little what are the statements of Medeo Rose in this matter. What is the charge that is brought against the Government? The charge is that those customs regulations were harassing and oppressive, and is that charge true or not true?

Mr. THOMPSON. They were not customs regulations.

Mr. LAURIER. Call them customs regulations or any regulations at all. At all events they were the regulations of the whole Government, and the charge is that they were oppressive and harassing to the American fishermen. Is that statement true or is it not true? That is the charge, and the fact is that the Government have pleaded to-day that they were most gentle in their treatment of the American fishermen. The Americans do not want any more of that gentleness. They want to get rid of it, and the Bill we are passing now is to enable the Canadian Government to deal gently with the American fishermen. Henceforward they will be able to extend gentleness in their treatment, and henceforward they will be lenient with them and the American fishermen will practically have their own way.

Mr. EDGAR. There is no use in the Minister of Justice trying to make out that any of these affidavits or all of them refute the fact that this Government official refused the supplies and had to telegraph to Ottawa to get permission to give them.

Mr. THOMPSON. I do not deny that. I said he was obliged to do so by the law.

Mr. EDGAR. There is nothing contradictory to that in the affidavits of Medeo Rose or the Collector of Customs. That fact remains. But, Sir, if the Minister of Marine was unable to discover this affidavit of Rose upon the opposite page from the one that he read from, I wonder if he was unable to discover the letter from Secretary Bayard to Sir Sackville West which is upon the same page as the affidavit which he read; and in that letter of Mr. Secretary Bayard there is a reference made to this Rose dispute in terms which I think were directed in a statesmanlike manner to the extraordinary conduct of this Government in 1886. Mr. Secretary Bayard, in transmitting to Sir Sackville West this third affidavit of Rose, says:

"I should transmit the documents without further comment, but that, enclosing your note to me of July 13 last, you stated that you were further 'instructed to ask whether the United States Government have any observations to make thereupon.'

"In my reply to you on the 19th of July, I promised to comply with your request, and for that reason I now remark that the incident which had been the subject of this correspondence affords but another illustration and additional evidence, if any were needed, of the unwisdom of imperilling the friendly relations of two kindred and neighboring countries by entrusting the interpretation and execution of a treaty between them to the discretion of local and petty officials and vesting in them powers of administration wholly unwarranted and naturally prolific of the irritations which wise and responsible rulers will always seek to avoid."

That is the line we have been taking in criticising the course of the Government and their officials in 1886, and I am sure it is a broad and statesmanlike and correct line.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I must say it appears to me a most extraordinary thing, requiring the attention of this House to be called to it, that the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries should not have made himself aware of the letter from Mr. Secretary Bayard to Sir Sackville West, under the date of October 21, 1887, and, if he had ever read that letter, how he could possibly have told us that he was unaware of the existence of these three affidavits. It seems to me utterly incredible that a letter of Mr. Bayard to Sir Sackville West should have escaped the attention of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries. If it did escape his attention, all I can say is that his mode of conducting the business of his department is most extraordinary and unprecedented. If he did read that letter, he knew the existence of those three affidavits, and I think, in view of the existence of that letter, the hon. gentleman's explanation is very extraordinary indeed. Now, I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Justice, who must also have seen this letter, whether our collector did or did not prepare a written statement, as this Capt. Rose alleges, and did submit it to this man to be sworn to. I think, after what Mr. Bayard stated, enquiry ought to be made into that matter.

Mr. THOMPSON. I do not see why the hon. gentleman should ask me. He is not an officer of my department, and I have nothing to do with the matter. But what I know is that the second affidavit of Capt. Rose, in which he states that he was well treated, was fully corroborated, not only by the officer himself, but by others as well.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think enquiry should be made as to whether our officer submitted the affidavit to this American captain to swear to it. I think that ought to be done in a matter which was of sufficient importance to be noticed in a letter from the Secretary of State to the British Ambassador. The whole circumstances are simply remarkable.

An hon. MEMBER. Fishy.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes, fishy in the extreme.

Mr. MITCHELL. There is one extraordinary statement made by the Minister of Justice. He attempts to discredit the statement of Captain Rose by the allegation, but the second affidavit is against the statement in the first one; but when the third affidavit was made, contradicting the one made before, that ought to prove the man unworthy of belief. But the hon. gentleman fails to notice this fact, that the man swears that he made the second affidavit under fear that his vessel would be seized, and that he would be placed in the power of the officers of a British port. The hon. gentleman also fails to notice that the third affidavit is sustained by the statement of another party to the transaction. My hon. friend shakes his head, I presume to signify that I am stating something that is incorrect.

Mr. THOMPSON. If you will allow me, I will state what I mean. I explained, when on my feet before, that what had been spoken of as the corroboration of the affidavit was merely a corroboration of the fact that this man had stated to the collector that his former statement was untrue, but there was no corroboration of his allegations of fact. It is a mere corroboration of a witness who was present when Captain Rose said to the collector, My former statement is untrue; and I call the attention of the committee to the fact that he did not swear that the affidavit was untrue, but simply said so.

Mr. MITCHELL. He did swear that it was not true, as I understand. In addition to that, Mr. Augustus Rogers swore:

"I, Augustus Rogers, one of the crew of schooner Gleaner, being duly sworn, do depose and say, that I went with Captain Medeo Rose to the custom house at Shelburne, Nova Scotia, on the 13th day of April last, and also on the 3rd day of June. I heard his conversation with Collector Atwood on both occasions, and hereby certify that the statements of those interviews, as made above, are correct and true.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

"AUGUSTUS ROGERS.

"Personally appeared Medeo Rose and Augustus Rogers, and made oath to the truth of the above statements before me."

"AARON PARSONS,

"Notary Public.

"August 3, 1887."

How can the Minister say that it was not sworn to? Both of them distinctly contradict the statements made in the second affidavit, and Mr. Augustus Rogers confirms the statement of Medeo Rose that he did it from fear of arrest. The thing is as plain as can be, and I am surprised that a statement should be put before the House by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and confirmed by the Minister of Justice to the contrary. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries says he did not know of the existence of these papers.

Mr. FOSTER. I did not say that.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then that makes the matter worse. If he did, he ought to have told it to the House. The Minister of Justice listened to the statement made by him, and he sat still, and allowed the Minister of Marine and Finance to mislead this House by the statement that Medeo Rose had contradicted the previous affidavit he had made. The thing is outrageous.

Mr. THOMPSON. All I can say in conclusion is that there is not one word in the statement of Augustus Rogers which is inconsistent with the second affidavit of Medeo Rose. He simply states that he was present when Capt. Rose made certain statements. The hon. gentleman perhaps knows how carefully devised some of these affidavits are drawn with the view of representing a certain state of facts, when they do not entail the penalties of perjury upon the person who makes them. Here is the second affidavit distinctly recalling the charges made in the first, and the third affidavit, in which he beats all around the compass, and does not say as a matter of fact that the statements he made in the second affidavit are untrue at all. But the person who drew the affidavit, and I venture to say it was not Medeo Rose, is very careful indeed to insert all kinds of statements that he had contradicted it, and eliminate altogether the statements contradicting it in the affidavit which was sworn to.

Mr. MITCHELL. I look on the explanation of the Minister of Justice as hair splitting. It is a nice piece of special pleading, and, from his well-known ability in that line, I can understand how he could mislead this House by such special pleading. He says there is no sworn statement that Captain Rose's second affidavit was false; I will read again what Capt. Rose said:

"On the morning of April 19, Mr. Atwood, the collector of customs, with two men wearing badges, which I supposed were Government badges, came on board. Their appearance filled me with fear, for I felt some trouble must be in store for me when Collector Atwood would leave his office and come so far (about 4 miles) to board my vessel. I invited him into the cabin, where he showed me a copy of my statement of October 13, 1886, in regard to the treatment I received from him when in schooner Laura Sayward (October 5, 1886), and asked me if I made that statement. I told him I did. Well, said he, everything in that statement is false. I told him my statement was true."

Mr. THOMPSON. He said so, but does not swear to it.

Mr. MITCHELL.—

"He then produced a prepared written statement, which he read to me, which stated that my statement of October 13 was untrue, and told me I must go on shore and sign it. Being nervous and frightened, and fearing trouble if I refused, I went on shore with him to the store of Mr. Purney, and before Mr. Purney signed and swore to the statement. On the afternoon of the same day, realizing the wrong I had done, I hired a team and, with one of my crew (Augustus Rogers), went to the custom house and asked Collector Atwood to read to me the statement I had signed. He did so, and I again told him that it was wrong and that my first statement was true."

This statement was sworn to by Mr. Aaron Parsons. This is Captain Rose's statement:

"He said I did not ask for all the articles mentioned in my first statement; that he did not refuse me my paper, and also that that statement might be the cause of his removal from his office. I told him I did not want to injure him and I did not want to make myself a liar at Washington. About the 3rd day of June last, I went into Shelburne again, solely to get a copy of the last statement. I went to the custom house, taking the same man, Augustus Rogers, with me, and asked Collector Atwood for a copy of the statement. He refused to give it to me, and said my lawyers had been advising me what to do, and that I need never expect a favor from him. The above is a true statement of the case. The statement obtained from me by Collector Atwood was obtained through my fear of seizure if I refused."

Yet the hon. the Minister of Customs tells us that Capt. Medeo Rose did not, in this affidavit, declare his statement was untrue. I will read the words again: "I told him it was wrong, and that my first statement was true." The captain signed to the truth of this last statement, and is sustained by Mr. Augustus Rogers in the most complete manner possible, as I have already shown. Mr. Rogers made the following affidavit:—

"I, Augustus Rogers, one of the crew of schooner Gleaner, being duly sworn, do depose and say, that I went with Capt. Medeo Rose to the custom house at Shelburne, Nova Scotia, on the 13th day of April last, and also on the 3rd June. I heard his conversation with Collector Atwood on both occasions, and I hereby certify that the statements of those interviews, as made above, are correct and true.

"AUGUSTUS ROGERS."

What better evidence can be adduced. True, the hon. gentleman has chosen to assail the testimony of Capt. Rose because he made the second affidavit, although that affidavit was made under fear of arrest and seizure of his vessel, but the moment the captain had made his second affidavit he found out his mistake and at once tried to recall it, and his final statement is confirmed by the evidence and affidavit of Mr. Rogers, who was present the whole time, and swore to the truth of the captain's declaration and to the truth of the facts as stated in his first affidavit.

Mr. McNEILL. Where was that affidavit drawn up?

Mr. MITCHELL. At Essex, county of Massachusetts.

Mr. McNEILL. I should think we all have heard of hair splitting Yankee lawyers.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. the Minister of Justice has a strong imagination. He has imagined a host of lawyers advising this Captain Rose, who has been giving so much trouble and drawing his affidavit so carefully that he might get out of it, no matter whether he was swearing to a lie or not. But it appears from the papers that it was not Captain Rose who was advised by the lawyers, but the collector of Shelburne, for he told Captain Rose that his lawyers had advised him about the matter. It was the affidavit which Collector Atwood coerced Captain Rose into signing, that was drawn by the lawyers for that particular purpose. That was the affidavit which the Government, through their officer, coerced this man into signing, and which he afterwards, when free from that coercion, declared under oath to be untrue. That was the affidavit drawn by the lawyers, and it appears that Captain Rose, when he signed it, did not know exactly what he was swearing to. There is no need to read over the documents again, for it has been clearly proved that Captain Rose made a declaration in the second place under coercion, and I submit it was forced from him with the approval of the Government, because these facts had been known to him for some time, and they have not yet dismissed Collector Atwood. This captain was coerced into swearing into a lie in order to get the Government out of a scrape. The affidavit was a lying one, drawn out by the lawyers, and not the spontaneous affidavit of Captain Rose before other parties. But there is one point outside of that which has not yet been explained, and to which I merely wish to call attention without dwelling on it at all. The hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has not yet explained—I do not know whether he can or not—the reasons of his ignorance of the affidavit which is on the page opposite to the one he read. How it was that he knew of the existence of the lying affidavit, the bulldozed affidavit which sustained his case, and in regard to which this Government are responsible, because they have maintained in office the man who forced that affidavit on Captain Rose—how it was he knew about that and did not know about the subsequent free, spontaneous, and amply corroborated affidavit, he has not explained. I say the subsequent affidavit was amply corroborated, because Augustus Rogers, who was present on both occasions—who was present when the collector terrorized Captain Rose into making the false affidavit, and who was present on the subsequent occasion—certifies to its truth. The hon. gentleman may take whichever horn of the dilemma he chooses. He may admit he was ignorant of the subsequent affidavit, and therefore unfit to be where he is and to have taken part in the conference at Washington, or he may admit that he knew of its existence and concealed it from the House by speaking as if no such thing were in existence. I do not know which horn of the dilemma would be more discreditable to him as a Minister of the Crown.

On section seven,

Mr. JONES (Halifax). When this Bill was under discussion on a previous occasion, I took the opportunity to draw the attention of the House to the concessions made to the American fishermen under this and the previous clause, showing, according to my judgment, that we had under these clauses yielded up the whole value of our fishing privileges and had obtained nothing whatever in return. I maintain that the use of our ports for the purpose of securing bait and supplies and the transshipment of cargoes is a privilege of unestimable value, so far as the American fishermen are concerned, and that the hon. gentleman, the Minister of Finance, and the other hon. gentlemen who spoke on that side have not been able to show a single advantage gained by the Canadian fishermen on our side. The hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, pointed to several articles in various newspapers showing the advantages of the treaty from our point of view. Now, I hold in my hand the New York Herald of Sunday last, in which an interview is reported with Mr. Phelan, the Consul General of the United States in Halifax.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Perhaps my hon. friend was not in the House when the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) read every word of that interview, so that it is already in Hansard.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The interview he read was in the Montreal Herald.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think not. Was my hon. friend in the House when my hon. friend for Northumberland read that interview?

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I was.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Then perhaps this is a different one altogether.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Yes.

"The advantages of the treaty," Mr. Phelan replied, are manifold. Among other things it opens up valuable fishing bays to us by removing all doubts as to our right to fish in them. This in itself is no small matter, inasmuch as Canadians had previously claimed that we were permitted to fish there only on sufferance. Under the Treaty of 1818 we had no right to enter Canadian ports, except for four things—wood, water, shelter and repairs. Even in these cases we were subjected to an unpleasant espionage and as carefully watched as if we were so many pirates. Again, the Treaty relieves our vessels entering Canadian ports for the purposes named in the treaty of all dues, pilotage and every charge whatever, and at the same time they enjoy the benefits of lighthouses, buoys and other safeguards to navigation, the same as Canadian vessels do. The treaty also eliminates the word 'hovering' from the Canadian statutes, under which some of our vessels have been seized and condemned. Under the treaty, an American vessel coming in damaged can repair and procure fresh supplies, provisions, etc., and refit and save the necessity of returning home for this purpose. All these privileges, you must understand, were denied us under the old treaty. Now our vessels can unload, sell or tranship their cargoes, and in case they are short of supplies at any time, they can enter the nearest port and get them. In short, we have surrendered nothing and gained a great deal. The Canadians have surrendered everything and gained nothing. All the gain is on our side. True, the treaty might go further than it does, but it is certainly a great improvement on the one now in force. The disadvantages under which we have suffered during the past two years in the way of seizures on technical grounds cannot be committed under the present treaty. It is my deliberate judgment that it would be a serious matter for our fishermen if the new convention should be rejected. To do so means a return to the old Treaty of 1818, under which our people have chafed so long."

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What is the date of that paper?

Mr. JONES (Halifax). It is the New York Herald of Sunday, April 15.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is marvellously like that interview in Montreal.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Yes, but it goes a little further. At any rate, it is not of any importance whether it is the same statement or not. It corroborates the statement that we have surrendered all the advantages of which we were possessed under the old treaty of 1818, and have gained nothing from the Americans in return. I think that is an opinion from the American side of the case which will more than counterbalance all the quotations which have been read to the House by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.). I would like to understand, if I can, the real meaning of this section. When the motion for the second reading of this Bill was made, I ventured to make some observations on the Bill, and especially with reference to the 6th section, which has been passed, and the 7th section, which is now before the House; and I submitted, with some humility, that I could not quite understand what was the meaning of those sections. I asked the Minister of Justice what was the meaning of those sections in his opinion, those sections being, to my mind, the key to the whole treaty, but the hon. gentleman was a little out of temper at the time, and he declined to give me the information I asked for. Afterwards, he delivered what was characterised as a most spirited address, which seemed to suit his friends on the other side of the House; but I had asked for that information with no object in the world except to obtain the information. It seemed to me, as I stated at that time, that there was no controlling power provided for, to determine when or when not the American fishermen could get the privileges which are accorded to them under that section. For instance, I stated that the privilege of transhipment was a great privilege which they sought, and that I felt that, under that section, although it might not be intended to give them that privilege, the section could be so constructed as practically to give them that right of transhipment. I pointed out that United States fishing vessels, according to the section, entering the "Ports, bays and harbors of the eastern and north-eastern coasts of Canada, under stress of weather or in consequence of any casualty, may unload, reload, tranship or sell (subject to customs laws and regulations) all fish on board, when such unloading, transhipment or sale is necessary as incidental to repairs."

And I asked, as I now ask, who is to judge whether it is necessary as incidental to repairs or not? Nobody can judge. The captain may say, I propose to remain here two or three days, and, in my opinion, my fish are in such a condition that I must tranship them. It is not to be supposed that the collector of customs in each port is to have the right to interpret the treaty. That right is not vested in him. The result is, that that section will be so construed that the privilege of transhipment, the most valuable privilege that the American fishermen have asked for, is practically conceded to them. According to the 7th section, the master of any United States fishing vessel who has received a license may obtain

"Such provisions and supplies as are ordinarily sold to trading vessels, and any such vessel, having obtained a license in the manner aforesaid, shall also be accorded, upon all occasions, such facilities for the purchase of casual or needful provisions and supplies as are ordinarily granted to trading vessels."

Now, the hon. gentleman says that this treaty does not give them the right to purchase bait. It seems to me that bait is a part of the outfit of a fishing vessel. At any rate, it is so argued, and I think can be successfully argued. If a captain says, "I have lost my bait in this storm and I want to purchase more," the treaty says that he may, and all I have contended for is that this treaty, which is said to be an interpretation treaty, which is said to be intended to make matters clear, has simply made them so confused and so difficult to understand that practically the right to purchase bait and the right of transhipment cannot be refused to American fishermen. Now, I have already called the attention of the Minister to the 7th section, and I repeat my request for information in regard to it. The first part of that section says:

"The Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and any officers of the Government of Canada whom he may authorize for that purpose, shall grant promptly, and upon application, and without charge, licenses to United States fishing vessels to purchase in established ports of entry of the aforesaid coasts of Canada, for the homeward voyage, such provisions and supplies as are ordinarily sold to trading vessels."

And the latter part of the section goes on to say:

"Any such vessel, having obtained a license in the manner aforesaid, shall also be accorded upon all occasions such facilities for the purchase of casual or needful provisions and supplies as are ordinarily granted to trading vessels."

Now, the first part of the section would lead anyone who was seeking to find out its interpretation to believe that it was only after the master of the vessel had closed his voyage and was going home, and required some small supplies which he would need for that homeward voyage, that he would be entitled to obtain the necessary supplies, but the latter part of the section seems to have a different effect. It appears to state that any vessel which has once obtained a license, shall, in future, on all occasions, have the same facilities for the purchase of supplies as ordinarily granted to trading vessels. Of course there will be a great deal of controversy as to what "casual and needful provisions and supplies" are. My impression is that this treaty will receive at the hands of this Government, if it be adopted, and from the officers of the Government, a very broad and liberal interpretation. My opinion is, that the Canadian officers hereafter will not be very astute in examining the demand of the American fishermen under this treaty to purchase supplies or to purchase bait or anything else. They will practically give them what they want, but it seems to me that this clause is very curiously worded, and I ask whether a license once obtained is intended to inure for the following season, or whether, when a license is obtained in the early part of the summer, the party is to be entitled to purchase supplies as he needs them from time to time. If that is the case, that will enable these men to do what the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Fisheries have declared would be fatal to the fishing interests of the Maritime Provinces. I do not desire to prolong the controversy on these points, which I think have been put very fairly before the House and the country, but the quotations which have been put before the House from the Minutes and the State papers show clearly that, in the opinion of those Ministers, it would be fatal to the interests of everyone and especially to the interests of the fisheries in the Maritime Provinces if the American fishermen were allowed to come in there and make their purchases of bait, if they were allowed to make the harbors and shores of the Maritime Provinces the base for carrying on their fishing operations. Now, it appears to me that if an American fisherman can come into port and claims that, by casualty, he has lost his outfit, he may purchase a new outfit, as the 6th section says. I think I would say that that word "outfit" of a fishing vessel includes bait as a part of it. I may be wrong, because when a fishing vessel goes, for instance, to take cod-fish from the Banks, the outfit which she takes to enable her—and, as my hon. friend on my right remarks, almost all she needs is outfit—to carry on the fishery, is the fresh bait. In old days, these fisheries on the Banks were carried on by means of salt bait, but when the fishermen discovered that fresh bait was taken more readily, they have, of late years, used only that. No fisherman would presume to go to the Banks and say his outfit was complete unless he had sufficient fresh bait to last him for his voyage. My impression therefore was that the word outfit was intended to cover bait, fresh as well as salt. It would not be contended that it would not cover salt,—the bait seems to me to be in precisely the same category. Therefore if a vessel has gone to the Banks, providing herself with a supply of bait, in the first instance, to last a fortnight, and afterwards enters one of the ports of the Maritime Provinces, and the master says that from some casualty she has lost her bait, you have no means of testing the accuracy of his statement; and hon. gentlemen opposite, both to day and previously, have told us what their opinion is of the character of the men who man and control these vessels, and how they will make any statement that is necessary in their interest. If he goes there and says that from casualty, he has lost his outfit, he is entitled under this interpretation, to replenish it. But not as a matter of favor. He says under the treaty: I have come here and as a right I demand to purchase my outfit. Under the Act he will come in a very different way. He will not speak with bated breath, as he has been accustomed to do, when pursuing his fisheries under the Treaty of 1818. He will now come and say: I demand this as a right. Now, I would like the hon. gentleman, if he deems it necessary to reply to my observations at all, to answer me whether, in his opinion, it was intended that the license should be granted to American fishermen when they go into a bay in the early part of the season, and having got that license, which they get as a matter of right, does that entitle them to purchase, in the words of the 7th section, "such casual and needful provisions and supplies as are ordinarily granted to trading vessels from time to time." If it was only intended they should purchase such casual and needful supplies as are required for the home voyage, then the hon. gentleman will see that the first part of the section concedes that privilege entirely—the latter part of the section was intended to grant something else—that on all occasions after having obtained his license, he comes into any port, he can obtain such casual or needful provisions as he requires. If that is so, you have given up everything, you have enabled them to make your harbors their basis for carrying on their fishing operations. If that is so,

I need not use any stronger language than the language used by the Minister of Justice himself, that such a concession would be absolutely fatal to the fishing interests of the Maritime Provinces. If it is fatal, and if you have given this up, it is well that we should know it. I suppose this is the proper time to ask an explanation.

Mr. THOMPSON. I would like very much, indeed, to enter fully into this question with my hon. friend, and to give what I conceive to be the interpretation of the phrases in these two sections. The hon. gentleman, however, must bear with me if I decline doing so, not at all out of disrespect to the hon. gentleman, but because, as he is aware, whatever we may say here in favor of the treaty will be used against it elsewhere. Hon. gentlemen have perfect freedom to suggest the possible constructions that may arise unfavorable to Canada, without any injury to the treaty at all; and they are increasing the chances of its acceptance by the United States. But, on the contrary, if we defended the treaty as we might be disposed to do under every circumstance, and made a statement of our views and the construction of various points suggested to us, we are making a case for those who are disposed to find fault with the treaty in another direction. The hon. gentleman, however, will, I am sure, appreciate what I shall endeavor to say in reply to the remarks he has just made, in a general way. The hon. gentleman has correctly quoted me as saying that if we should do anything which will make the harbors of the Maritime Provinces a base of supplies for the United States fishermen, we would practically give up our whole case and adopt a measure which will be extremely detrimental to the interests of our own fishermen, at a time when they are hampered, to some extent, by an adverse duty in the markets of the United States. But I do not regard the sections which the hon. gentleman has referred to, as to any extent making Canada a basis of supplies for the United States fishermen. On the contrary, I think they contain but a liberal and fair extension of the right of shelter and repairs which are secured to the United States fishermen by the Treaty of 1818. Now, in the first place, as regards the question of transshipment. The hon. gentleman will remember that the treaty itself dealt generally with the subject of transshipment in that section of it which provides for the right of transshipment being given to the United States fishermen on certain conditions; those conditions being, principally, the admission of our fish free into the United States; so that the treaty deals with that particular subject and in that specific way. But when we come down to give, in section 6, the right of shipment in certain specified cases, we are dealing, not with the general right of transshipment, not conferring, I take it, the general right of transshipment of cargo at all, but we are ceding simply the right to tranship cargoes in certain cases, one of which lately occurred, but which have been of rare occurrence, and in which it would be most harsh to refuse the right of transshipment; these cases being cases of vessels coming in out of repair and in distress, and with their fish in such a condition that they would spoil or have to be thrown overboard, unless the master were allowed to tranship his cargo. He would be permitted by the treaty, even under this extreme circumstance, to tranship his cargo, or even to sell it in Canada, if he were willing to pay the duty upon it; but this simply allows him, under circumstances of that kind, where transshipment is necessary and incidental to repairs, simply allows him transshipment in that one case. I take it that instead of it being ambiguous or difficult to ascertain the condition of the vessel when she comes in to make repairs, under these circumstances it is very easy of ascertainment. The United States vessels are to be subject to supervision, and in addition there can be no transshipment affected without certain entries being made in the custom house. There will be supervision at every point; first of all, when they enter the three-mile limit they will be subject to the inspection of our officers who will ascertain the bond fides in entering the harbors where they come, and if they tranship their cargoes they will have to make customs entries. A few words as to what the hon. gentleman said about licenses. I understand that hon. gentlemen opposite are rather inclined to believe that this construction might be placed upon the treaty: that a vessel going seaward towards the fishing grounds might early in the season obtain a license for the purchase of supplies. Now, I do not think that is the construction that can be applied. A vessel is only entitled to apply for a licence to obtain those provisions and supplies which are ordinarily sold to trading vessels for the homeward voyage, and I should think it very extraordinary if it were set up on the part of any of the American fishermen on going to the fishing grounds that they would expect to get a license in order to obtain the casual and needful supplies for a homeward voyage, when it would be impossible for them or for the person who gave the license to ascertain what supplies would be needed for the homeward voyage, or whether any would be needed. I do not think that construction is at all reasonable, that after a vessel had obtained a license she should forever afterwards be entitled to obtain those supplies, nor do I think any such contention will be made. I think the proviso in that section is simply to take care that the condition of the vessel having been established, the necessity of obtaining supplies having been established, a license shall be given, notwithstanding any provision in the law to the contrary, and that every facility shall be given to the captain of the vessel to make the purchases which the license authorises him to make. The section which provides for the right of making repairs and of damages or losses arising from disaster, is simply an extension of the provision of the Treaty of 1818. If a vessel lost a bowsprit or sustained any slight damage whatever, she had a right to come in for repairs, but if she lost her nets she would not have the right to come in and purchase nets, strictly speaking. It is simply, I say, a fair extension of the provisions of the Treaty of 1818, in regard to repairs, an extension which we were asked to make on some occasions, but which was beyond our power to grant.

Mr. DAVIES. With the latter part of the remarks made by the hon. Minister I quite agree. The hon. gentleman says that, under the Treaty of 1818, if a vessel lost her bowsprit, or some other part of her gear, she had a right to come in for repairs. It is perfectly true the vessel had no right to buy supplies, or tranship cargo. Her right was confined simply to repairing the damage which had been caused to some part of her gear. Now, the hon. gentleman says that, under this treaty, they have extended that right; I agree with him, and the only question is as to what extent they have extended it. It seems to me that, while there may be three or four constructions put upon the 6th section, the construction which American captains will put upon the section—and I make these observations without any desire to criticise the hon. minister too sharply—is that, when he comes in to repair running gear or bowsprit, the captain will say that, my fish are in such a condition that I must send them on, in order that the repairs may be made. Who is to question the right of the captain to land them, if it is incidental to repairs to land them? Who is to question his right if he also demands transshipment as incidental to the repairs? Formerly, under the old treaty, the vessel came in for a specific purpose, which was understood by the collector, and if he exceeded that purpose his vessel was liable to seizure. But this treaty confers on the captains of American vessels the privilege, when they come in, to repair losses which have happened to their vessels; and they may then tranship their fish, unload or sell them if these acts are necessarily incident to repairs. The language is unfortunate, for no one can say what is incident to repairs and what is not incident. The American captains will put a broad construction upon this term. Any one acquainted with fishing knows what will happen. Suppose a fleet of 200 vessels are fishing off Margaree or Cheticamp on the coast of Cape Breton, or off East Point. They may come into harbor on the approach of a storm and one of the captains may say that he wants to make some repairs as he has lost some gear. He reports to the custom house, and states that as the repairs will occupy ten or twelve days, he desires to land his cargo and send it on. Who is to question his right?

Mr. THOMPSON. We can ascertain the fact, and he is responsible for the penalty.

Mr. DAVIES. Does the hon. Minister say that a sub-collector at Cheticamp or Souris would dare to say to one of the American captains: You claim that right to do this under the sixth clause, we will seize your vessel and test your case in the courts. I do not think officers would dare to so act. I am talking of the practical construction and application of the section. It seems to me that when the hon. gentleman stated formerly that concessions of this kind would destroy the fisheries of the Maritime Provinces, he stated the truth. Again, the hon. gentleman claims that it would not be fair to press him to place a construction upon the words of the section. But that is surely not a fair contention on his part. It is not fair that this country should be called upon to ratify the treaty without knowing the meaning to be put upon the most important words in it? Surely we should understand what is the real meaning of the concessions we are making and that the United States should understand what is the real meaning of the concessions which they are receiving. If "outfit," as I contend it does, includes bait as well as salt, and if the construction of the sixth section is as I put it just now, everything for which the Americans have ever contended has been given up to them. The hon. gentleman, in referring to the seventh section, stated, if I understood him rightly, that American fishing vessels will only be entitled to purchase supplies when they are on their homeward voyage. But an American fisherman is only on his homeward voyage when he is leaving the last port in the Bay. What is the use of getting a license then? Surely the hon. gentleman must see that some meaning must be accorded to the last part of the section, which states that after they have obtained such licenses they shall on all occasions be accorded permission to purchase such casual supplies, etc., as are ordinarily granted to trading vessels. The meaning of the clause is this, that an American fishing vessel coming down to the Bay can obtain a license when she comes into the Bay. And after obtaining her license she, from month to month and from week to week, is entitled under the license to go into any Canadian port and purchase any such casual supplies as she may require from time to time. I cannot put any other construction on the last part of the section. It has no meaning unless it means that.

"She shall be accorded upon all occasions such facilities."

Surely it must mean that, and if it does mean that, the hon. gentleman sees he has made our harbors and bays in a position to enable them to carry out their fishery. If he has done so as the Minister of Marine and the Minister of Justice have said, he has struck a fatal blow at the fisheries of the Maritime Provinces. He says in his minute:

"If the Provinces are to be judges, it is most prejudicial to their interest that United States fishermen should be permitted to come into their harbors on any pretext, and it is fatal to their fishery interests that those fishermen, with whom they have to compete at such a disadvantage in the markets of the United States, should be allowed to enter for supplies and bait, even for the pursuit of the deep sea fisheries."

It is therefore fatal to the fishery interests that they should be allowed to enter for supplies and bait. It appears to me the broad construction of those two sections will enable them to do that which my hon. friend says will be fatal to our interests. That broad construction is the construction American fishermen will contend for—that is, the construction will give it, and that broad construction is the construction the American people will endorse. My own impression is that is the construction we will finally have to accept. The hon. gentleman says, truly enough, and it would be a very fair argument in answer to their contention, that the transshipment of their fish and the purchase of supplies and bait is provided for in another part of the treaty. Of course it is, but it is provided for in this part of the treaty too, under the circumstances mentioned in the section. The question is, who is to declare when those circumstances exist and when they do not exist? An American captain comes in and says: I have lost my outfit from casualty. There is nobody to dispute it. You must accept it and when you do he has the right to buy a new outfit, and the outfit if it embraces salt must necessarily embrace bait. If that is so we are giving away, by this section, everything he wants, and the latter part of the other section which gave him the right to tranship and purchase bait when they admit our fish duty free, will never be brought into operation, because practically he will have the right under the section we are now considering, if that construction I am submitting to the House is adopted, and I believe it will be. My own impression is, and I have heard it stated by some gentlemen, that the American Senate will not ratify this treaty. Personally, I do not think that would be an unmixed evil. I, for one, do not fear we will have a repetition of the disastrous state of affairs we had in 1886. We are not going to have that any more. There will be no enforcement by this Government of the obnoxious customs laws, whether this treaty goes into operation or not. There is no doubt about that. The language used by the Finance Minister and acquiesced in by the members of the Government puts that beyond doubt. We will have our rights under the old treaty and they will be maintained with a firm hand and not with the technical exactness in which the Minister of Fisheries in 1886 tried to carry them out. In 1887 a new state of matters was introduced, and I do not think that the Americans complained very much of their treatment in that year. I rose for the purpose, as far as possible, of getting light myself upon the meaning of those sections, and if anything I could say would add to the information of others, I thought it well to speak as I believed it desirable that this House should understand the matter thoroughly.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman was making the treaty I could understand his action in this matter, but we are not doing that.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.). I was trying to arrive at the meaning of this section and I think it is very important.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will draw the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that the course he has taken is the course that would be taken by the deadliest enemy of the Canadian fishermen.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, and I will show it. We are not now making a treaty, Sir. The treaty is made and we are not deciding whether we will accept this treaty. That the House has already unanimously decided, and the hon. gentleman himself, after discussing this treaty, closed his remarks by saying he intended to vote for it. I say that we are not making a treaty and as we are not deciding whether we will accept the treaty, for that has been done and done unanimously by this House, I say that every word the hon. gentleman is using in the criticism which he has offered to the House, he knows is impotent to change a line in that treaty, but he knows that all the weight and influence that his position in this House, his position as a member of the legal profession, will give him, will be quoted hereafter in opposition to the rights of Canadian fishermen and in support of the claims of American fishermen. I cannot understand a man who professes to be the friend of our fishermen taking this course. If his object, Sir, is to aid me, if his object is to aid Canada in getting this treaty adopted by the American Senate, then his conduct is intelligible; but from any other standpoint I say that I am astounded that a gentleman of the legal profession, a man having the knowledge of public affairs that the hon. gentleman has, should take up the time of the House, as he has, after the House has solemnly decided by a unanimous vote to ratify this treaty, when he knows he cannot change a line in it. I am astonished at the hon. gentleman standing on his feet here and for this length of time endeavoring to make a case for the United States fishermen against the Canadian fishermen, and throwing all the weight and influence of his legal opinion, whatever that may amount to, into the scale of the American fisherman against the Canadian fishermen.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.). I do not know what I have done to merit this extraordinary scolding at the hands of the hon. gentleman. When I first addressed the House I ventured to ask information on those most important clauses which the hon. gentleman has incorporated in this treaty, clauses which were susceptible of a broad meaning the result of which would be to surrender our fisheries entirely to the United States. I venture respectfully to ask the hon. gentleman and the Minister of Justice who accompanied him to Washington and who was a party to the construction of this treaty, I ventured to ask them what was the understanding come to by the plenipotentiaries at Washington as to the meaning of those words, and I was answered with a flippancy altogether unfair and unjust. I was not answered, in fact, at all. I was not told whether the construction I said those clauses were susceptible of was the proper construction or not in the opinion of the hon. gentlemen, or whether it was the construction generally adopted by the plenipotentiaries at Washington. The hon. gentleman did not tell me then and when I ventured to exercise my undoubted right in this House before I voted for the passage of that treaty and asked what it really means, I am sat upon by the hon. gentleman and lectured as if I had done something wrong. What does the hon. gentleman mean? Does he ask us to accept every word and clause of this treaty in ignorance of its real meaning; does he want the fishermen to believe that they have conceded nothing when it may turn out they have conceded all? Does the hon. gentleman want me to vote blindly for a clause of this treaty which the Minister of Justice has said admits American fishermen to outports and bays, carrying off our fisheries from us? What does the hon. gentleman take me for? I am here, Sir, solely and earnestly looking for information which I believe to be of the greatest importance, before this House adopts this treaty. I am asking it, too, at a time when the treaty is before the United States Senate. I say it is unworthy of this Parliament and unworthy of the hon. gentleman to seek to smuggle through a treaty under the assumption that it contains a secret meaning which he wishes to hide from the American people. I thought the day had gone by for any underhand dealings between the two great nations. I thought we were going to deal frankly and honestly with our friends to the south of us. I say it is in the highest interests of peace for this assembly of Canada and the Senate of the United States, if they adopt that treaty, to thoroughly understand what its real meaning is. Does the hon. gentleman want that before the next season goes by, a construction should be put on that treaty by the Minister of Marine diametrically opposite to that which Mr. Bayard puts on it? Does he want us brought to the point of the bayonet, to which he says the administration of the Fisheries Department brought us two years ago? Does he want us brought to that condition of affairs which Mr. Bayard describes in that private and confidential letter he wrote to the hon. gentleman? I trust not; and if he does not, we can only bring about a better and more cordial state of affairs by dealing honorably and frankly with each other, and, if we have entered into a treaty, by understanding what the real meaning of the treaty is. If we have made concessions, in Heaven's name let us understand the full meaning of them; and if hon. gentlemen are going to vote, let them know what they are voting for. I will not submit to be lectured to by the hon. gentleman in the tone and manner which he has assumed to-day, when I ask what construction is put upon that treaty by himself and the other plenipotentiaries. I was within my right, and instead of being lectured to by the hon. gentleman, I was entitled to a fair and decent answer, which I have not got.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I want to know whether this whole business is a farce or not. If we are not to consider and discuss every line of this treaty, what is the use of putting you in the Chair? We have a right to know what we are doing. We do not approve of this treaty; we do not pretend to say that it is a good treaty or honorable to Canada. We accept it under compulsion, but we have a right to know what we are accepting, and that we propose to know.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman had an opportunity of giving this treaty a most careful and deliberate examination; and with all its obscurity and defects, with all its want of clearness of construction or explicitness of statement, he knew that this House could not alter one jot or tittle of it. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat will not pretend for a single moment that in discussing this treaty the House is in the position that it would be in if we had before us a Bill on any subject over which the House has perfect control. When we have a Bill before us in which we can alter clauses, hon. gentlemen may contend in the most vigorous terms for the construction of the law or the meaning of a phrase, because it is in the power of the House to alter the Bill upon such representations. But the hon. gentleman knows that that is not our position here. The treaty is made.

Mr. MACKENZIE. There is an alternative.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What is that alternative?

Mr. MACKENZIE. To reject it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is precisely the position. That alternative was preserved to this House, so that not one line of this treaty can become operative or can affect the interests of Canada until the Parliament of Canada, having deliberately considered it in all its bearings, decides to accept and ratify it. But that is not the position of the hon. gentleman who has spoken. He would have been within the lines of his duty as an independent member of this House if, coming to the conclusion that this treaty was faulty, obscure, or that for any other cause it was undesirable that it should become binding on Canada, he had determined to give it the most unqualified hostility, and defeat it if he could; and even if he stood alone as a member of this House in taking that view, he was bound in the interests of Canada to vote for its rejection. But that was his only alternative, as it is not in our power to alter a line of the treaty or change it in any way. But what did the hon. gentleman do? After the giving the treaty the most careful consideration that he was bound as member of this House to give it, he said:

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

"The treaty has been agreed upon, and I for one hope that no action will be taken by this Parliament to throw it out. I am willing, Sir, that it should be accepted."

The hon. gentleman having taken that position, having come to the conclusion that he owed it to his constituents and to Canada that this treaty should become a binding treaty, I say that when he stands up here and takes half an hour of the time of this House in order to give the weight of his opinion as a lawyer in favor of the interests of the United States and United States fishermen, I say he is not fulfilling his duty to Canada or the fishermen of Canada. He asks, is it not desirable that we should know what the treaty means. When I submitted the treaty to the House, I explained as fully as I was able, the bearing and operation of each clause. I am not a lawyer, but I do not believe there is any such obscurity in it, or any such doubt calculated to be raised, and as the hon. gentleman alleges. Does he not think that if this treaty is to become law, he had better leave it to United States lawyers, fighting for the interests of United States fishermen, to take the ground he has taken this afternoon? And does he not think he had better reserve his great legal powers to fight for the interests of Canadian fishermen against those pretensions on the part of the fishermen of the United States? I am not disposed to lecture the hon. gentleman, I should be doing very wrongly if I were to attempt it; but he must allow me to say, not with a view to lecturing him, but in order if I can to stop a course which I deem more mischievous to the interests of Canada and Canadian fishermen than any course the hon. gentleman could take. It was with that view that I drew the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that he was not making a treaty, and was not in a position to alter a line of it, and, that being so, he was not acting fairly in the interest of Canada in taking a line which the most extreme advocates opposed to Canadian fishermen would take. That was the reason I drew the attention of the House to the unwisdom and the unfairness, in regard to the rights and interests of our own people, of the hon. gentleman expressing opinions on the floor of this Parliament, which might be quoted in the courts and used by those endeavoring to get advantages over our fishermen under this treaty. So feeling, I confess I could not understand how an hon. gentleman who professed to be, and I have no doubt is, anxious to promote the interests of Canadian fishermen, could express such opinions and leave them to be quoted by parties at another time and in another place, against our country and against the interests of our fishermen. Now, I say that if the hon. gentleman holds the opinion he has stated to-day, if the hon. gentlemen around him hold these opinions, they have not discharged their duty in supporting this treaty. I have no hesitation in saying that. I am very thankful to hon. gentlemen opposite for the manner in which they have dealt with this subject. I felt I was justified in saying, when I submitted this treaty to the House, that it was not a question of party, and I felt no little pride and gratification in finding that, to a large extent, hon. gentlemen opposite seemed to recognise that fact to the fullest extent, and to feel that, under existing circumstances, they would be justified in giving this treaty their support. But I do trust that that support will not be affected by statements, made with the weight and authority which their position in Parliament give hon. gentlemen, which may be used to our disadvantage in any other place. Perhaps it is because I am not a lawyer that I am not able to draw these fine distinctions that gentlemen of the legal profession can draw on almost every question and every law, however plain and clear, that may be submitted to them for approval; and perhaps for that reason, I think this is a plain, clear statement upon which there will be no difficulty whatever in arriving at a sound and just conclusion as to the meaning of the language in which it is couched. I have endeavored to give a frank, candid and explicit statement to the House of my views as to what the treaty contains, as to the effect of its various clauses, and as to the manner in which it was understood those should be operated; and I feel that hon. gentlemen opposite are scarcely fair in endeavoring to take the line that a very few of the members, I am happy to say, have taken, of forcing the Government into making such statements in its support as would be calculated to prevent its ever becoming operative.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman has misrepresented my position in this matter. The hon. gentleman has said that I addressed the House as a lawyer, and placed a construction on the treaty which was not in the interest of Canada—a construction calculated to affect injuriously in the future, as well as in the present, Canadian interests. The House will bear me out in saying that I have put no construction on the treaty. I have said that the language of the treaty was so loosely drawn that it is capable of such and such a construction, but I did not say whether I entirely agreed with the one construction or the other.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am very glad to hear that.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I pointed out most clearly to the hon. gentleman that the language used was capable of several constructions, and I asked him—and I had a right to have an answer—what was the meaning the British plenipotentiaries, at least, placed upon the treaty, and whether that meaning was accepted by the American Government or not? I am sick of hearing this argument cast against us from time to time that the truth cannot be spoken for fear it may affect Canadian interests. It is time the truth was spoken, and we should endeavor to get at the real meaning of this treaty before it finally passes the House. The hon. gentleman says that my mouth is closed because I told the House that I did not intend to move any resolution against the treaty, but that it ought to be accepted. I did say the treaty ought to be accepted, and I said that with the full knowledge, as the hon. gentleman repeats my words, that we could not alter a line of it. Why did I say so? The hon. gentleman knows well that in that very speech to which he refers, I pointed out the concessions which, in my opinion, Canada had made—concessions, which, if the opinions of the hon. gentleman and his colleagues, the hon. the Minister of Militia, the hon. the Minister of Justice and the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries were correct, would be fatal to the interests of Canada. But I said this, that if the hon. gentleman's statement was correct; if the relations between Canada and the United States had become injured to the extent he said they had; if we were brought face to face with a condition of facts not far removed from war; if, to use Mr. Bayard's language, we had "entered upon a career of embittered rivalry staining our long frontier with the hues of hostility;" if, to use the hon. gentleman's own language, we had committed 65,000,000 people and their entire press in bitter hostility to the people of Canada,—I said then, as I do now, that such being the case, any settlement, which was not absolutely dishonorable, should be accepted in order that we might get out of the humiliating and dangerous position to which the policy of the Government had brought us. I pointed out as strongly as I could that the harassing and injurious exactions which the government of the day had inflicted on American vessels in carrying out our custom laws, had been of very great injury to our people, and had been chiefly instrumental in bringing about that irritable state of feeling on their part. I pointed out further that while, technically, hon. gentlemen opposite were, as I believe they were, right in their construction of the treaty, the manner in which they administered it was fatal and suicidal, and the result of their administration was to bring us face to face with the determination on the part of 65,000,000 people that the manner in which we had acted towards them with regard to our fisheries should not be repeated except at the risk of war. I was not prepared, for one, to risk a war with the States; I thought any settlement would be preferable to a condition of things in which we would be brought face to face with war. And I say again, rather than revert to the dangerous condition of affairs in which we were only one year ago, when we had the retaliation Bill passed by the Congress and the Senate of the United States, we should accept this treaty. That, however, does not absolve me from my duty, as a member of this House, to enquire, as minutely as I can, into the meaning of the treaty. I repeat, that common courtesy demands at the hands of the hon. gentlemen and at the hands of the hon. the Minister of Justice, where two constructions may be found as to any important clause of this treaty, that they should say what is the correct construction, instead of denouncing those who point out to their notice these two constructions. They should tell the House what their opinion is, and what the opinion of the plenipotentiaries at Washington is, as to the proper construction.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did so to the best of my ability.

Mr. DAVIES. When I raised the question here to-day, the hon. gentleman did not do so. When I raised the question the other day, in my remarks following those of the hon. the Minister of Justice, he did not do so, and I have the right now to call for an answer. I am not open to the attack of the hon. gentleman of being in any sense unpatriotic or of having advanced arguments which would be fatal or prejudicial to Canadian interests.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The warmth exhibited by the hon. the Minister of Finance can only be accounted for by two suppositions: First, that the hon. gentleman finds himself in a difficult position.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Certainly; I have explained that.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). In the next place, that he is unwilling to explain, because he desires to keep something back from the people of the United States. With regard to the first, I believe the hon. gentleman comprehends that perfectly. With respect to the second, I hope he has no such object in view, because I believe no hon. gentleman here desires, now or at any time, to keep anything back regarding the operation of the treaty, which is susceptible of a different explanation at a subsequent day. What is the position of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies)? He recognises, as every one must, the difficulty of putting a construction on these two clauses, taken together, and he asks the hon. the Minister of Finance, the hon. the Minister of Justice, and the hon. the Minister of Marine, who took part in framing this treaty, to be good enough to explain the privileges which the American fishermen would enjoy under the operation of these two clauses. And what reply has he received? He has received no reply from either of those gentlemen, but the Minister of Finance is sheltering himself under this pretext, this flimsy pretext, as I must call it, for it is nothing else, that he is afraid to give an explanation of the Act for fear it might be used in the United States. He knows that there is nothing to offer in defence of the Act, as far as Canadian interests are concerned, and therefore he is sheltering himself behind that pretext. The case which the hon. member for Queens (Mr. Davies) has suggested may easily arise. A fishing vessel obtains a license, and desires to know how long it can obtain fishing supplies. To whom is the decision to be left? Are the collectors of customs in the different ports to give that decision, or are they to come to the Minister of Marine, or the Minister of Finance, or the Minister of Customs? Why do not the hon. gentlemen, while this matter is fresh in the minds of the people, give the information to the country as to how this will affect the question when this treaty goes into effect? I say that every collector of customs along the coast of Nova Scotia, taking that Act and interpreting it for himself, will get into a difficulty and will have to apply to the hon. gentlemen for an interpretation which they are best able to give. Can an American fisherman when he comes to Nova Scotia, take his license and get his supplies and go to the fishing ground? That is one question which I would like those hon. gentlemen to answer.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If the hon. gentlemen reads the clause, he will see that they cannot.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I want the hon. gentleman to interpret that clause for me. I am merely paying that deference to the opinion of the hon. gentleman which he is entitled to from the position which he occupied on that commission. He is bound, I think, to give us the interpretation which he places upon that clause. Of course, we have heard what he has said, but those who have not had the benefit of listening to him will be even more at sea on this matter than I am. Suppose those American fishermen come here and require supplies, the Minister of Justice says they cannot get them, while the Minister of Marine says they can get salt and go on their voyage. I want that distinctly understood. Then, when they come to port with their cargoes, and the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) has referred to the privilege which is given to them of transshipping their cargoes, who is to be the judge? Are the collectors of the ports to be the judges whether they are entitled to tranship their cargoes or not? The hon. gentleman knows that not one collector out of twenty along the coast of Nova Scotia, or, for that matter, in the whole of this Dominion, is capable of being a judge in regard to such a matter. To whom then are they to apply for the interpretation of this Act? If they were to apply to a harbor master or a port warden, or to some competent authority who would be able to understand the position of the vessels, and whether or not it was necessary for the vessel to obtain these supplies, I could understand it, but the hon. gentleman does not give us any information on that subject, in fact we have no explanation at all. The Minister of Justice and the Minister of Finance have not answered the plain, practical question which was put by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) as to what the American fishermen can do. The American Consul in Halifax said, in reference to these clauses, when I was speaking to him: I do not know how I am to interpret them; how do you interpret them? I said: When we are in Parliament, and meet the gentlemen who made this treaty, we shall receive from them the explanation, as far as our contention goes, as to the interpretation of the meaning of the treaty, and no doubt you will have your own orders from your own Government; but at this moment I am just as much in the dark as I was before, because now, if anyone were to ask me, if this discussion was to cease now, what the American fishermen can do and what they cannot do, I could not tell them from any explanation which has been given by hon. gentlemen on the other side. I say, therefore, that it is, in my judgment, absolutely necessary that these gentlemen should tell us exactly the bearing which these clauses have in reference to the privileges of the American fishermen in our ports. If this opportunity is passed over without further explanation, they will have to give that explanation when each case is presented for their consideration, and it would be far better for them to do it while the matter is fresh in the mind of every hon. gentleman here.

Committee rose.

It being six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

MEMBER INTRODUCED.

Joseph Gauthier, Esq., member-elect for the district of L'Assomption, was introduced by the Hon. W. Laurier and Mr. Amyot, and took his seat.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

House again went into Committee on Bill (No. 65) respecting a certain Treaty between Her Britannic Majesty and the President of the United States.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. MITCHELL. I was out of the House during a part of the time that the discussion was going on this afternoon, and just as I came in I heard an utterance from the Minister of Finance which I regretted very much indeed to hear. It was to the effect that if hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House felt that this was a bad treaty for Canada, they had not done their duty in allowing it to pass without putting it to a vote and endeavoring to defeat it, or something like that. I think I defined, the other night, pretty well, my attitude in relation to that treaty. I stated that I looked upon it as a complete give-away of the interests of Canada, but, notwithstanding that, knowing as I do the past transactions between England and this colony, where any conflict came up in regard to our rights as between the United States and this country, I felt, and I fear I shall always feel, that the interests of Canada are likely to give way, except under severe pressure. The hon. Minister of Finance stated truly the other day the lamentable fact of the existence of a hostile feeling in the United States that has grown up in reference to ourselves. Now, while I believe that that hostile feeling has been mainly created, indeed I may say entirely created, by the want of tact and judgment in the administration of our fishery rights under the Treaty of 1818, I must say that if the existence of this ill-feeling which has been so lucidly described by the Minister does exist in the United States,—and I regret to say that I believe it does, from what I see in their press, from the statements of their public men, and the facts recited in the correspondence and despatches of the Secretary of State and their representative at the Court of London—I say while I believe that state of things does exist, I must justify myself for not opposing this treaty, not because I think it is in the interest of Canada so far as regards the material concessions on either sides, but I justify my acceptance of it upon the ground that it is a means of leading to peace, and a settlement of a question which has long been a source of ill-feeling. Whatever may be the fate of the treaty in the United States Senate, England never can recede from that treaty made at Washington; she never can go back and claim the rights that we enjoyed before the unfortunate treaty was signed. Now, Sir, I say this in justification of myself, and to put my views on record in the Hansard, in order that they may go to the country. Whatever other gentlemen may do, and they can answer for themselves; whatever motives may have influenced them, and that is their business; for myself I want it placed on record that the reasons why I do not oppose this treaty are not that we have got the rights we were entitled to get under the Treaty of 1818, rights which were clearly recognised for many years in the correspondence and despatches between the Governments of England and the United States, but it is because I see in it a prospect of peace and more cordial relations. We never can go back to our old rights. If that treaty is rejected by the Senate of the United States, will England attempt to enforce the headland system for us, after what has been done at Washington? Will she attempt to enforce exclusion from bays along our coasts, after what has been done at Washington? No, Sir; we have got to confine ourselves and our pretensions in the future to the points and delimitations specified in the Treaty of Washington. Therefore, while I do not approve the treaty, while I cannot give it my cordial support on its merits, I say that the one great point in the whole matter in its favor is, that by it we may hope to secure peace, and that peace may lead to an extension of commercial intercourse between the two countries. Could it accomplish that I feel that it will have accomplished a very great deal. And that is the one point in its favor. I do not know what provoked my hon. friend the Minister of Finance to make the retort I heard as I came in, but I feel I must make this statement to the House before I withdraw my opposition to the treaty; I do so purely upon the ground of endeavoring to establish a friendly feeling with our neighbors on the other side of the border, and in the hope that once these friendly relations are restored, relations that never should have been ruptured, once they are restored this treaty may lead to more extended commercial intercourse, and to that greater prosperity which existed from 1854 to 1856.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I agree with the sentiments which have just been expressed by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) with regard to the unfortunate existence of unfriendly feelings in the United States towards Canada. I must say that I think they are in great measure due to the course pursued by the Government in this very matter, who have first tried a spirit of reconciliation, and then turned round and used those harsh measures which, I must say, might have resulted much more seriously than they have done. Speaking for the Maritime Provinces, I think the people accept this treaty somewhat in the same spirit of the hon. member for Northumberland, for the purpose of getting rid of that feeling of irritation, and in a desire to attain to more friendly relations between the two countries; and also, I believe, with the object—certainly that is the desire in the Maritime Provinces—of securing more extended commercial relations. Therefore I am glad that a treaty has been made. I do not think it is necessary, at this stage of the debate, to go into particulars. I regret not having had an opportunity of being present while the debate was going on. I may say, however, that under the circumstances, I think it is about as good a treaty as could be made, considering the peculiar circumstances in the United States, and the unfavorable time when the negotiations were entered into. I think if our Government had been more anxious, they could have chosen a more favorable time, and perhaps have got a better treaty. But we have this treaty now before us. While it is true that we cannot alter it, that treaty is now between the two great powers of Great Britain and the United States—yet we have a right to discuss it, and to obtain explanations in regard to it; more especially since we are responsible for putting an Act of Parliament upon the Statute-book. As representatives of the people we have the right to examine, to criticise, and to require explanations. I have carefully read the treaty. I think there are some portions of it that might have been rendered more clear in its language, and I fear it may eventually lead to complications and difficulties. That portion of the treaty which is embodied in the 7th section contains a great difficulty, to my mind. I cannot construe it as to obtain any clear view with regard to it. With regard to the 6th section, and the word “outfit,” there is no doubt in my mind, taking the whole text of the treaty, that it must include bait; and when we find in the other sections that they have a right to purchase provisions, supplies and outfits, we see that a construction has been given to the word “outfit” in other portions of the treaty which will include bait. But be that as it may, I believe it will be a benefit to our people as much as to the United States, because I think the more trade we can get, the better it will be for our people, and it will tend to more closer commercial relations. With regard to the 7th section, I was not present when the Minister of Justice gave his explanation, but I must say that if the construction is confined to the homeward voyage I cannot understand the meaning of the latter portion at all, because we must construe that along with the rest of the treaty. We find that a license may be granted when the vessel is on a homeward voyage. So far that is very clear. The vessel on a homeward voyage, may, upon application, get a license to purchase in established ports of entry, the necessary supplies it may require. Having obtained a license an American fishing vessel shall be authorized:

“To purchase in established ports of entry of the aforesaid coasts of Canada, for the homeward voyage, such provisions and supplies as are ordinarily sold to trading vessels.”

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, casual or needful supplies.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I must say it is a difficult matter, and I think it is one that we should discuss and see clearly what it involves. The section continues:

“And any such vessel having obtained a license in the manner aforesaid, shall also be accorded upon all occasions such facilities for the purchase of casual or needful provisions and supplies as are ordinarily granted to trading vessels.”

If I construe that as a lawyer, and I do so with diffidence where I find other legal gentlemen may take a different view, it is that if a vessel gets a license she will be entitled to get all those supplies. I think it is a matter of regret that this should not be made clear, because I believe, I may say I am confident from my own personal acquaintance with some gentlemen connected with the American fishermen, that the spirit in which the treaty was approached was a most friendly one towards Great Britain and Canada, and the consideration was entered upon with a view of getting rid of the difficulties that have existed since 1818 in the construction of the treaty and the headland question. It seems to me that the language should have been a little more clearly definite, and we are fairly entitled to explanations. We can reject the Bill, but we cannot alter the treaty, which, however, cannot go into effect unless assented to by the Parliament of Canada; but when we come to discuss the provisions of the Bill we are responsible, as representatives of the people, for the language of the statute; and I say that in enacting these provisions we should do it in language that will prevent difficulty, remembering that this is an international question, not one between individuals but between two great countries, the Imperial power and ourselves on one hand and the adjoining republic on the other. I repeat that I entirely endorse the views of the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) that we should not oppose this treaty. I believe in the spirit which has actuated the framers of the treaty, and I hope, whatever the results may be, nothing may arise under it to disturb the friendly relations between the two countries, but that all action under it may be of such a character as to restore friendly feelings. I have very strong opinions on this subject, because it is one of very great importance to my constituents. In our hour of distress and trouble, when we met with as great a calamity as any city could meet with, the men who came to our succor at that time were the people of the United States, and we have a strong desire to get rid, as far as possible, of all possible causes of irritation between the two countries, and more especially with a view to promote an extension of our commercial relations with the United States. I trust the result of this treaty will be such as I have indicated, and that all the efforts made will tend to accomplish that result; but it is our duty to weigh the question carefully, obtain all necessary explanations, and have the question discussed so that the people will thoroughly understand it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I thank very sincerely my hon. friend from the city of St. John (Mr. Weldon) for the spirit in which he has approached this very important question, and I feel the more friendly expressions to which he has given utterance in reference to this treaty because, coming as he does from one of the principal ports of the Maritime Provinces, no member of the House is better able to speak on this matter, and perhaps no one is more interested than is the hon. gentleman in having this treaty one that will be fair and just to the great fishing people of Canada. I must remind my hon. friend, however, that expressions of opinion are not of much value, that in times past when plenipotentiaries or high commissioners who have been engaged in the construction of treaties have afterwards attempted to put a construction on what the treaty contained, they were told, and very properly told, that they had no power to give any construction to the treaty any more than any other individual, and if they were witnesses before a court of law and under oath testified as to what was the intention of the framers of the treaty, it would not have any weight, because it is held that the treaty must construe itself. If there is, therefore, vagueness, the hon. gentleman will see I cannot remove it; if there is any question of doubt that arises, my hon. friend will see that no explanation I could give would be of any avail. I have no hesitation in saying that my hon. friend is much better able to construe this treaty than I am, and for the reason that the construction of this treaty would not depend on laymen like myself, but on legal gentlemen whose profession naturally throws upon them the responsibility of giving constructions of Acts of Parliament. My hon. friend says we are throwing this treaty into an Act of Parliament; but that does not change it. My hon. friend knows that neither this Parliament nor the Senate of the United States, nor any party connected with this treaty, can in the slightest degree alter one of its provisions; the treaty will have, so long as it lasts, to speak for itself, and it is the terms of the treaty and not any construction I can give it that will be held to be operative. What might be of greater weight would be where members of Parliament, gentleman occupying high positions in the legal profession, hastily committed themselves to very strong expressions as to the true and legal construction of any clause of this treaty, for such opinions might be quoted afterwards in a court of law as giving a particular construction as to a portion of the treaty, this opinion being given at the time of its discussion by a member of Parliament; and I therefore think it is very much to be desired that we should as far as possible avoid, as we cannot alter the treaty, that being beyond our power, giving any construction of the treaty that would be held or might be held to be an unfavorable construction in regard to the interests of our own people. I put that to my hon. friend. But I desire to draw my hon. friend's attention to what I think has been overlooked by the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), and by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), and that is that this treaty must be read as a whole. It is not going to be a single clause in the treaty that will decide its meaning. We have provided in the absolute part of this treaty that certain facilities, rights and privileges will be conceded to vessels coming into our ports in distress. They have the right to tranship, but that does not give the right of transhipment to a vessel not in distress. There is not an hon. member in this House who has said we ought not to give the right to unload and tranship if it is absolutely necessary to the vessel in distress in order that she may make repairs. She may unload, she may tranship so far only as necessary. If the repairs that a vessel requires do not make it necessary that she should unload, she cannot unload. I am asked by an hon. gentleman, who is to be the judge in all such cases. You must bring the principles of common sense to bear upon a question of this kind. If any vessel comes in and claims the right to unload and tranship her cargo, you would bring professional men, shipwrights, who would say that the vessel was in a condition that made it necessary to unload or not. You would have the means of subjecting the matter to a question of evidence and it is upon that the decision would be made. She could not tranship cargo simply because she said she was in distress; she must prove it, and it must be perfectly obvious that she is entitled to the benefit and advantage that the treaty confers. Suppose she is loaded with salt fish, she could not tranship, she could not sell her fish, because she could unload the salt fish and after the repairs had been made reload without suffering injury. But if the cargo was fresh fish and it was necessary that she should unload for purposes of repairs, she was entitled to tranship that cargo or pay the duties and sell the cargo. Is that not right?

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Did I understand the hon. the Finance Minister to say that an American vessel with a cargo of salt fish could not tranship it?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not. I say that coming in for repairs entitled the vessel to enter. The clause says that in consequence of stress of weather or any casualty she may unload, reload, tranship, or sell subject to the customs laws and regulations, all the fish on board, then such unloading or transhipment, or resale is necessary as incident to the repairs.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). There is no distinction between fresh fish and salt fish.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The distinction is this, that it is as far as necessary. If the cargo was salt fish, there was no necessity for selling or transhipping.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Yes.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not at all. If the cargo was salt fish she could unload and reload, but she may not sell or tranship if it is necessary, and that only would become necessary when her cargo was of fresh fish and for the purpose of avoiding the destruction of that cargo. That, I think, is perfectly clear and obvious. Then, Sir, I want to draw the attention of hon. gentlemen to another point, and that is that you must construe this treaty not by a clause, but by the entire. You give these provisions to vessels coming in in distress. You say that a vessel if she is lost in a storm, or if she has lost her rigging or lost her sails, or lost her salt, or lost her bait—I will go to the length of that—and I will say that a fair and liberal construction of that clause would, in my judgment, entitle a vessel in distress, having by shipwreck lost her salt and bait, to such outfit as would enable her to be relieved from the consequences of that storm. That I do not hesitate to say, but my opinion, of course, is worth no more than that of any other gentleman in this House in reference to this matter. But I would not hesitate to give it such a construction as that because the object is in the comity of nations for the purpose of good neighborhood and friendly relations to succor a vessel in distress as far as the necessity of the case demands. That is the position and that is the object of that clause. But when you come to transhipment it is confined to that. You not only have to read that clause, but to read the seventh clause in connection with casual and needful supplies, such as "trading vessels," not "fishing vessels" are entitled to. It is limited to casual and needful supplies. It does not outfit her for the fisheries at all. You can give her such supplies as will take her home, or having given her a license to purchase supplies to take her home, you give her such casual and needful supplies as the necessity of the case may demand. But, Sir, they are limited to these. If you come to the question of commercial privileges, suppose one of those fishing vessels demanded that they should be entitled to supplies and entitled to purchase bait, and to tranship their cargoes, the answer is that that is all provided for in the contingent sections, and the United States plenipotentiaries have agreed that United States fishing vessels shall only be entitled to those commercial privileges; to the purchase of supplies, to the purchase of bait and to the transshipment of cargoes when they make fish free, and when they take the duties off fish and enable the fishermen of Canada to go into the markets of the United States on the same terms as their own fishermen. You have not only to consider those two clauses but you have, in order to interpret them, to consider the broad, general principle laid down under which those commercial privileges that the advantage of transshipment shall be enjoyed by vessels that are in distress and that are driven in by stress of weather and obliged to be furnished with this relief in order to remove this inconvenience to them, and it is evidently the opinion of both sides of the House we should give this aid to vessels in distress. I will not take up the time of the committee further than to say that it is not in my power to give any explanation which will have any more weight or influence than that of any other person. The treaty is not to be construed by me, but it is to be construed by the principles of common law, which ought to be the principles of common sense. If there is a vagueness it is not in my power, or in the power of the House, to remove it. We have to take it as it is, or reject it. As I am happy to say we have by common assent agreed to take it, I do hope that we will not have a very extended discussion on nice points at this time which I think might probably be connected with considerable inconvenience.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). If the hon. the Minister of Finance had made this statement earlier, I think that a great deal of this discussion would have been avoided.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did make this explanation. Read my speech at the beginning of this question and you will find that I am merely repeating myself now.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The Minister of Finance in his speech is rather at variance with the principles he has laid down to-night. I think no one reading clause six under which the hon. gentleman provides that cargoes may be reshipped, would for one moment contend that it applies to any one class of cargo no matter what that vessel may have on board—whether it is fish or salt under the provisions of this clause as it has reference to an extensive character. They can reship this cargo and whether it is salt or fresh fish that is distinctly provided for in this clause. But the next question with reference to the procuring of their supplies was explained by the hon. gentleman on a previous occasion. After reciting that clause, he says:

"That was another concession. There is no doubt at all, Sir, that these were rights which under the strict terms of the Treaty of 1818 they could not demand, nor could they insist upon their being granted; but at the same time I think I am within the judgment of the House on both sides, when I say that in the case of a vessel which is homeward bound and requires provisions or needful supplies to take her home, if, for instance, she has some of her rigging carried away, or some of her salt washed overboard, and is obliged to lose her voyage in going back to a distant port to refit, a provision that she may obtain casual and needful supplies of that kind was demanded in the interests of good neighborhood, and it was not going too far to say that we would allow them to enjoy those advantages."

Therefore under those circumstances she can come in and get supplies, not to take her home, but to continue her voyage without going back to the United States at all. The hon. gentleman also says:

"And is obliged to lose her voyage in going back to a distant port to refit. It was in the interests of good neighborhood and it was not going too far to say we would allow them to enjoy these advantages."

Here the hon. gentleman distinctly lays down the principle that any vessel losing part of her outfit may supply that outfit and may return to the fishing grounds without going back to the United States to purchase them. That is exactly the comparison which my hon. friend from Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), laid down in the earlier part of this discussion.

Mr. MITCHELL. There is just one point that the hon. the Minister of Finance stated which I will refer to now. I am not going to take the time of the House discussing it at any length.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Do not apologise.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am not apologising. I never apologise to anybody as a rule, even when I am wrong. I follow the example of the hon. the Minister of Finance, and always claim to be right. I think the hon. gentleman went a little too far in his contention. He said that it would be impossible for any interpretation of his to have any effect in the construction of the treaty hereafter, and that gentlemen on this side of the House, who had a legal training, were better fitted to interpret the treaty than he was who made it. I wish to call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that for a very considerable time after the Treaty of 1818 was made, in construing that treaty, constant reference was made to the opinions expressed and the discussions that took place at the time the treaty was made. We had an advantage in the case of the Treaty of 1818 that we have not in this treaty; the protocols which have been laid before us in connection with this treaty are not of the character of the protocols of the Treaty of 1818. We had in the latter the arguments used and the positions set up by the negotiators on either side, and the conclusions at which they arrived; and we know as a fact that United States statesmen, in construing that treaty, time and again referred to the opinions and arguments used; and will anybody tell me that if a question should arise five or ten years hence, they will not turn up those secret protocols which we have not got sight of, for the purpose of determining what the construction of the treaty is? I think the hon. gentleman has gone a little beyond himself in taking the position he has done. I regret that the ancient system of giving us in the protocols all the propositions and arguments that were presented was not followed in the case of the Washington Treaty. The more astute statesmen of to-day think concealment is the best policy, and no doubt the hon. gentleman has been astute in concealing what the propositions and arguments advanced by him and those opposed to him were. If we could only ascertain the positions taken by my hon. friend, and the able arguments which he no doubt used, with regard to getting extended trade relations, we should have an amount of information that would be valuable to Canada, and we should then be able to judge for ourselves, what the prospects of those extended trade relations are. Therefore I do not agree with my hon. friend in saying that any utterance of his would have no effect in the interpretation of that treaty. If it were given, that utterance would have a weight hereafter that if the American Senate ratified the treaty after that utterance was made, and with the knowledge that it was made, it would be in a measure bound, and the future decisions of the two countries would be determined, by the interpretation my hon. friend should put on the treaty.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Finance to the fact that the same rule does not apply to the construction of a treaty as to the construction of an Act of Parliament. In the case of an Act of Parliament, the courts do not refer to any expression of opinion given by any of the members who voted for it, in deciding what the meaning of the Act is; but in case of a treaty it is not so. It is an agreement between two contracting parties, and the words of one of those parties are very often receivable as the very highest evidence of what the meaning of the parties was at the time. I would give the hon. gentleman a historical and memorable instance of that. The hon. gentleman will remember the difference of opinion that arose as to the construction of the Treaty of 1818. A contention was put forward by the United States that their fishermen had a right to purchase bait notwithstanding that according to the treaty they could only enter our ports for the four purposes of purchasing wood and water, for shelter, and for repairs; and when the contention was put forward that within the words of the treaty they could also enter for the purchase of bait, what was the reply of the hon. Minister of Justice? It was, that cannot possibly be the construction of the treaty, and I will give you the very best evidence in the world that when the contracting parties sat down to make that treaty, the commissioners, on behalf of the United States, proposed to introduce into the treaty the very word "bait," but it was rejected, it is not open to you to say that the treaty includes it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman quite misapprehends me. I did not discuss the question as to what would be shown by the proceedings and protocols. That is not an ex post facto expression of opinion by one of the commissioners; it is a something of an entirely different character.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman is perfectly right, and he will recollect that when we were pressing him this afternoon for his opinion as to the construction of the treaty, we did not ask what his opinion as a lawyer was now on the construction of these words, but what was intended by the contracting parties at the time they drew that clause; and I maintain that the intention of the parties is the best evidence in the world as to what the meaning of the treaty is.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is good evidence.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) But the hon. gentleman this afternoon denounced me in right good set terms for having ventured to say, not that such was the construction of the treaty, but that it was open to such a contention; and after he had denounced me for saying that I had no doubt that would be contended for by the United States, what does he say to-night? I have no doubt, in the broad comity of nations, the word "outfit" will include the word "bait"—just what I was contending this afternoon when I pointed out that it was important that we should know exactly what the meaning of the treaty was before it passed. The hon. gentleman says that by this clause, in consequence of any casualty or stress of weather, the American fishermen may load, unload, tranship or sell, if transhipment, unloading or selling are incidental to repairs consequent on that stress of weather or casualty. We do not differ on that point, but the difficulty was in applying a practical construction to the clause. If a man reports that under stress of weather he has been driven into a harbor and contends that it is necessary to make repairs and to tranship, there is nobody who can control him, and it is therefore a matter open to endless litigation, difficulties and disputes. The hon. gentleman was right enough in calling our attention to the fact that under article 11 of the reaty, special provision is made enabling the American fishermen to purchase provisions, bait, ice, seines, lines and all other supplies and outfit, under a certain state of facts recited in that clause, and the hon. gentleman said that provision having been made in that article for the purchase of supplies and outfit, it is perfectly plain those articles can be purchased under the 6th section of this Bill. But the hon. gentleman is wrong, because while these may be purchased under the 11th article of the treaty when the contingency which brings it into operation arises, they may also be purchased under the 6th section. He admits that they may be driven in by stress of weather, and it is necessary, as incidental to repairs, that they shall purchase an outfit.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman says no doubt they can, irrespective of the 11th article, altogether.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. They are two different cases.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman states the argument which I barely suggested, and for the suggestion of which he denounced me.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes, the hon. gentleman did, but I am not going to bandy words any longer. I am satisfied I was right in calling the attention of the House to the true meaning of these two important clauses of the treaty, and I am satisfied that the suggestions I made as to the possible construction of those two sections has received the endorsement of the hon. gentleman himself, and, so far as my remarks this afternoon were concerned, instead of denouncing me as he did in the extreme language he used, I deserved his approbation.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Before we read these two sections I would just say a few words. I do not think my hon. friend was open to the animadversions of the hon. the Minister of Finance when my hon. friend called the hon. gentleman's attention to the possible construction that might be put by the opposite party upon the provisions contained in these two sections. Nor do I think that because we have no power to amend the provisions of the treaty, we ought, therefore, not to discuss them or seek to ascertain precisely what they mean. It is quite true, as the hon. gentleman has said, that we have no power to alter a single line or word of the treaty. There is no doubt of that, but we are called upon to ratify the treaty; and being called upon to ratify it, although we have voted once on the second reading, the very object of going into committee and taking another reading of the Bill, which the hon. gentleman proposes to ratify the treaty, is to give the House an opportunity of reconsidering that which is done; and if, upon examination, it is found that these provisions of the treaty were not what we for the moment supposed they were, but were of a different character and conceded more than we were willing to concede, this House would be altogether remiss in its duty if it did not avail itself of the opportunity afforded it, at the different stages of the Bill, to reconsider what it had already done. I do not think that the Minister was called upon to commit himself to anything when he was asked to state what was the intent of these sections. We did not ask the hon. gentleman, as a lawyer, to state his views; we did not call upon him, as we might have called upon the Minister of Justice, to state his views. But the hon. gentleman was a party to these negotiations; he knows what propositions or counter-propositions were made; he knows what the protocols contained and the arguments accompanying them; and that being the case, what we supposed the hon. gentleman would do would be to put upon record his view of what was right, and of what was most favorable, if at all defensible, to this country. That, I think, was a legitimate demand, and the hon. gentleman had no right to take exception to the question put him, because it would be in the highest degree preposterous to suppose that we should here go into committee to consider the various propositions of the Bill, and confirm what was done in Washington in negotiating the treaty, and, at the same time, refuse to consider the meaning and purport of each of its propositions. Now the hon. gentleman has stated the meaning, and I do not think he has imperilled the fate of the treaty here or at Washington by that statement. The hon. gentleman has told us under what circumstances the American fishermen might buy bait under this 6th section. There is no doubt that a certain contingency may arise when that may be done, and that it is not the universal application of the treaty, or else its other provisions would be wholly unnecessary. The other provisions preclude the possibility of putting a construction on this section other than this, that when the vessel loses part of its outfit by stress of weather and is obliged to put into port, it may have an opportunity of supplementing what remains by purchasing the necessary supplies. Well, the hon. gentleman might as well have said that without the indignant denunciation he made of my hon. friend as to say it now, we were quite right in endeavoring to ascertain precisely what was intended by this treaty; and it does seem to me that the discussion having thrown some light upon the intention of the parties to it, the hon. gentleman has nothing of which to complain in the criticisms of my hon. friend.

On section 9,

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I wish to ask what is the reason for the modification or limitation of the penalties which, up to this day, have attached to the offense of preparing to fish within the prescribed waters. The hon. gentleman says that under the Imperial Act the two offenses of fishing and preparing to fish were accompanied with forfeitures in both instances; and it seems to me that the offence of actually preparing to fish, the vessel being in prohibited waters, ought to be punishable with forfeiture just as much as actual fishing.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My hon. friend is quite familiar with the fact that very great difficulties have arisen in connection with the question of preparing to fish, and he will observe that under this clause a vessel may be forfeited for preparing to fish. But this gives to the judge, if he thinks that the question is not sufficiently clear, that the preparing to fish had not gone to the extent of making it necessary to forfeit the vessel, the power to apply a lesser penalty; but, inasmuch as the clause still contains a provision leaving it in the discretion of the judge to forfeit the vessel and everything appertaining to her, my hon. friend will see, I think, that it is more calculated for the efficient and vigorous carrying out of the law than if it were left without giving the judge the discretion which is given under this clause.

On section 10,

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I notice that Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, the chief plenipotentiary on the side of Great Britain, in several speeches and representations in regard to this treaty, seemed to take great credit because the proceedings had been rendered more easy and more cheap than they were previously. What is the meaning of the words "shall be conducted in a summary manner?" Surely these proceedings must be conducted under the Vice-Admiralty Court, which every one knows has an exceedingly summary mode of procedure.

Mr. THOMPSON. Undoubtedly the proceedings must be conducted according to the practice of the Vice-Admiralty Court, but the hon. gentleman will remember that that court has discretion in matters of procedure.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not see that the judges of that court can lay down any practice which is not prescribed by statute.

Mr. THOMPSON. I do not think anything further could be done by this Parliament than simply to enact the words of the treaty in this regard, whatever weight they may have, and it is possible that, if the procedure of the court is not found to be of sufficiently summary character, and if any further powers are required for the Vice-Admiralty judges to modify the practice, legislation elsewhere may be necessary, but, in the meantime, it is well that our statute should embody the words of the treaty. I have no doubt that, without any enactment of the kind, if the Vice-Admiralty judges are willing to do so, the proceedings can be made very summary and comparatively inexpensive. Practically, if the proceedings are made summary, they are inexpensive, and it is only when the proceedings are of a more formal character as regards the pleadings, which may extend to great length, as they sometimes do, that the expenses become large; but, if it is necessary to enforce upon the court any amendments to their practice, until we have legislation in England to transfer to us the jurisdiction over the Vice-Admiralty courts, it may be necessary to seek special legislation.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). The question is whether we have any power over the Vice-Admiralty courts.

Mr. THOMPSON. I think we have not.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). The practice now is really as summary as it possibly can be. Does the hon. gentleman propose that the Vice-Admiralty Court should sit in any one place—for instance, in St. John for New Brunswick and in Halifax for Nova Scotia? I think the statute provides that these courts shall sit in those places. Now it is provided, as I understand, that the court shall be an ambulatory court, but I think that will add to the expense much more than if they sat in the same place, because we know that the great expense of these courts is incurred in the travelling of the judges and their officers. I do not exactly understand what is meant by the provision of this clause. Does it mean that if a vessel is seized at Pictou, for instance, the Court shall sit there?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes, for the purposes of the trial, though the hearing might take place at the capital.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). At present the trial is mostly by affidavits.

Mr. THOMPSON. Not always now.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Of course, there is a viva voce examination also, but the great expense now is incurred by the travelling.

Mr. THOMPSON. I think it is contemplated that power should be given to the judge to go to the place of the detention of the vessel, but I quite agree that in most cases there would be less expense in trying the matter at the capital than there would be in trying it at the place of detention. It is easier for the vessel to go to the capital, where the people can get the advice and assistance of their consul and where they can get counsel; but it is discretionary with the judge on the application of the defence to go to the place of detention. That is, that the Crown shall not apply to fix the place of trial.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Must not that power be given by Imperial statute?

Mr. THOMPSON. It is quite possible that that will be so. In all probability, before long, we shall have jurisdiction over these courts.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell.) As I understand, this gives to the American Government the right to make the subject of the constitution of the Admiralty Court for this purpose a matter of diplomatic controversy, and to ask the Imperial Government to simplify the proceedings of the court and make them less expensive. The American Government would have a right to complain if they thought there was unnecessary delay or unnecessary expense, and they might suggest what provisions they thought would be necessary to carry this article into effect.

Mr. THOMPSON. I concur with the hon. gentleman to this extent that, if it were found, under the practice of the Vice-Admiralty Court, that the proceedings were of such a character as not to fulfil the provisions of this article of the treaty, that they were not summary and inexpensive, the American Government would have a right to ask, and we would have a right to ask, that the practice should be simplified quoad those proceedings.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Would it not be necessary to have additional legislation under any circumstance?

Mr. THOMPSON. I think not. I think, if prompt attention is given to it by the courts, the practice can be made summary and inexpensive. The great difficulty in the adjudication of these Admiralty cases is that the judges who conduct the business of those courts have a great many other judicial engagements, but we have power to appoint assistant judges if necessary, and, if those judges are overburdened with work, it will be very easy to appoint assistant judges with the approval of His Excellency, and in that way delay will be avoided, and the proceedings will be made summary.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think some Imperial statute will have to be passed on the subject, because, under the treaty, every step, every action or proceeding, in every city, has to take place at the place of detention. I am under the impression, as the courts are now constituted, those cases can be heard alone at Halifax, or St. John, or Charlottetown, as the case may be, and the judge has no power to try a case, for instance, at Canso if a vessel is detained there, or at Pictou. I fancy the some Imperial legislation has got to take place to carry that section of the treaty out.

Section 12, sub-section 3.

Mr. JONES (Halifax.) Will the hon. gentleman explain the reason for making an exception in favor of bait? Is he not afraid it will lead to smuggling along the coast?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That provision was introduced especially to meet the practice in Newfoundland. In Newfoundland, as I dare say my hon. friend knows, it is the practice of American fishing vessels to sell the small fish that they do not wish to form a portion of their cargo to take back, to the person who catches the bait on the shores of Newfoundland. The practice is to exchange one class of fish for the bait. It was in order to meet that difficulty that we provided not to interfere with a practice that has become very prevalent there, and we provided that bait might be subject to barter.

Mr. JONES (Halifax.) Of course I can see the force of the explanation. But is the hon. gentleman not afraid that it will lead to smuggling all along our own coast?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, for the reason that no American fishing vessel can come into our waters at all, or be in a position to buy bait, without first obtaining a license, and the moment she obtains a license, she brings herself under the surveillance of the officers of the courts, and they can at once ascertain whether she has goods on board for the purpose of exchanging them with the inhabitants for bait. The fact that she has to obtain a license in order to buy bait, will bring her into a position that will make it extremely difficult for her to violate the customs law.

On section 14.

Mr. JONES (Halifax.) With regard to this amount to be received for licenses, does the Government propose putting that into the revenues of Canada? It would almost appear that they are selling the privileges of the fishermen for the sake of getting a certain amount of money to go into the revenues of the country. Should there not be some understanding that the money derived in that way should be added to the bounty which the fishermen now get? It may amount to a considerable sum, and I think it would be a fair mode of disposing of the license fees received, to devote them to the use of the fishermen, because our fishermen certainly are going to be placed at a disadvantage if these people are allowed to come in, and the money received for licenses should be distributed among them.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That subject has not yet received the consideration of the Government. It is an old adage, First catch your hare; and before we give ourselves a great deal of trouble as to the disposition of this money, it will be necessary to obtain it. It is not exactly as the hon. gentleman says. The tonnage fee that requires to be paid by American fishermen will correspond to the duty that our fishermen in the meantime have to pay in the ports of the United States; and the hon. gentleman will see that the fact that they are obliged to obtain these commercial privileges by the payment of this tonnage fee, does not give them the advantage they would otherwise enjoy in competing with our fishermen in the markets of the United States. But the suggestion the hon. gentleman has thrown out is one that he is quite aware would commend itself very much to the consideration of this Government, who have always exercised such a paternal care for the interests of the fishermen.

On sub-section 4,

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This clause was really for the purpose of enabling a vessel running in for shelter and running out again, not entering for wood and water, but purely and simply for shelter, to avoid any detention.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am rather inclined to think that the intention was not exactly carried out by the treaty. There are four purposes named, two of which are wood and water, and if American vessels come in for wood and water it is perfectly clear that they must communicate with the shore. So this proviso seems to nullify the concession so far as regards wood and water.

On sub-section 5,

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Under this section it is competent for the Government to maintain the existence of the modus vivendi even if the treaty is rejected by the Senate.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I wish this to be understood clearly. We delegate to the Government the right to continue the modus vivendi for two years even notwithstanding the rejection of the treaty by the Senate of the United States.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We would have power to do it by avoiding a proclamation.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Parliament delegates to the Governor in Council power to maintain the modus vivendi even if the treaty is rejected by the United States Senate.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. For the two years only.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The modus vivendi is only for two years, and it would be for any such portion as the Governor in Council may see fit.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is quite right.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Has the Government arrived at any policy on that question?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, they have not.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). They have not come to any conclusion in regard to giving them the advantage of the modus vivendi even if the treaty is rejected by the United States Senate.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That has not been considered. We simply propose to take power to do it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Under what possible combination of circumstances would the hon. gentleman think it desirable to continue the modus vivendi provided the treaty were absolutely rejected by the United States Senate? The hon. gentleman evidently has considered the question, because he retained to himself powers to maintain the modus vivendi.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman will see that the spirit running through the whole of this treaty is to avoid difficulty as far as possible, and it will be quite possible even in the event of rejection of the treaty by the Senate to anticipate its adoption at a very early day; and if under those circumstances there was reason to suspect after the presidential election that the question would stand in a different position, it would be very desirable to have the means to avoid any friction in the matter.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). If the treaty were rejected by the Senate it would be practically dead.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Technically perhaps not. I am in hope, first, that that will not occur; and, second, even if it did, the hon. gentleman will see that if the Governments of Great Britain and the United States, having practically come to an agreement, found at an early day that the position was favorable to having the subject dealt with in a different way, that difficulty could be got over without much trouble.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman to take these powers is a reasonable one, and I do not think the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House will object to it. If we were on the rejection of the treaty by the United States to drop the modus vivendi, it would be sure to revive those troubles which the hon. gentleman hopes are pretty well allayed, and I therefore think this is a reasonable proposition.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If the treaty is rejected, it is at an end and a dead letter so far as it is a treaty between the two countries, and if the hon. gentleman will reflect for a moment he will see that if these rights are continued for a certain period they must be continued for all time.

Mr. MITCHELL. No. We have reserved scarcely anything by the treaty.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Oh, oh!

Mr. MITCHELL. That is the contention I have made all through, and that is the conclusion I have arrived at. As the American people must see that they have gained everything by this treaty, it matters to us very little whether they enjoyed those privileges for the full two years provided by the modus vivendi or not. One thing is clear, that we would never be able to enforce our rights subsequently without the British Government behind us, and then it would arouse irritation and bad feeling. But I do not agree with the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), who contends that if the Americans exercise these privileges for two years, they will have them for all time; but if they enjoyed them during two years under this arrangement, the privilege might be continued under a new treaty based upon the same lines.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). This section immediately becomes law.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. I hope there will be no address from this House containing congratulations to Mr. Chamberlain and his other colleague, Sir Sackville West, for the great success they have had in giving away the interests of Canada.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say in reply to my hon. friend that I shall feel that Her Majesty's plenipotentiaries have had everything that they could possibly expect when this House by an unanimous vote has ratified their proceedings.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have one statement to make. It does seem to me obvious that the last section of the Act which we have just passed by this House is really going further than the plenipotentiaries offered in their proposition for a modus vivendi. That modus vivendi of the British plenipotentiaries set out the following:

"The treaty having been signed the British plenipotentiaries desire to state that they have been considering the position which will be created by the immediate commencement of the fishing season before the treaty can possibly be ratified by the Senate of the United States, by the Parliament of Canada and the Legislature of Newfoundland. In the absence of such ratification the old conditions which have given rise to so much friction and irritation might be revived and might interfere with the unprejudiced consideration of the treaty by the legislative bodies concerned. Under these circumstances and with the further object of affording evidence of their anxious desire to promote good feeling and to remove all possible subjects of controversy the British plenipotentiaries are ready to make the following temporary arrangement for a period not exceeding two years in order to afford a modus vivendi pending the ratification of the treaty."

This was to provide for a state of affairs pending the ratification of the treaty, but there was no proposition, as I understand it, made by the British plenipotentiaries providing that the modus vivendi should remain in force in the event of the Senate absolutely rejecting the treaty. The hon. gentleman now has taken power, and if it should be rejected, from what has fallen from him it is perfectly plain that the Government intends to act upon this, that whether the treaty is ratified or rejected the modus vivendi remains in force for two years.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I understand it was only intended in the event of the treaty being held over.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That was what was intended, but we are going further now.

Committee rose and reported.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is not that a little too rapid? You taunted us with the fact that we had unanimously adopted this Bill.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Oh, no.

Mr. MITCHELL. You will not taunt us again if we let it go?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the third time and passed.

INCREASE IN SALARY OF AUDITOR GENERAL.

Sir CHAS. TUPPER moved second reading of Bill (No. 87) to amend the "Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act," chapter 29 of the Revised Statutes of Canada. He said: Mr. Speaker, the first clause of this Bill provides that the salary of the Auditor General shall be increased to $4,000 per annum. In asking the House to consent to the proposed increase of salary to the Auditor General from $3,200 to $4,000 per annum, I think it but right to state that the present Auditor General, as hon. members are probably aware, assumed office on the 1st August, 1878, at which time the office, previously held in conjunction with that of the Deputy Minister of Finance, was separated from the Finance Department and established on a similar basis as is the office of Comptroller and Auditor General in England. The Auditor General has had in effect to organise an audit staff, and to reorganise the system of audit. Beginning with the audit of the appropriation accounts, he has year by year examined more and more closely into the expenditure voted by Parliament, the result of which, as hon. members well know, is set forth in the voluminous report which has been distributed under the direction of Parliament. He has from time to time, had in addition to the audit of the appropriation accounts, submitted to him for examination and audit, the bank accounts of the Dominion, the Indian accounts, and all the trust accounts and open accounts which the Government have opened with other Governments or with banks or financial agents. During the last year, as his office steadily progressed, the Government have delegated to him the power of auditing the receipts of the Dominion. In fact, it may be said, that at this moment every cent received or paid out on account of the Dominion of Canada is subject to the review and audit of the Auditor General. His duties have increased so much that the Government have felt it only right to ask for the increase named in the Bill and they are sure that it will receive the consent of members of both sides of the House. Perhaps it may be as well here to give to hon. members a sketch of what has been accomplished thus far by the system of audit established. Every item of the Dominion expenditure of over $40,000,000 annually is examined in all its details, either before or after payment, and as has been alluded to before, the whole revenue is now being examined in the same way as is done in England, and this audit both of expenditure and receipts has tended to greater watchfulness on the part of the different departments. Apart from the keeping of the appropriation ledgers, both general and revenue, personal accounts have had to be kept of all advances made in all departments; bank accounts, railway subsidies, debt accounts, have all to be scrutinized, and coupons examined; the accounts of the election held in 1887 were reviewed by him and claims on that head reduced by some $26,000; similarly on the franchise accounts, claims have been reduced by some $61,000. Hereafter the stores accounts will be more thoroughly brought under examination. His annual report, containing as it does, a classification of every item both of revenue and expenditure, and containing statements and tables that require much more care than might be supposed from their size, is more complete both as to number of details and clearness of definition than any report, dealing with the same variety of accounts and equal magnitude of sums, published by any other country in the world. Hon. members who attend the meetings of the Public Accounts Committee will recognise the labor entailed in the production of all the statements and vouchers required by that committee. I think it will not be necessary for me to make any further reference to the onerous duties of the office, further than to say that all this has been accomplished by a staff of 25, including the Assistant Auditor and extra clerks. The few amendments to the Audit Act, composing the other sections of this Bill, are all introduced with the idea of making the Act uniform in its details, and in no way detract from the powers given by the original Act to the Auditor General. I have only further to state that the Auditor General, while informing me of what has been done in the matter of carrying on the business of his office, has asked me to mention that the loyalty to the office of all the members of the staff, from the Assistant Auditor downwards, and their zeal and intelligence, cannot be too highly commended. I have no hesitation in saying, as the head of the Finance Department, and so being brought in constant and frequent intercourse with the Auditor General, that I believe it would be impossible for members of either side of this House to overrate the careful and painstaking ability of that officer or his conscientious devotion to the duties of the most important office which he discharges. He is in every sense of the word an officer of Parliament. Although he has felt it occasionally to be his duty to differ with members of the Administration and with the conduct of the affairs of the public departments in carrying out the details of his office, I have no hesitation in saying that he has discharged his duties in such a way as to win the confidence and hearty approval of every member of the Government, as I am sure he has earned it of every member of both sides of the House.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like to ask the hon. gentleman what is intended to be the effect of section 2, which provides that the Auditor General shall be subject to the provisions of the Civil Service Superannuation Act. At the present time the Auditor General can only be removed by an address of the two Houses to the Governor General, but under the provisions of this clause he would be placed at the mercy of the Government after he has reached a certain age, and would be removable at any time after that age by the Governor in Council. If that would be the effect of this clause, that certainly was not the intention when the Auditor General was appointed. It was intended to make the Auditor General here, as the Auditor General is in England, absolutely free from Governmental influence or control, in order that he might be as free as a judge to discharge his duties in accordance with the law. I do not object to his having a retiring allowance if he should retire, but I do not think it is necessary to extend to him in special terms the words of the Superannuation Act. A retiring allowance could be granted to him in some other way, allowing him to remain the independent officer that he is at the present time.

Mr. EDGAR. The 8th section of the Civil Service Superannuation Act would seem to place it in the power of the Government of the day to enforce retirement on the Auditor General, and surely it is not contemplated that that should be the case, because, as I understand, the Auditor General is supposed to be a statutory officer, entirely independent of the Government of the day. The Act gives the Government power, in the case of civil servants who have entered the service after the age of 30 years, as I believe was the case with the Auditor General, and who are possessed of some special qualification, to add something to the number of their years of service, and section 8 says:

"Retirement shall be compulsory on every person to whom the superannuation allowance hereinbefore mentioned is offered, and such offer shall not be considered as implying any censure upon the person to whom it is made; nor shall any person be considered as having any absolute right to such allowance, but it shall be granted only in consideration of good and faithful service during the time upon which it is calculated."

If that is really the effect of this clause, I should think the Government cannot desire that it should be so, and would provide in some other way for a suitable provision being made in case of the Auditor General's retirement.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I think it is understood that the Auditor General should be independent of the Government, and be removable in the same way as a judge; but it seems to me that this clause placing him under the Superannuation Act will have the effect which my hon. friend has just pointed out. The sub-section of section 8 of the Act further provides :

"Nothing herein contained shall be understood as impairing or affecting the right of the Governor in Council to dismiss or remove any person from the Civil Service."

To put the Auditor General under the Superannuation Act might give the Government right to dismiss him.

Mr. CASEY. If the Government merely wish to provide a retiring allowance to the Auditor General, I think they can do it in the same way as is done in the case of judges, who are only removable, like the Auditor General, by an address of both Houses of Parliament. The very usefulness of an Auditor General at all depends on his being utterly independent of the Government ; and I do not remember, although I was in the House at the time, that any of the hon. gentlemen opposite raised the slightest objection to the appointment of the Auditor General under these conditions ; and the speech of the hon. Minister of Finance this evening has been such as to lead us to believe that he approves of the Act under which the Auditor General was appointed, and does not wish to make him any less independent of the Government than he is now.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. CASEY. I am glad to hear the hon. gentleman say "hear, hear," and after that declaration he will doubtless say that it is more fitting to provide for the retiring allowance of the Auditor General in some other manner, and not to bring him under the control of the Civil Service Superannuation Act.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I can assure hon. gentlemen opposite that the last thing that the Government had in view in this Bill was to do anything that should enable us to interfere in the slightest degree with the position Parliament has given to the Auditor General. I quite concur in the views expressed by hon. gentlemen opposite that the value of this officer to a very great extent depends on the position he holds as an officer of Parliament, and the sole object we had in view in giving the benefit of the Superannuation Act, was to give a deserving officer the privileges which that Act would confer. But I do see a point in what has been stated by hon. gentlemen opposite, that this involves the contingency of the power of removal of the officer by the action of the Government, which certainly was not the intention. I will leave the clause over for such amendment as well enable us entirely to avoid any such thing.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have much pleasure in congratulating the hon. Minister of Finance and the Government on this act of justice to a most able officer. The hon. Minister of Finance will remember that I urged this increase of salary upon him one or two years ago. Although I have always differed politically from Mr. Macdougall, our excellent Auditor General, I have always observed that he is one of the most efficient officers we have in the public service, and I again thank the Government for this somewhat tardy act of recognition of his services.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

House resolved itself into committee to consider the following resolution :

That the salary of the Auditor General of Canada shall be four thousand dollars per annum, and that he shall be subject to the provisions of the "Civil Service Superannuation Act."

(In the Committee.)

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It probably would meet the case if we were to move that section 8 of the Superannuation Act should not apply. That gives the benefit of the Act, to the officer, and takes away the power of compulsory retirement.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If the hon. gentleman will look at the Act, providing for retiring allowances for the judges, he might make a similar provision in this case. Let him make no allusion to the Superannuation Act, and there will be no difficulty or misunderstanding.

Mr. BOWELL. If you adopt that plan, you relieve the Auditor General from the monthly payment of the superannuation fund, and place him in the same position as a judge. I understand a judge does not pay anything out of his salary towards the fund out of which he gets superannuation.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The object we have in giving him the benefit of the Superannuation Act, is to confer its advantages upon him, and I meet the objection hon. gentlemen opposite have raised by the provision that this portion of the Superannuation Act shall not apply.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). The proper course would be to give the Auditor General the same position as a judge, and let him, on retiring, get fifteen years. No doubt he would be free from paying to the Superannuation fund.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman must see that will not do. There is a special law for judges. After fifteen years, they may ask to be pensioned off, and their pension amounts to two-thirds of their salary ; but in the Civil Service, after thirty-five years, the officers are entitled to 70 per cent. of their salary. It would not do to place the Auditor General in a different position in this respect from the other officers of the service. The hon. the Minister of Finance has admitted that it is not the intention of the Government to interfere with the Act of Parliament, which made the Auditor General a special officer under the control of both Houses, and I think therefore that the clause may be well amended by putting this officer under the Civil Service Act as regards the superannuation. He should contribute to the fund the same as any other civil officer.

Mr. LAURIER. There are two objects to be attained with regard to this officer : First, he must be kept independent of the Government. We all agree upon that point, and then we also agree on the second point that he should be provided a retiring allowance. He will stand in a perfectly unique position. There will not be a parallel in the service to his case, and therefore there is no reason why we should not make a special law to enact that he will contribute to the Civil Service fund in the same way as other officers, and still not be under the control of the Government with regard to superannuation. A special law should be devised. It is just as much against the spirit of the Act respecting the Auditor General that the Government of the day should be entitled to reward him as that they should be enabled to punish him. Section 8, which the hon. the Finance Minister suggests might be left out, provides that under certain circumstances, the Government could compel the Auditor General to retire. Section 4 of the Act places it within the power of the Governor in Council to reward civil servants.

"The Governor in Council may, in the case of any person who entered the Civil Service after the age of thirty years, as being possessed of some peculiar professional or other qualifications or attainments required for the office to which he has appointed, and not ordinarily to be acquired in the public service, and to the actual number of years' service of such person, such further number of years not exceeding ten, as is considered equitable for reasons stated in the Order in Council made in the case."

It is not right that the Auditor General should be dependent on the Governor in Council to add years to his time of service. Section 5 provides the superannuation of every officer shall be preceded by an enquiry by the Treasury Board. Who will report as to whether it should take place or not ? That is not a desirable position in which to place the Auditor General. Some further consideration should be given by the Government, and a special clause prepared.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. On the other hand, who is to decide when that officer is to be superannuated?

Mr. MITCHELL. Parliament.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Then the matter must be brought to Parliament by somebody. It should be brought by the Government. Supposing this officer is perfectly independent, as we are of opinion he should be, of the government, and you say he must contribute to the superannuation fund the same as any other officer, and is to be superannuated after so many years, when he becomes disabled, he should obtain his superannuation on the same scale as that fixed for any other officer of the Government. Well, the Auditor General will, most likely, when he finds he is failing in health, claim superannuation. He must write to some one, and he will write to the Government, which is the executive of the country. If you say that officer cannot be superannuated without the Government first coming to Parliament to obtain consent, he would not be different from any other officer. Because, if I am not mistaken, the Superannuation Act says that the names of the officers who are superannuated during the year must be reported to Parliament within so many days after the beginning of the Session. Therefore, this officer would be in the same position, and would be reported as such, but, suppose that officer becomes unfit for his work and is unable to claim his superannuation, is the Government to wait for six or eight months till Parliament meets before it can have an officer to discharge those duties?

Mr. LAURIER. Suppose he is unfit for his work to-day?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Suppose he is unfit for his work at any time. The case never arose before, but it is well to discuss it now. Suppose that officer is unfit for his work. He does not ask for his superannuation, or perhaps he is unable to ask for his superannuation. What is to be done? Are we to remain five or six or eight months without an Auditor? I think not. I think, if the Auditor is unfit for his work, the Government should have the responsibility of replacing that officer during the year until Parliament meets, and should then report to Parliament and let Parliament deal with the matter. The Government would report the circumstances and would say: We had to put some one in there to fulfil those duties; we could not leave the accounts without audit during all those months. But if the officer applies for superannuation, the Government should have the power to grant it if he is unfit for his work. But, if he asks for superannuation and he is still fit for his work, the Government should not grant it, and the Government would have to report to Parliament that the officer had asked for superannuation, but that the Government did not think he was unfit for his work, and therefore did not think he should be superannuated. One of the hon. gentlemen who spoke said the Auditor General should be altogether independent of the Government, that we should not be in a position to increase his salary or to give him any preferment. That is hardly the thing. We are doing the very contrary now.

An hon. MEMBER. Parliament is.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The initiative comes from the executive, and I must say, continuing what the Minister of Finance said just now, that the Auditor General, who was, when he was in Parliament, opposed to us, and voted conscientiously against us, as we voted against his party and against himself, though he has an arduous duty to perform, a very difficult and a very unpopular duty, has performed his duties well. The Auditor General has never been a popular officer, and he never will be a popular officer, because his duties must make him unpopular. He is in the way of everyone. He is in the way of the ordinary officers, he is in the way of the Deputy Ministers, and, no doubt, very often he is in the way of the Ministers as well; and that is the reason why the office was created, and that is why we have supported him, because we think that, when Parliament in its wisdom created that officer, it did so for the purpose in accordance with which he is now acting. I think we agree on both sides as to what is to be done with this officer, and probably the best way would be to pass the resolution, report it, and go into Committee of the Whole on another day and amend it in the Bill.

Mr. LAURIER. I submit this point for the consideration of the Minister. To-day, as the law stands, the office of Auditor General can be vacated by death, resignation or by removal on a resolution of the House. It is not intended that, as far as that provision of the law is concerned, there should be any amendment. The only thing contemplated is that, if the Auditor was stricken by disease, he should not be left penniless, but should have the same provision as other public servants have. I would suggest that some such clause as this would meet the case:

"The Auditor shall have the privilege of contributing to the Superannuation Fund, and, if he resigns or is removed, he will be entitled to the same superannuation pension as if he belonged to the Civil Service."

I think that clause would meet the case.

Mr. THOMPSON. My own view is that we had better adopt the clause as amended, and, as the Bill has to go before the Committee of the Whole, I will consider the matter subsequently. I think it might be better to adopt the terms now proposed, or to make the whole of the clauses of the Superannuation Act apply to the Auditor Act. I think nearly every provision of that Act should apply to him except section 8, which makes the retirement compulsory. It has been suggested that this would put him too much in the hands of the Government, that the Government would have to reward him by adding to his years of service, and that the Treasury Board in that way would have the power to influence him. Look at the position now. The Auditor is entitled to no superannuation allowance. Parliament can provide for him, but it can only provide for him by an Act, so that practically he is now in the hands of the Government in that way, and the only control which we would have would be that, if that officer applied for superannuation to-morrow, the Treasury Board would have to ascertain his term of service and report whether, being a zealous officer, we should add to his term of service. It seems to me that, in any case, it would be absolutely necessary that the Treasury Board should have the right to investigate whether the officer has arrived at the time of life or is suffering from such an infirmity as would entitle him to superannuation.

Mr. CASEY. It is clear that this officer, being an able officer, and there being no provision for his superannuation, he must be put under some regulations, either under a special set of regulations involving perhaps nearly the whole of the Civil Service Superannuation Act, or under a set of regulations which are already applicable to another class of officials, and I urge that he should be placed under the set of regulations which apply to that class of officials—I refer to the judges.

Mr. THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman will observe that in that case, in the first place, he would not have to contribute to the superannuation fund, in the second place he would be entitled to two-thirds of his salary if he became infirm the day after he was appointed, and he would be entitled to retire on an allowance for fifteen years service.

Mr. CASEY. No doubt he would have certain privileges under those circumstances which he would not have under the proposed provision. He would not have to contribute to any superannuation fund, and he would be entitled to a two-thirds allowance after a certain period. The hon. the Minister of Justice knows better than I do after what term of years he would be entitled to that. If judges are entitled to these privileges, why should not the Auditor General be, who is practically a judge, whom position is more important and more responsible than that of any judge in Canada, not excepting the chief justice of the Supreme Court? In his relations to the people of the country, he has more to do with the rights and wrongs of the people, and has more control over the executive, than any judge in Canada. I contend that the Auditor General should not have to contribute to the superannuation fund. There is no more reason why he should not contribute than a judge, there is no reason why he should not have the same privilege of retirement as a judge. The hon. the Minister of Public Works has raised a great many objections, and has taken the ground that the Government should have power of summary dismissal while Parliament is not sitting.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No.

Mr. CASEY. Yes, the hon. Minister raised this point. He said: Suppose the Auditor General became unfit for his duties; say, for instance, that he became insane during the recess of Parliament. He said: Are we to go on—I understood him to say so—seven or eight months with an Auditor General not fit to perform his duties, and have to wait until Parliament meets before we can have another Auditor General? Well, Sir, apply the same argument in the case of judges. When a judge becomes insane—if such a thing should happen; I do not know that I ever heard of a judge becoming insane—but if, for instance, the chief justice of the Supreme Court became insane, what are you going to do with him until Parliament meets? You cannot turn out the chief justice, or the judge of any court in Canada, until Parliament meets again; and we have never had any practical difficulty from that provision of the law. If there is no difficulty in the case of judges, who are so numerous, is it likely that difficulties will arise in the case of this one officer? All the arguments that the Minister of Public Works used to show that the Government should have the right to remove between sessions of the House, an Auditor General who may be, we will say, insane, or unfit for his duty in any way, would apply to the case of Government removing a judge who had become unfit for his duty in any way between sessions of Parliament. Of course, a judge who is insane, I suppose, could be put in a lunatic asylum like anybody else, and there would be a vacancy in that case, and ipso facto the same in the case of an Auditor General. If he became unfit for his duty by insanity, he would go to a lunatic asylum. If it was urged that he was unfit for any other reason, then the Minister of Public Works says the Government should have the right to decide whether he is unfit or not, but the existing Act says no decision shall be passed on that point until Parliament meets again, and I think it is proper that no decision should be passed upon his fitness or his unfitness, or in any other respect than insanity, or absolute incapacity of that kind, until Parliament shall meet again. Both the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Justice have argued at length as to how his superannuation could be accomplished in any case, there would have to be an application to the Government and so on. How is it accomplished in the case of judges? A judge, when he chooses to retire at a stated period, resigns and applies for his superannuation allowance. Why not do the same thing in the case of the Auditor General? If you are going to create an analogy between the Auditor General and any other class of officials whatever, if you are going to place him under the regulations which govern any other class of officials, why not put him, in accordance with common sense, under the same conditions as those which regulate the retirement of that class of officials whose position is analogous to his own? Put him under regulations applying to judges. If you want to put him under any Act, put him under the Judiciary Act, instead of the Civil Service Act. It must be kept clearly and distinctly in mind that there is no analogy whatever between the position of Auditor General and a civil servant of the highest grade—no matter how highly he is paid or what his duties are. The Auditor General is an officer of this House, put there as a check upon expenditure, and there must be no analogy created between him and any member of the Civil Service whatever.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman has misunderstood me, otherwise he would not have made the statement he did just now. I did not say that because an Auditor General might become unfit for his work, the Government should immediately interfere. But I supposed the case of an Auditor General who, after Parliament has been prorogued, becomes insane. Are we to understand that for the remainder of the year, until Parliament meets again, the Government shall have no Auditor General, that the public accounts shall not be audited?

Mr. CASEY. What do you do with a judge?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I will speak of the judge afterwards. Suppose the Auditor General becomes insane. The accounts still have to be audited and we must have another. The hon. gentleman asks, if a judge becomes insane, do we have to replace him? Of course not; but all the judges will not become insane at the same time, and if they became all insane at the same time, probably a strong remedy would have to be applied. But the hon. gentleman said the Auditor General must be put in the same position as a judge, and as a judge applies for his superannuation after 15 years, so the Auditor General should be allowed his superannuation after 15 years. But the hon. gentleman forgets that although a judge may apply for his superannuation, the Government is not bound to give it. The Government examine whether that judge deserves to be superannuated, whether he may not be fit to continue to serve his country, and if they find that he has no claim to superannuation, they say to him: No, we cannot give you superannuation, because you are fit to continue your labor. The hon. gentleman says that we should put the Auditor General out of the reach of the Executive. But the hon. gentleman would put him entirely into the hands of the Government, because he would authorise us to refuse or to grant superannuation, to reward him for his good services, for dereliction of his duty in being too lenient towards other officials or towards the Government. I think the hon. gentleman has established no comparison between the position of a judge and that of an Auditor General. But there is no doubt that if you want the Auditor General to be as we always wish him to be, independent of the Government for the time being, he should be made subject to the Superannuation Act, and he must contribute as any other officer. Why not?

Mr. CASEY. Why does not a judge?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. He is not a judge, he is an officer. He has never been called a judge, except this evening by the hon. gentleman. He is an officer of the Government, like any other officer, with this exception, that Parliament has declared that he shall not be removed by the Government, but only by Parliament. Very well, but that does not prevent his being put under the Superannuation Act, provided that clause put him under the control of the executive. But why should he not contribute as well as any other officer? There is no reason why he should not. The highest officers, men receiving the highest salaries, are made to contribute as well as those receiving lower salaries. Let him be put on the same footing as the others.

Why, after 15 years, should that officer be entitled to two-thirds of his salary, without contributing to the fund? The Deputy Heads, after fifteen years, would have only 30 per cent. of their salaries. It is not fair, it is not just to the other officers, and, therefore, if he is to be superannuated at any time when he becomes unfit for his work, he should contribute to the fund as well as the others.

Mr. CASEY. I cannot agree with the hon. Minister that he is in any sense an officer of the Government. In fact he is distinctly by law not an officer of the Government. He is not in any degree analogous to any other servant. He is a statutory officer like a judge, and he is completely analogous, in his duties, in his appointment, and in the method of his removal to a judge. The Minister says: Why should he not contribute to the superannuation fund? Why? The burden of proof rests on the Government to show why he should contribute, and the analogies go to show that he should not contribute to the superannuation fund. His office and duties are analogous to that of a judge and not to a civil servant. He is in no sense an officer of the Government; he is not removable by the whole Government combined or by the Governor General except by an address from both Houses of Parliament. He should, therefore, be placed in the same position as a judge. The Minister of Finance says that even a judge is subject in regard to superannuation to the decision of the Government. I do not grumble about that; but if it gives the Auditor General the same position as a judge, he will be as independent as a judge—and we know they are independent. As to the insanity question, I believe that if the Auditor General became insane and was placed in an asylum under the certificate of two medical men, his position would become vacant. I do not know whether an insane man could hold office or not; that is a question for lawyers. The main point is that there is no analogy between this officer's position and that of the deputy head of a department, with which the Minister of Public Works compared him; the analogy is with a judge and he should be placed in the same position.

Mr. THOMPSON. It is unnecessary at this stage to enter into the whole question as it is simply desired to carry a resolution respecting increase of salary and his right to superannuation under the Superannuation Act.

Mr. WELDON. There is no dispute as to the independent position which this officer should hold. I suggest that a special provision should be framed to meet this case so far as superannuation is concerned, as it will not properly come under the Superannuation Act. I would suggest that the true analogy in regard to the Auditor General is with the judge of the new Court of Exchequer, who is a single judge, and there should be a provision by which a temporary deputy to the Auditor-General might be appointed. If the principle is conceded that the Auditor General should be independent of the Government, that he should be an officer of the Parliament and only amenable to that body, we should take care that the provisions in regard to his superannuation should be a special provision, which would place him in a proper position.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We must get on with the measure or throw it over to the next Session. One portion of the resolution is to increase the salary paid to the Auditor General, which must commence by resolution. Another portion of the proposition is to provide for his superannuation, and that also must commence by resolution. When the Bill is introduced and is before the House, any portion of the Superannuation Act, which would not apply to this officer, could be especially referred to in the Bill. All we wish now to do is to adopt these two propositions: first, that the Auditor General shall have an increase in salary; and second, that he shall come under the Superannuation Act, so as to have the right to claim a retiring allowance.

Mr. MILLS. I think the right hon. gentleman was not in his place when the discussion commenced. I believe he has the Act before him, and if he will look at its provisions he will observe that the whole drift of the Act is incompatible with the position of an Auditor. An Auditor is not an officer of the Government; but the Act deals solely with officers of the Government and no other class of officials. You cannot apply that Act to this case. You will be obliged to reconstruct the whole provisions of the law relating to the Auditor General from the beginning to the end in order to protect the independence of that officer as now constituted. I understood the Minister of Finance not to favor any interference with the independence of the Auditor General and not to seek to place him under the Administration. That being settled, you cannot apply the provisions of the Superannuation Act to him. If, as the First Minister says, and says rightly, we must commence by resolution with respect to providing for the superannuation of the officer, we need not state that the superannuation shall be under the provisions of the Superannuation Act. Leave out these words in the resolution. If we are obliged to fight this matter we do not intend to concede the principle which the Minister of Public Works has enunciated. The whole drift of his observations was that the officer ought to be under the control of the Government.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No; the hon. gentleman knows better than that. I have already given my negative to that, and surely the hon. gentleman should not repeat the statement, when I have already said it was not my belief, it was not my intention, it was not what I said.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I only infer the hon. gentleman's meaning from what he said. I spoke of the difficulties that might arise if this officer were to become disabled or mentally disqualified and the observations the hon. gentleman made if they had any point at all were made on this line, that in order that the country might be perfectly secure, the office ought to be under the control of the Government. I enter my protest against that. The hon. gentleman says that was not what he meant in respect to his statement and I accept his explanation. I am pointing out that in this resolution relating to superannuation it is proposed it should be made under the provisions of the Superannuation Act. I am sure the First Minister and the Minister of Justice could have provided for the superannuation of this officer without referring to the Superannuation Act at all.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In order to remove the difficulty we can strike out the superannuation clause and let the motion remain, that the Auditor General gets an increase of salary merely. We shall leave the superannuation clause for another Session, and I do not think the Auditor General will be thankful to the hon. gentlemen.

Mr. LAURIER. I do not think that in a matter of this importance we should be driven from our position upon a mere technicality. The right hon. gentleman was not here when this discussion arose.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have heard enough of it to know what it is.

Mr. LAURIER. Perhaps so, and the hon. gentleman sees that we believe the intention of the Government was very praiseworthy and on proper lines. We contend that this motion was not aptly expressed, because as it is expressed in the resolution and in the Bill it would place the officer in the power of the Government, and the Government repudiate this idea and say they do not want that. Therefore they must devise something else in order to keep the independence of the officer and provide an allowance for him. The hon. gentleman now says, in a fit of temper, perhaps, that he should strike out this provision for the present. I do not propose that.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. You do.

Mr. LAURIER. I think it should be removed in its present form. We simply say that the officer shall not be subject to the Superannuation Act, but that he shall be allowed a superannuation allowance. Perhaps the idea of the Minister of Justice is a good one, that we might apply the whole of the Act except one or two clauses, but perhaps the suggestion which came from this side of the House would be the best one, that we should frame a special law for this officer as he is a special officer. If we carry the resolution as proposed to be amended it will, I have no doubt, meet the views of the Government.

Mr. CASEY. There are two sections in the Act, one saying his salary shall be $4,000 and the other that he shall be subject to the provisions of the Superannuation Act. I do not see why we should pass more than the first resolution to-night as to his salary. The hon. the Finance Minister who is in charge of the Bill—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I was until hon. gentlemen opposite took it out of my hands.

Mr. CASEY. That may be very smart. The hon. gentleman is in charge of the Bill and responsible for it, and before the Premier came into the House he agreed to let the matter of superannuation stand over and merely pass the first clause of the resolution.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We cannot do that, because it requires a special clause for superannuation.

Mr. CASEY. You can pass the resolution about his salary to-night and you can pass the resolution about superannuation later on when you have agreed to the terms of that arrangement. I quite understood before the Minister of Public Works spoke that form of the superannuation question was to be the subject of mature deliberation by the Government in the meantime.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would suggest that the hon. gentlemen opposite after expressing their views would allow this resolution to pass and it will be incorporated in the Bill. Before that Bill passes there can be such amendments made as will preserve the complete independence of the Auditor General. In the meantime by passing this resolution we get the assent of the House to give him a superannuation allowance.

Mr. LAURIER. For my part I see no objection to carry the resolution, but I shall endeavor to amend it before it is incorporated in the Bill.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Certainly.

Mr. LAURIER. I have no objection to an allowance for this officer as well as any other officer in the service.

Committee rose and reported the resolution.

ACT RESPECTING FERRIES.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved second reading of Bill (No. 39) to amend the Act respecting Ferries, chapter 97 of the Revised Statutes of Canada.

Motion agreed to. House resolved itself into Committee on the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. EDGAR. This is a very important change in the law. It provides that we shall strike out the provisions that there shall be public competition for the licenses of ferries in certain cases. I do not think we should do that without some very good reason. The original clause is:

"Every license for a ferry shall be under the Great Seal and shall be issued by the Governor in Council after public competition as hereinafter provided."

This amendment is to strike out those words "after public competition." I know the effect of this is limited by the other amendments to put it in force between Canada and the other countries and I know that according to the other amendments in this Bill public competition is still left in cases of other ferries. I would like an explanation from the Minister of Inland Revenue as to why public competition under this clause should be abolished.
